There is a recent case entitled Carr v. Quigley, 57 Cal. 394, decided by this court since the cases of Churchill v. Anderson, and Chapman v. Quinn, which, without noticing them, contravenes the doctrine of those cases and of the other cases cited. The cases cited by Department One (57 Cal. 395), in support of the conclusion reached by it in Carr v. Quigley, were Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295, and Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761. But a closer examination of those cases shows that neither of them sustains the conclusion reached in Carr v. Quigley.

Doll v. Meador was an action of ejectment brought to recover the possession of a lot of land in the town of Red Bluff, county of Tehama, the plaintiff basing his right to recover upon a patent issued by the State. The defense rested, as stated by the court itself (16 Cal. 320), "upon the alleged reservation of the tract embraced in the patent to the plaintiff, from location by the State, as part of the land granted to her, on the ground of its previous selection as a town site. On the trial the defendant offered to prove various facts showing its selection and survey into blocks and lots, and its settlement and occupation by citizens of the United States and of this State, as early as June, 1850, and its continued use and occupation by them as a town site, and for the purposes of trade, and not agriculture, ever since; and the possession and use of the lot in controversy by the defendants, or parties through whom they claim, for the like purpose, continuously since the original selection; also that the tract was first officially surveyed, and the survey thereof approved under the laws of the United States, and by their proper officers, on the thirty-first of March, 1855; that the tract was then designated as such town site in the official plat of the survey; that a certified copy of the plat was on file in the office of the receiver and register of the United States land office at Marysville, at the time of the location referred to in the patent to the plaintiff, and that no patent from the United States for the tract, or certified list embracing the same, made by the commissioner of the general land office of the United States, has ever been issued to the State. The proof offered, except as to the issuance of a patent by the United States, or a certified list by the commissioner of the general land office, was, under the objection of the plaintiff, excluded, and as to the patent and certified list the proof was held incompetent, and it is upon exceptions taken to the rulings in these respects that the defendants seek a reversal of judgment."

In Doll v. Meador, therefore, the defendants sought to show, by matters dehors the patent, that the disputed premises were reserved from the grant to the State because within the town site of Red Bluff, and thus to avoid the State patent; while in the case now before us the defendant seeks to show, by matters dehors the patent, that the disputed premises were reserved from the grant to the railroad company, because within the limits of a claimed Mexican grant, and thus to avoid the patent of the United States.

The difference, if any, in the position of the respective plaintiffs, is undoubtedly in favor of the plaintiff in the present case who claims under a patent from the United States, while the defendants in each are without title and without privity with the paramount or common source of title.

In Doll v. Meador the court distinctly decided the relation of the defendants to the title was not such as to allow them to question the validity and efficacy of the patent under which the plaintiff claimed, and concluded the opinion in these words: "Until some one appears prepared to trace title to himself from a common or paramount source, parties who are clothed with the solemn evidence of title furnished by the patent of the State may rest in security without fear of any successful disturbance in the enjoyment of the property held by them, whether that property be a portion of the school lands or swamp lands granted to the State by the general government."

In Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, both parties had a patent for the disputed premises, the plaintiff claiming under a patent issued in professed compliance with the requirements of the acts of Congress commonly known as the Pacific railroad acts, and the defendant under a patent of a later date, which recited that the land was within the exterior limits of the Moquelamoc grant, and that a patent had, by mistake, been issued to the railroad company. The object of the suit, which was a bill in equity, was to determine the ownership of the land.

Enough has been said to show that neither Doll v. Meador nor Newhall v. Sanger at all support the decision in Carr v. Quigley, while Doll v. Meador is really an adjudication the other way.

When the petition to have the case of Carr v. Quigley heard before the court in Bank was denied (57 Cal. 395), the refusal was based on the case of McLaughlin v. Powell, 50 Cal. 64. Yet that case does not sustain it either, for there the patent itself contained, as a part of the description, an express exception of "all mineral lands," should any be found in the tracts described in it; and the court held that parol evidence was competent to show that the demanded premises were mineral lands.

I am convinced that the cases cited in support of Carr v. Quigley do not support it; that it is opposed to the other cases cited, is wrong in principle, and therefore ought to be overruled.

In my opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

McKEE, J., concurred in the dissenting opinion of Mr JUSTICE ROSS.

THE PEOPLE, APPELLANT, v. GEORGE L. JORDAN,
RESPONDENT.

FORMER ACQUITTAL.—JUDGMENT ON DEMURRER TO INFORMATION.—Pending a demurrer to an information, a new information was filed, and afterwards the demurrer to the former information was sustained, but no order was made or requested permitting a new information to be filed, nor was any opinion expressed that the objection raised could be avoided by a new information as provided for in section 1008, Penal Code. Held, the judgment on demurrer to the first information was a bar to another prosecution.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, discharging the defendant.

A. L. Hart, Attorney-General, for Appellant.

J. M. Lucas, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—On the 26th of May, 1882, an information was filed accusing the defendant of a misdemeanor, to which information the defendant demurred. The demurrer was argued and submitted. On the 15th of July, after the court had in open court intimated its intention to sustain the demurrer, the district attorney filed a second information based on the same offense. No leave of the court was asked or given for filing the second information. On the 22d of July the court made an order sustaining the demurrer to the first information—but no order was made or requested, or opinion expressed, as provided for in section 1008 of the Penal Code. The defendant then moved to dismiss the prosecution on the second information, which was granted, on the ground that the sustaining of the demurrer to the first information, without directing the filing of a new information, the second being substantially the same as the first, and for the same offense is final under section 1008 of the Penal Code, and is a bar to another prosecution; and the defendant was discharged and his bail exonerated.

From this order the people appealed.

We think the action of the court below, as to the second information, was correct. It makes no difference that the second information was filed before the judgment on the demurrer. When the judgment on demurrer was rendered, there being no direction for a new information or re-submission, it became and was a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. The legislature seem, in the section referred to, to have made a second prosecution in case of demurrer sustained, depend upon the judicial opinion of the court that the objection raised by the demurrer may be avoided on a new information; and in the absence of such opinion the prosecution for that offense is at an end. People v. Allen, 61 Cal. 140, was not the case of demurrer sustained.

Order affirmed.

HAMILTON W. GRAY, APPELLANT, v. MATTHEW
NUNAN, SHERIFF, ETC., RESPONDENT.

WRIT OF POSSESSION — HUSBAND AND WIFE.— It is the duty of the sheriff, under a writ of possession against the husband, to dispossess the wife found in possession, notwithstanding she may have instituted divorce proceedings prior to the commencement of the action for possession, if her only claim to the property is such as she has by reason of her marital relations.

PRACTICE — NEW TRIAL — NOTICE OF MOTION — PRESUMPTION.— Respondent objected on appeal to the consideration of the statement on motion for new trial, because no notice of intention to move for new trial was filed or served. The transcript contained a stipulation giving plaintiff further time within which to serve his statement, and when it was served on defendant's attorney, the latter, in acknowledging its receipt, reserved the right to object that it was not served in time, but at no time in the court below objected to its settlement or consideration on the ground that proper notice of intention to move for a new trial had not been given. The court below, in denying the motion, did not proceed upon the supposed want of notice of intention, but upon the determination of the question presented by the motion itself. Held, that it would be presumed the court below found that proper notice was given, or that defendant had waived the objection.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

William Reade, for Appellant.

The evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

No evidence was introduced or offered to prove any title in Jane Canavan, except such as she derived as the wife of James under the lease to him.

The mere pending of divorce proceedings does not change the relations of husband and wife so as to confer upon the wife an interest in the realty, or create a distinct title and possession from the husband.

Wife cannot set up adverse possession during coverture. (Frink v. Alsip, 49 Cal. 104; Lord v. Hough, 43 Cal. 581; Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308.)

The possession of premises occupied by husband and wife, which is either common property or the separate property of the husband, is deemed in law to be in the husband. (Bernal v. Gleim, 33 Cal. 675.)

A judgment in unlawful detainer is sufficient authority to put out any member of his (defendant's) family. (Saunders v. Webber, 39 Cal. 287.)

M. C. Hassett, for Respondent.

Ross, J.—Objection is made to the consideration of the statement on motion for a new trial, because, as is said, no notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed or served. We find in the transcript a stipulation on the part of defendant, giving the plaintiff further time within which to serve his statement on motion for new trial; and when the statement was served on defendant's attorney, the latter in acknowledging its receipt, reserved the right to object that the statement was not served in time, but at no time in the court below objected to the settlement or consideration of the statement on the ground that proper notice of intention to move for a new trial had not been given. The court below, in denying the motion, does not appear to have proceeded upon the supposed want of notice of intention, but upon the determination of the questions presented by the motion itself. We must presume, therefore, that the court below found that proper notice was given, or that defendant had waived the objection.

The action is against the defendant, as sheriff, for his failure to execute a writ of possession issued on a judgment rendered in one of the late County Courts in favor of the plaintiff, and against one James Canavan. The writ was placed in the hands of the sheriff by the plaintiff on the 18th of October, 1877, together with his fee for its execution. It appears that Canavan was not personally in possession of the property when the judgment was rendered, nor when the writ was placed in the hands of the sheriff, nor was he there in person at any time afterwards; but his wife was; and the sheriff refused to dispossess her under the writ for the reason that prior to the judgment on which the writ was based, Mrs. Canavan had instituted a suit for a divorce from her husband, and was at the time of the rendition of the judgment and the issuance of the writ in possession of the property. On this state of facts the court below instructed the jury:—

“In this case, if you are satisfied that prior to the rendition of this judgment in the County Court the wife was in possession of that property, and had commenced an action of divorce against the husband, which involved that very property, then she was holding adversely to him and would not be bound by this writ, and the writ could not be executed against her; but, on the contrary, if you find from the testimony they were living there as husband and wife, or that she entered under the husband subsequent to the rendition of the judgment or the commencement of the action in the County Court, then she would be liable to the writ and should be removed; in other words, if she was holding there adversely to the husband at the time this action was commenced in the County Court, if she had commenced her action of divorce prior to that time, and was holding adversely to him, then it was the duty of the sheriff not to execute the writ of assistance against her, and he would not be liable.”

This instruction was erroneous. There was no testimony introduced tending to show any right to the property on the part of Mrs. Canavan, except such as she may have had by reason of her marital relations with the defendant in the writ. Under the writ against the husband the wife should have been dispossessed. (Saunders v. Webber, 39 Cal. 287.)

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

McKINSTRY, J., and McKEE, J., concurred.

JOSEPH BARSOLOU, RESPONDENT, v. R. H. NEWTON
ET AL., R. H. NEWTON, APPELLANT.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — DELAY IN THE PAYMENT OF THE PURCHASE MONEY — LACHES.— In an action against the vendors to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale and conveyance of real estate, where a considerable delay had occurred in the payment of a portion of the purchase money, it was claimed that the vendee had been guilty of such laches as rendered it inequitable to enforce the contract. On a review of the facts, held, that the charge of laches was unfounded, it appearing that the vendee had taken possession with the consent of the vendors, and made valuable improvements upon the land, and that the vendors assented to the delay in the first instance, and subsequently acquiesced therein without giving notice that payment was required.

ID.— PLEADING — TENDER.— The complaint did not allege a formal tender, but there was an allegation of part payment and an offer to pay the balance. Held, to be sufficient under the circumstances of the case.

ID.— SUBSEQUENT PAROL AGREEMENT — FINDING — EVIDENCE.— An answer was filed by one of the defendants, in which it was alleged among other things that after the making of the contract, the vendee became indebted to him in a certain amount for lumber and materials used in the construction of the improvements upon the land, and thereupon entered into a parol agreement with the vendors, whereby it was stipulated that he should not be entitled to a conveyance so long as this amount remained unpaid. The court below found that there was no such agreement, and this finding was objected to as being contrary to the evidence. Held, that the answer stated a valid agreement, but that the finding was justified by the evidence.

ID.— JUDGMENT — ERROR IN COMPUTING INTEREST.— An objection to the form of the judgment overruled on the authority of Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118, but an objection to the computation of interest upon the unpaid balance of the purchase money was sustained.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Yolo, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

W. B. Treadwell, for Appellant.

C. P. Sprague, and P. H. Sibley, for Respondent.

McKee, J.— This was an action to enforce specific performance of a contract made by the defendants jointly, for the sale and conveyance of a lot of land in the town of Woodland to Andrew Weaver, the grantor and assignor of the plaintiff. Schardin, one of the defendants, admitted all the allegations of the complaint, and averred his readiness to perform the contract; but his co-defendant Newton denied the allegations, and averred that the plaintiff was not entitled to performance of the contract, because, by a subsequent parol agreement between Weaver and the defendants, Weaver was not to receive a deed under the contract until he paid for certain lumber and materials, which were furnished to him for constructing improvements upon the land which he had purchased.

It appears from the record that the defendants sold the land to Weaver on the 8th of October, 1877, for six hundred and twenty-five dollars, and executed and delivered to him their agreement in writing for a good and sufficient deed, upon payment of the purchase money, on or before October 8, 1879, with interest at the rate of one per cent per month, payable every three months; and to secure payment of that sum Weaver gave them his promissory note, payable on or before the 8th of October, 1879.

Upon the completion of the contract Weaver, by the consent of the defendants, entered upon the land, made valuable improvements upon it, and, in part performance of his contract, paid defendants between the 21st of January, 1878, and the 13th of October, 1880, the sum of five hundred and twenty-eight dollars and fifty cents. Upon receiving the payment of October 13, 1880, the defendants apportioned the amount between themselves, Schardin received his portion as the complement of his share of the purchase money, and Newton consented that Weaver should have his own time to pay the remainder, if he paid promptly the interest as it became due. On September 17, 1881, Weaver paid Newton one hundred dollars, which the latter received and indorsed upon the note. Every year, also, Weaver paid the taxes which were levied upon the land, except the taxes for the last year, which were voluntarily paid for him by Newton.

Soon after the last payment the improvements which had been built upon the land were destroyed by fire. Weaver then offered the land for sale, and on November 11, 1881, he presented to the defendants the form of a deed of conveyance of the land, which he requested them to execute and acknowledge, offering at the same time to pay the balance due upon the purchase money, including principal and interest. Schardin was ready and willing to execute the deed, but Newton unqualifiedly refused to accept the money or to execute the deed. Next day Weaver sold and conveyed the land to the plaintiff, and assigned to him the "agreement for a deed." The conveyance and assignment the plaintiff had recorded, and on the 14th of November, 1881, he exhibited them, as recorded, to the defendants, and presented to them a conveyance, in form, of the land, which he requested them to execute and acknowledge, offering to pay all the money due and unpaid, according to the terms of the contract between them and his grantor and assignor. Schardin executed and acknowledged the conveyance, but Newton refused to execute it, or to recognize the plaintiff as having any rights at all in the premises. Both offers were made in good faith. Each of the parties making them had, in the time of making them, the ability, and were ready to pay the money.

The contract itself was complete and certain, and fair in its terms; it was also mutual in its remedies, and such a one as a court of equity will enforce. By its terms time for the payment of the purchase money was specified; but although the purchaser failed to pay at the time specified, time was not of the essence of the contract, for the delay in making payment was excusable; the vendors consented to it and acquiesced in it, and never at any time withdrew their consent by giving notice to the purchaser that they required performance within a specified time. Laches was therefore not attributable to the purchaser in making his payments under the contract. When time is not of the essence of a contract for the conveyance of real estate, and has not been made so by notice, then the mere fact that the purchaser, with the knowledge and consent of his vendors, enters upon and occupies the land under his contract, and makes valuable improvements thereon, is ordinarily decisive to entitle him to the favorable interposition of a court of equity. (Barnard v. Lee, 97 Mass. 95; Gibson v. Patterson, 4 Ves. 90; Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. 457; Edgerton v. Peckham, 11 Paige, 352.) And when in addition to the circumstances of entry on the land, and the erection of valuable improvements upon it, there has been payment of the greater portion of the purchase money and readiness to pay the remainder, a purchaser will be entitled to relief if he has not been guilty of laches in applying for it, or unless there be some circumstances in his case which would render it inequitable to grant relief.

The complaint contains no allegation of a formal tender; but such a tender is not required in every case. (Dowd v. Clarke, 54 Cal. 48.) Part performance and readiness to perform the remainder was, under the circumstances of the case, sufficient for the maintenance of the action. (Brix v. Otto, 10 Ill. 70; Buffalo Catholic Inst. v. Bitter, 87 N. Y. 250.) The plaintiff was therefore entitled to a specific performance upon payment of the remainder of the purchase money, unless Newton had the right to refuse performance until the purchaser fulfilled the agreement averred to have been made between him and the defendants, after the contract for the conveyance of the land.

In Hewlett v. Miller, ante, we held that it was competent for a defendant in an action for specific performance to show that by a subsequent parol agreement he was to retain the title until other money than that named in the original contract should be paid; and he could properly refuse to convey until such subsequent contract was performed. That decision rests upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity. In the case in hand, however, one of the contracting parties defendant admits there was no such contract between the purchaser and the vendors. The other alleges there was, but the court below finds "that the written agreement or bond set out in the complaint and the promissory note for the sum of six hundred and twenty-five dollars constituted the entire agreement at the time of the making of said note and bond, and that it was never at any time agreed between the parties that said Weaver should not be entitled to the conveyance referred to in the said bond until he should make payment to the defendant Newton for lumber and material furnished said Weaver by said Newton, nor by any other party. And it is not true that no building was erected on said premises except with lumber furnished by defendant Newton."

Exception was taken to this finding on the ground that it was not sustained by the evidence.

The only evidence upon the subject was the testimony of Newton and Weaver. The testimony of the one tended to prove that the lumber was furnished upon such an agreement as he set up in his answer; that of the other, that there was no such agreement. In the entire case there are no circumstances from which an inference can be drawn that the lumber and materials were furnished upon such an agreement. On the contrary, all the circumstances tend the other way; and in the testimony of the only two witnesses upon the subject there was, at least, a sufficient conflict to sustain the finding of the court. The result of all the decisions is that this court will not disturb the order granting or refusing a new trial where there was a substantial conflict of evidence. There was, therefore, no error in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The decree entered in the case was in form such as has been approved by this court in Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118. But there is a slight discrepancy in the computation and compounding of the interest. Correctly compounded and computed the remainder of the principal and interest due on the 14th of November, 1881, when the plaintiff's offer of performance was made and refused, amounted to two hundred and sixty-seven dollars and forty-one cents. The decree should be amended so as to require payment of that amount to the defendants; and as modified the judgment and order are affirmed.

A. N. Drown, for Respondent.

Ross, J.—Adele Lefevre died seized and possessed of the property in question on the 15th of December, 1866. She left a will which was duly admitted to probate in the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, by which she devised the property to one Silvey. The year before Lefevre's death one Halphen recovered in one of the courts of the city and county of San Francisco a money judgment against Silvey. On the 27th of February, 1867, an execution was issued on that judgment, and by the sheriff levied on all the right, title, and interest of Silvey in the property; and on April 20th, thereafter, his interest therein was sold by the sheriff under the writ to one Torrens. On October 19, 1867, one Le Roy recovered in the Fourth District Court of the State a money judgment against Silvey. By virtue of his judgment Le Roy redeemed the interest of Silvey sold under the Halphen execution, and there being no further redemption he received on the 31st of December, 1867, a deed from the sheriff conveying to him all of Silvey's interest in the property. Meanwhile other money judgments were rendered in the State courts against Silvey—one in favor of Madam Granier, and one in favor of the defendant Don; and after the sheriff's deed to Le Roy a third money judgment against Silvey was recovered by the defendant Martin.

So matters stood thus: All of Silvey's interest in the property as devisee of Lefevre, whatever that interest was, had become vested in Le Roy, while there remained money judgments against Silvey in favor of Madam Granier, Don, and Martin, in the order in which they are here named. In this condition of affairs Madam Granier, Don, and Martin, in order to secure, if they could, payment of their respective judgments, determined to purchase of Le Roy the interest in the property he had acquired through his judgment against Silvey, and the subsequent redemption and sheriff's deed, as well as to purchase the judgment itself. The fund necessary to make the purchase was made up by Madam Granier, Don, and Martin, in the proportions following: Madam Granier contributing $227.17; Don, $226.17; and Martin, $452.85; and with this common fund Le Roy's interest in the property and in the judgment he had recovered against Silvey, were purchased — the conveyance of the property, and the assignment of the judgment being taken, for convenience, in the name of Madam Granier. After this was done the three executed and placed upon the records of the county where the property is situated, the following agreement:—

"ZOE GRANIER, T. B. MARTIN,	} Agreement.
AND JEAN DON.

"Whereas, Madam Zoe Granier, T. B. Martin, and J. Don, have each recovered a judgment against Adolph Silvey; and whereas for the purpose of securing the payment of said judgments the said parties have jointly purchased of Theodore Le Roy a judgment recovered by said Le Roy against said Silvey, which judgment is recorded in judgment book "G" of the judgment records of the Fourth District Court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and a certain lot of land in San Francisco, with the tenements thereupon, conveyed to said Le Roy by the sheriff of said city and county by deed dated December —, 1867, recorded January —, 1868, in liber of deeds, page —, to which reference is made for a more particular description; and whereas the said parties have contributed to said purchases in the following amounts; viz., Madam Zoe Granier, $227.17; T. B. Martin, four hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-five cents ($452.35); J. Don, two hundred and twenty-six dollars and seventeen cents ($226.17), gold coin of the United States.

"Whereas, for the purpose of greater convenience, the assignment of said judgment, and the conveyance of said property has been made to Madam Zoe Granier, one of the parties hereto.

"Now, therefore, we, the parties hereto, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of one dollar, heretofore paid by each of said parties to the others, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, hereby agree as follows, viz:—

"That the said judgment and property conveyed as aforesaid to Madam Zoe Granier is and shall be by her held in trust for the use and benefit of each and all the parties hereto in manner following:—

"That any and all the proceeds that shall be derived from the said judgment and property shall be applied as follows, and not otherwise:—

"1st. To the payment of each of the parties hereto of the amount advanced by them respectively for the purchase of said interest as aforesaid, and in gold coin; 2d, to the payment to Madam Zoe Granier, trustee herein, of the amount of the judgment and costs now held by her against said Silvey, in gold coin; 3d, to the payment to J. Don and T. B. Martin of the amounts of their respective judgments and costs held as aforesaid against said Silvey; said payments to be pro rata in proportion to the amounts of their respective judgments, and in gold coin; 4th, if any balance remains after the settlement of the foregoing demands, it shall be distributed equally among the parties hereto; each party shall pay his proportion of the expenses necessarily incurred by said Zoe Granier in prosecuting said interest so conveyed to her for the purpose of obtaining the money due each on their said judgments.

"San Francisco, January 11, 1868.

"ZOE GRANIER. [SEAL.]

"T. B. MARTIN. [SEAL.]

"JEAN DON. [SEAL.]

"Witness, J. GRANIER, Ch."

There can be no doubt that whatever interest passed to Madam Granier by the conveyance and assignment from Le Roy were received, and thereafter held by her in trust for her own benefit, and that of Don and Martin, in the proportions stated in the agreement. Among those interests was all the right, title, and interest of Silvey in the property in question. Silvey, as has been seen, was sole devisee under the will. On the death of the testatrix her title to the property vested in him, subject, however, to be divested by a sale of the property for the payment of the debts, etc., in the course of the administration of the estate. It so happened that there were debts proved against the estate of Adele Lefevre; and for the purpose of paying those debts, together with costs of administration, the Probate Court in which the estate was pending entered an order on the 14th of April, 1869, authorizing and directing the administrator of the estate to sell this property. At the probate sale Madam Granier became the successful bidder. The sale after two advance bids was finally confirmed for the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars to her, by the Probate Court, and on the 7th of September, 1862, there was executed to her by the administrator a deed to the property. Afterwards, to wit, on the 14th day of July, 1871, Madam Granier conveyed by deed, in consideration of the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars to the plaintiff in the present action, who had notice of the trust agreement, all of her interest in the property; and plaintiff has since been in possession, receiving the rental thereof. The decree of the court below is to the effect that the plaintiff is the absolute owner of the property as against Don and Martin, who set up their rights under the trust agreement.

The decree cannot be sustained. The plaintiff, having notice of the relation existing between Don and Martin, and Madam Granier has no greater rights than the latter would have. "It is a universal rule that if a man purchases property of a trustee with notice of the trust, he shall be charged with the same trust in respect to the property as the trustee from whom he purchased. And even if he pays a valuable consideration, with notice of the equitable rights of a third person, he shall hold the property subject to the equitable interests of such person." (Perry on Trusts, § 217.)

Madam Granier as the grantee (through Le Roy) of Silvey's interest held the testatrix's title to the property, subject, however, to the same being divested through a sale of the property duly made in the course of the administration of the estate. But the title Madam Granier thus held, she held in trust for herself, and Don and Martin, in the proportions they had contributed to the fund with which that title was acquired. Occupying that trust relation she could not, upon the most obvious principles of equity, purchase at the administrator's sale the interest of the deceased Lefevre, to the exclusion of her cestui que trust. The interest thus acquired by her must be held to have enured to their benefit, to the extent of their interest under the original agreement of trust, upon the payment of their proportionate share of the amount necessarily paid by the trustee in acquiring the interest of the deceased. Such would have been the equitable rights of Madam Granier, Don, and Martin, and such are the equitable rights of the plaintiff, Don, and the estate of Martin — Martin being now deceased.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the respective parties to amend their pleadings in such particulars as they may be advised.

ORDERS AFTER JUDGMENT — APPEAL — IDENTIFICATION OF PAPERS.— Certain orders made after final judgment affirmed because the papers contained in the transcript were not identified as the papers used on the hearing in the court below.

APPEAL from two orders of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for Appellants.

John A. Wright, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.— The appeal in this case is from two special orders made after final judgment taken by virtue of the third subdivision of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On such appeal, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the orders appealed from, and of the papers used on the hearing in the court below. (Code Civ. Proc. § 951.)

As the papers found in the transcript are not identified as having been used on the hearing of the court below, the orders appealed from must be affirmed. (Baker v. Snyder, 58 Cal. 617.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — STATEMENT — FINDINGS.— Where a motion is made for a new trial on the ground that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, the statement must specify the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient.

SURPRISE AND NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.— A motion for a new trial on the ground of surprise or newly discovered evidence must be supported by affidavit.

FINDINGS — MOTION TO AMEND AND MAKE ADDITIONAL.— It is not error to refuse to amend the findings or to make additional findings after a judgment has been entered and a motion for a new trial denied.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, from an order refusing a new trial, and from an order refusing to amend the findings or make additional findings.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

William H. Bate, Appellant in person.

B. S. Brooks, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.— The judgment and orders must be affirmed. The findings are sufficient to sustain the judgment and the statement on motion for new trial contains no sufficient specification of particulars wherein the findings are unsustained by the evidence. There is no affidavit in support of the alleged grounds of surprise and newly discovered evidence, which by statute is made essential to the granting of a motion for new trial on either of those grounds. And with respect to the plaintiff's motion to "amend and make additional findings," it is sufficient to say that this motion was made long after the entry of the judgment and the denial of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment and orders affirmed.

WILLIAM SHARON, RESPONDENT, v. MATTHEW NUNAN, APPELLANT.

REPLEVIN — MONEY — SEIZURE UNDER EXECUTION.—The action was replevin to recover money seized by the defendant as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco under an execution against one Little. The money was drawn by Little from the Bank of California on a check signed by one Dobinson in the name of the plaintiff, and at the time of the seizure it was sealed up in a canvas bag marked with a tag on which was written the name of Little, and deposited in one of the vaults of the Safe Deposit Company. Little was an agent or employee of the plaintiff, and the money was furnished to pay taxes due from the latter. Held, that the authority of Dobinson to sign the check was an immaterial matter, that the money belonged to the plaintiff, and that replevin was a proper remedy to recover it.

IN.—DEMAND.—No demand was necessary before commencing the action.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

C. S. Roe, for Appellant.

Lloyd, Newlands & Wood, for Respondent.

ROSS, J.—We see no merit in the appeal. Beyond question, the money sued for was the property of the plaintiff. It was in the possession of one Little, an employee of plaintiff, to be used by him in paying certain of plaintiff's taxes. The money was in gold and silver coins, sealed up in a canvas bag, marked with a tag, on which was written Little's name, and deposited in one of the vaults of the Safe Deposit Company, in the city and county of San Francisco. It was in this condition when it was seized by the defendant as the property of Little, under and by virtue of an execution against him. For the defendant, who is the appellant here, it is contended that replevin is not a proper remedy for the recovery of money thus situated. The authorities are clear that it is. (3 Blackst. Com. 151; Skidmore v. Taylor, 29 Cal. 619; Griffith v. Bogardus, 15 Cal. 410.)

Next it is said that demand on defendant for the money was necessary before plaintiff could maintain the action, and that there was no demand made. As no demand was necessary, we find it unnecessary to decide whether the demand proved was or was not a sufficient demand. (Boulware v. Craddock, 30 Cal. 190; Wellman v. English, 38 Cal. 583.)

We do not perceive the relevancy to the case before the court of the question of Dobinson's authority to draw the check in plaintiff's name, on which Little drew the money from the Bank of California. The bank did not question the authority, but paid the money. The money was the plaintiff's, and that was the important question, aside from those already disposed of.

Judgment and order affirmed.

D. ALBERT HILLER, RESPONDENT, v. CHARLES J. COLLINS ET AL., APPELLANTS.

INJUNCTION — MOTION TO DISSOLVE — REMEDY AT LAW.— Where a motion is made to dissolve an injunction on the ground that an adequate remedy exists at law, it is not enough that the facts stated in the complaint would be sufficient to sustain a criminal prosecution.

ID. — COMPLAINT — ANSWER — AFFIDAVITS — DISCRETION OF THE COURT.— The discretion exercised in refusing to dissolve an injunction will not be interfered with merely on the ground that some of the allegations of the complaint are on information and belief, a portion of these allegations not being denied by the answer, and the others supported by affidavits.

ID. — ANSWER AS AN AFFIDAVIT — RIGHT TO USE COUNTER-AFFIDAVITS.— Where an answer is used on the motion to dissolve, it is treated as an affidavit, and the plaintiff may use affidavits in opposition thereto.

ID. — AVERMENTS OF ANSWER ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.— It appearing from the complaint and affidavits that the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction, a refusal to dissolve it on averments in the answer made upon information and belief was not an abuse of discretion.

REMEDIES — CUMULATIVE OR ADDITIONAL.—The remedy given by section 8, article 12, of the Constitution is additional to and does not supersede other remedies existing when the Constitution was adopted.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, refusing to dissolve an injunction.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as a stockholder of the Equitable Tunnel and Mining Company, a corporation, to enjoin a sale of his stock under an assessment levied by the directors, and to declare certain shares of stock claimed by one of the defendants to be the property of the corporation, and to enjoin the sale thereof and their transfer on the books of the company. An injunction was granted in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The defendants filed an answer, and thereupon gave notice of a motion to dissolve the injunction on the pleadings. An amendment was subsequently made to the complaint, but it was filed on the hearing of the motion, and seems to have been used merely as an affidavit. Several affidavits were used by the plaintiff in opposing the motion. In the portion of the answer referred to in the opinion of the court as charging a fraudulent attempt by the plaintiff to acquire the property of the company, it was alleged in substance that the property had been sold under an execution against the company to one French, that the purchase was made by French for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that the money to make it was furnished by the latter through his wife; that the assessment was levied to obtain the means to redeem the property, that the company was destitute of money, and that the action was not prosecuted in good faith, but to prevent a redemption. The allegations as to the money for the purchase being furnished by the plaintiff, and his motive in bringing the action, were on information and belief. The additional facts involved in the questions decided sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Cowdery & McCutchen, for Appellants.

Wm. M. Pierson, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—Defendants moved the court below to dissolve an injunction. The motion was submitted upon the original complaint and amendment thereto, the answer, and certain affidavits filed and used by plaintiff. The motion was denied, and this appeal is by defendants from the order denying the motion.

Appellants claim: 1. If the averments in the complaint and amendment thereto are true, plaintiff has a complete remedy at law by prosecuting some of defendants for a criminal offense.

2. That the injunction ought to have been dissolved, because some of the allegations of the complaint are "upon information and belief."

3. That the equities of the complaint are denied by the answer.

It is also suggested that it appears from the allegations of the answer the process of the court is being abused by the plaintiff for the purpose of preventing the redemption by the corporation, of property sold under judgment against the corporation, at a sale at which plaintiff became the real purchaser, in the name of another, plaintiff thus intending to defraud the corporation of such property.

1. A criminal prosecution, in which the people would be plaintiff, would not be subject to the control of present plaintiff, nor would its success give plaintiff the relief which he seeks, or its equivalent.

2. Some of the averments of the complaint, "upon information and belief," are not denied by the answer; others were sustained by positive affidavits at the hearing. Assuming the allegations which are not denied by the answer, those which are themselves positive, and those sustained by positive averments in affidavits to be true, we cannot say the court below abused its discretion in refusing to dissolve the injunction.

3. All the equities of the complaint are not denied by the answer. With reference to such of them as are denied by the answer, it seems to be the established practice in this State to permit the use by plaintiff of affidavits against the sworn answer, which, on the application to dissolve, is treated as an affidavit. (Falkinburg v. Lucy, 35 Cal. 52; Hicks v. Comp-ton, 18 Cal. 206.)

of the corporation by plaintiff, "defendants are informed and believe that the money paid to purchase the said property at said sheriff's sale was furnished by plaintiff, through his wife, and said plaintiff caused the said purchase to be made," is met by the affidavit of plaintiff. In this he positively swears: "It is not true that I caused J. W. French (the person named in the answer as purchaser) to purchase the property of the defendant corporation at sheriff's sale. It is not true that the money paid to purchase the same was furnished by me through my wife. I have no interest whatever in said purchase." If it should be admitted that the resort to the injunction was made by plaintiff with intent to secure title to the property of the corporation—the complaint and affidavits showing plaintiff is entitled to the injunction—is material, and that plaintiff, pending the injunction suit could acquire title which could be asserted adversely to the corporation, we cannot say that the court below would have abused its discretion in refusing to dissolve upon the averment of the answer, "on information and belief," and the positive oath of plaintiff in his affidavit.

The facts alleged in the pleadings and affidavits are complicated, and although some of the facts stated by plaintiff are denied by defendants, yet we cannot say the refusal to dissolve the injunction under the circumstances appearing in the case was an abuse of discretion. (Coolot v. C. P. R. Co. 52 Cal. 67; Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 534; White v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 406; De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 167; McCreery v. Brown, 42 Cal. 457.)

It is to be distinctly understood that neither the order of the court below denying the motion, nor the affirmance of that order by this court, has any controlling influence upon the decree which may be entered in the cause. If the action has not already been tried, the judgment of the court below must, of course, be based upon the evidence which shall be taken at the trial. Order affirmed.

A petition was filed asking that the cause be heard in Bank, and on the 6th of April, 1883, the following opinion was delivered thereon:—

PER CURIAM.—The rehearing in this case is denied.

It is stated in the petition that the court (Department One) did not pass on a point made on the argument.

The appeal in this case is prosecuted from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction, and the point relied on is this: Admitting that respondent had been injured by the acts of the officers of the corporation, he could not maintain this action, because he has his remedy by civil action under section 3, article 12, of the Constitution. The section of the Constitution referred to only affords an additional remedy, without taking away any that existed when the Constitution became the law of the land. When such additional remedy is given, and the old one is not taken away, it is common law and common learning that the old one still continues. We see nothing in the point urged which affects the correctness of the conclusion reached by Department One.

JAMES W. HULME AND JAMES H. WALLACE; PETITIONERS, v. THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, AND CHARLES HALSEY, JUDGE, ETC., RESPONDENTS.

CERTIORARI — JURISDICTION — INSOLVENCY — ESTOPPEL.—The petitioner Hulme as receiver of the estate of an insolvent debtor took into his possession certain property then in the possession of Wise & Denigen, claiming it as a part of the estate of the insolvent. Wise & Denigen consented, and it was ordered that the property might remain in the possession of the receiver, specially reserving all rights. Subsequently the court ordered the property sold because of a perishable nature. Upon an order directed to the receiver to show cause why the property should not be restored, the court ordered that the property or its proceeds be returned and delivered to Wise & Denigen. Petitioners prayed for a writ of review alleging that the court exceeded its jurisdiction. Held, (1) that the court had jurisdiction to order its restoration: (2) that the consent of Wise & Denigen did not estop them from asserting their rights as they were specially reserved when consent was given.

Eyre & Frank, for Petitioners, cited In re Marter, 11 Nat. Bky. Reg. 185; Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall. 419; Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall. 551; Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 525; Hartman v. Olvera, 51 Cal. 503; Larrabee v. Selby, 52 Cal. 508.

A. D. Splivalo, for Respondents, cited High on Receivers, §§ 139, 149, 192; Riggs v. Whitney, 15 Abb. Pr. 388; Brooks v. Greathed, 1 Jacob & W. 176; Skinner v. Maxwell, 68 N. C. 400; Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall. 419; Marshall v. Knoz, 16 Wall. 551.

PER CURIAM.—Even if, without previous order of court, but with the consent of the parties defendant to the litigation, a receiver may take possession of property in their hands, such consent cannot be appealed to as authorizing him to take property out of the possession of a third person claiming title thereto.

The sworn petition of Wise for a return of the property alleged that he and his partners were owners of and had actual possession of the personal property described therein when the same was taken out of their possession without right by the receiver Wallace. In his counter-affidavit Wallace denied that Wise or his partner ever had possession of the property, and averred the same was in possession of the insolvent, and was taken from him. Upon the cross-affidavits the Superior Court ordered that the receiver forthwith return and deliver to Wise & Denigen the property, describing it.

The court had jurisdiction to order its restoration. If the receiver without previous order of the court took the property out of Wise's adverse possession, under such circumstances as that the court would have denied an application of the receiver (made prior to the actual taking) for leave to take possession, the court was certainly authorized to direct a return of the property.

The rights of the parties were in no way affected by the consent order of August 13th. That order, by its express terms, reserved all the rights of Wise, and there is no principle of estoppel which could prevent him from subsequently asserting them.

Proceeding dismissed.

A. L. THIELE, APPELLANT, v. CAROLINE KOSTER, EXECUTRIX OF THE WILL OF ALBERT KOSTER, DECEASED,
RESPONDENT.

NEW TRIAL — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.— Where the evidence is substantially conflicting, an order refusing a new trial will not be reversed for insufficiency in the evidence.

TRIAL — ERROR — EXCEPTION — REVIEW ON APPEAL.— A ruling of the court at the trial, to which no exception is taken, cannot be reviewed on appeal.

ID.—IRREGULARITIES AS GROUNDS FOR A NEW TRIAL.— The action was tried by the court without a jury. The decision was against the plaintiff, who moved for a new trial, and relied in part upon irregularities in the proceedings of the court. The irregularities consisted in certain remarks made by the judge during the progress of the trial in regard to the nature and effect of the evidence. Held, that the irregularities were not such as to prevent the plaintiff from having a fair trial.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought on a promissory note. The answer denied the execution of the note, and alleged a want of consideration. The additional facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

A. Campbell, Sr., and J. F. Cowdery, for Appellant.

Jarboe & Harrison, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— The appellant claims that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial upon two grounds: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and (2) irregularity in the proceedings of the court by which he was prevented from having a fair trial.

As to the first, it is sufficient to say that in our opinion there is a substantial conflict of evidence upon the question of the execution of the note by the alleged maker. Such being the case, it matters not whether the evidence apparently preponderates on the one side or the other. A substantial conflict is sufficient to preclude a review of the facts by this court.

To support the second ground the appellant's counsel relies upon the following facts: At the close of the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness, Lackman, the court remarked that there was some doubt in his mind whether the witness saw the alleged maker of the note sign it, and added "he said he did not. I will recall the witness." Thereupon defendant's counsel objected to the witness being recalled to prove what had been pointed out to him. The court sustained the objection, but the ruling is not excepted to. It appears by the record that the witness did testify that he saw the alleged maker of the note sign it, and that the court was in error when it said that the witness had said that he did not see it signed.

If an exception had been taken to the ruling of the court, the question whether the court erred in so ruling would be fairly before us. In the absence of an exception we do not think that it is.

While the defendant's witness Koster was undergoing cross-examination, the plaintiff's attorney asked her this question: "Do you see any difference between that signature and your father's?" She answered that "the great difference that even goes down to the bottom of the 'a.'" Thereupon the court remarked: "The 'a' is sharper than all the other 'a's.' The other 'a's' are rounded, every one of them." Plaintiff's attorney here handed up an undisputed signature of the alleged maker of the note, and said: "There is one 'a,'" but the court interrupted him and said: "That ain't anything like it in any respect."

We are unable to perceive that the plaintiff was prevented from having a fair trial by either of the alleged irregularities.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Hearing in Bank denied.

E. S. NEWELL ET AL., APPELLANTS, v. THOMAS DESMOND, SHERIFF OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, RESPONDENT.

NEW TRIAL — STATEMENT — SPECIFICATIONS.— Under section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a specification of insufficiency in the evidence is only required to be full enough to enable the court to understand the question presented.

IN.—DISCRETION OF THE COURT.—An order granting a new trial will not be reversed unless it appear that the discretion of the court has been abused.

PARTNERSHIP — FICTITIOUS NAME — SALE OF THE INTEREST OF ONE PARTNER — STATUTE OF FRAUDS.—Where one of two partners sells to a third person his interest in a stock of goods belonging to the partnership, there must be an immediate delivery and continued change of possession as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code, or the sale will be void as to creditors, and it is immaterial that the business of the partnership is conducted under a fictitious name.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco granting a new trial.

The action was replevin to recover certain goods and chattels alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs as partners doing business under the fictitious name of H. Keller & Co. The goods were seized by the defendant under an execution against one Cadman, through whom the plaintiffs derived their title. The business was established by Cadman, who subsequently, sold an interest to Max H. Fay, one of the plaintiffs, and thereafter the business was carried on by them as partners, until Cadman sold or pretended to sell his remaining interest to the plaintiff Newell. The fictitious name above mentioned was used from the beginning, and it appeared that Cadman continued to act in the conduct and management of the business until the seizure by the sheriff. There was also evidence showing that after the sale to Newell, Cadman acted merely as the agent of the plaintiffs. The court found in favor of the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment accordingly, but on motion of the defendant a new trial was granted. The motion was heard on a statement of the case, and the only specifications relating to the insufficiency of the evidence were that the court erred in failing to find certain facts shown by the evidence as to the fraudulent character of the sales by Cadman, and the want of any delivery or change of possession.

George W. Tyler, for Appellants.

1. Upon this transcript neither the court below nor this court can legally grant a new trial upon the ground that the findings or decision is not sustained by the evidence.

Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "When the notice of the motion (for a new trial) designates as the ground of the motion the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient."

In the case of Brumagin v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24, this court after the most elaborate argument construed this language. (See pages 33 and 34.)

That case was cited with approval in the case of Harding v. Vandewater, 40 Cal. 82, 83, and the authority of that decision has never been questioned. (See also Eddelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 277; Strang v. Ryan, 46 Cal. 33; Doherty v. Enterprise M. Co. 50 Cal. 187; Morris v. De Celis, 51 Cal. 55.)

The statement contains only specifications of the particulars in which it is claimed the court erred on the trial. This court has decided that this cannot be considered as "specifications of the particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient." (Smith v. Christian, 47 Cal. 18; see also Hill v. Weisler, 49 Cal. 146; Coleman v. Gilmore, 49 Cal. 340; Beans v. Emanuelli, 36 Cal. 117; Kusel v. Sharkey, 46 Cal. 3; Reamer v. Nesmith, 34 Cal. 624; Pralus v. Pacific M. Co. 85 Cal. 30; Butterfield v. C. P. E. R. Co. 37 Cal. 381.)

It seems, therefore, that upon the first point the order of the court below should be reversed, but in case the court should think differently, we say:—

2. The rule in regard to delivery and change of possession does not apply to a case of this kind, where business is carried on under a fictitious name, and the names of the real owners are never used or known in the business.

It has been truly said that "the reason of the law is the soul of the law," and it is a maxim that "when the reason of a rule ceases the rule itself ceases."

The reason of the rule established by section 3440 of the Civil Code is this: "To prevent a person from having a fictitious credit." The object of the rule is "to give evidence to the world of the claims of the new owner." (53 Cal. 626.)

The sole object of establishing the rule was to protect the public from persons getting credit upon property in their possession which did not in fact belong to them.

Now, in this case, no credit was given to any particular person, but to the firm of "H. Keller & Co."

Cadman did not hold out any false colors to the public. No one, apparently, gave the firm any credit on account of Cadman.

No one could possibly be deceived, and therefore the rule does not apply.

-J. P. Dameron, and J. W. Carter, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—First. The assignment of errors in the statement on motion for new trial contained a specification of the particulars in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient, full enough to enable the court to understand the question presented, and that is the substantial object of the statute. There is a sufficient compliance with section 659, Code of Civil Procedure.

Second. That the business had been conducted by Fay and Cadman under the old name of Keller & Co. is no reason why Cadman when he pretended to sell his interest to the plaintiff Newell should not have complied with the requirements of section 3440 of the Civil Code.

The court, upon the evidence, saw sufficient reason for granting a new trial, and therefore made the order appealed from. According to the well-settled rule of this court such an order will not be interfered with unless the court below abused its discretion in making it. There is not the least evidence that there was such abuse of discretion, and the order should be, and is, affirmed.

EVIDENCE — STREET ASSESSMENT — FRAUD.— Where a contract to construct a sewer provides that the work shall be done in a good and workmanlike manner, setting out in detail the character of the materials to be used, and further provides that the work shall be done to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, or his deputy, in an action to recover an assessment for the work, the satisfaction of the superintendent or his deputy — where fraud is alleged — is not controlling as to whether the work was properly done and suitable materials furnished respecting the matters specially required by the contract.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. C. Bates, and J. M. Wood, for Appellant.

Taylor, and Haight, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.— This is an action to recover an assessment for constructing a sewer in the city and county of San Francisco. The defense was that the sewer was not constructed in accordance with the contract and specifications. The court found that the contract required the work to be done in a good and workmanlike manner, the bricks to be sound and hard-burned, one barrel of cement to be used to each barrel of sand, and no lime to be used; that at least seven per centum of the bricks used were not sound hard-burned bricks, but were of quality inferior thereto, and were used with intent to cheat and defraud the defendants; that the plaintiff used from ten to fifteen per centum more sand than the specifications called for.

Although the evidence is conflicting, yet there is sufficient to sustain the findings.

The contract also provided that the work should be done to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets or his deputy. The plaintiff claims that the satisfaction of the superintendent or his deputy must be controlling as to whether the work was properly done and suitable materials furnished. That may be so as to details not specially set forth in the contract and specifications; but as to matters thus specially set forth, the contract and its requirements must be held to prevail.

It may also be true that the satisfaction of the superintendent or his deputy would be prima facie evidence of the proper performance of the contract, nothing to the contrary appearing; but fraud on the part of the plaintiff was set up as a defense, and on that issue the court found very clearly against him. Looking at the evidence before us, we will not disturb the action of the court below.

We see no error; the order is therefore affirmed.

DANIEL SULLIVAN, PETITIONER, v. JAMES W. SHANKLIN, SURVEYOR-GENERAL AND EX-OFFICIO REGISTER OF THE STATE LAND OFFICE, RESPONDENT.

MANDAMUS — PUBLIC LAND — PURCHASE FROM THE STATE — FAILURE OF TITLE — RIGHT OF THE PURCHASER TO RELIEF.— Mandamus will not lie to compel the register of the State land office to issue a certificate under section 3571 of the Political Code to a purchaser of land from the State, who has paid the purchase money and received a patent, although the land may not have been the property of the State, such purchaser having acquired the title of the United States to the land by availing himself of the provisions of the Act of Congress of the 1st of March, 1877, entitled "an act relating to indemnity school selections in California."

APPLICATION for a writ of mandamus. The facts are stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE McKEE.

J. C. Bates, for Petitioner.

A. L. Hart, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

McKEN, J.—This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as register of the State land office, to issue to plaintiff a certificate under section 3571 of the Political Code.

The facts as they appear upon the petition are, that in the year 1863 the State of California selected a tract of land known and described as the southeast quarter of section eleven, township four north, range one east, Mount Diablo meridian. This land was selected as a portion of the public lands of the United States, to which the State was entitled in satisfaction of certain congressional grants which had been made to her. After selection the State sold and transferred the land, by a certificate of purchase issued under her laws, to the assignor of the petitioner. Subsequently the land was listed to the State by the secretary of the interior of the United States, and upon payment to the State of the purchase money for the land and surrender of the certificate of purchase, the State issued a patent for the land to the petitioner.

Afterwards, on March 10, 1881, the petitioner applied to the United States register, at San Francisco, to purchase the same land from the United States under the provisions of an act of Congress, entitled "an act relating to indemnity selections in the State of California," approved March 1, 1877, and in support of his application made proof to the satisfaction of the register that he was the owner and holder of the State patent to the land, and an innocent purchaser of the same for a valuable consideration, etc. Upon making that proof the commissioner of the general land office granted his application, allowed him to purchase the land from the United States, canceled the listing of the State, and upon payment of the purchase money under the act of Congress issued to him a receipt which entitles him to a United States patent for the land. Yet, although the undisputed owner of the land by titles thus acquired from the United States and the State, the petitioner insists that the State patent "was illegally and improperly issued, and was, and has always been, null and void, for the reason that the land sold was, and is, not the property of the State of California."

Therefore the petitioner, in legal effect, asks that the contract between him and the State be rescinded, and that the purchase money paid to the State be refunded, and as preliminary to that end that the register be compelled to issue to him a certificate under section 3571 of the Political Code.

A purchaser of land from the State is not entitled at law or in equity to recover back the purchase money, unless the State, as an act of grace, consents to it. Such an act is said to be contained in sections 3571 and 3572, Political Code. The first provides "that if any land sold is not the property of the State, the holder of the certificate of purchase or patent may receive in exchange therefor from the register a certificate showing the amount paid and the class of land upon which the payment was made." And the second, for payment of the amount specified in the certificate out of the swamp and overflowed land fund, if the land sold was of that class of land, and if it was not, then out of the fund into which the purchase money was paid.

It is as a holder of the State patent for the land in dispute that the petitioner claims to be entitled to the certificate demanded. But he is not entitled to it unless the land did not belong to the State; for the State register has no authority to issue the certificate unless the land sold was of that character. Upon the ascertainment and determination of that question the demand of the petitioner is founded, and upon it the performance of duty imposed by the law upon the register is made to depend. The mere assertion of the petitioner's demand is not proof of the fact that the land did not belong to the State, nor is it as a fact admitted by the nature of the demand itself, nor does it, self-evidently or otherwise, arise out of the admitted circumstances of the transaction of purchase from the State. For, as admitted owner and holder of the patent from the State for land admitted to have been listed to the State by the authorities of the United States, the petitioner has acquired, under the Act of Congress of July 23, 1866, whatever title passed to the State by that "listing" (Mastick v. Cave, 52 Cal. 67), and there is no question, if the land was of the character contemplated by the act of Congress, that the title of the State under the grants to her, attached to the land, for listing, or the act of certifying the land to the State, was the mode established by congressional enactment for completing the title of the State to such lands as she had selected in part satisfaction of her congressional grants.

But it is contended that the "listing" of this land did not have the effect of transferring or rendering perfect the title of the State to it, because the land was not of the character contemplated by the act of Congress, and intended to be granted, and that the listing and the patent founded upon it are void.

In support of this contention reference is made to Rosencrans v. Douglas, 52 Cal. 215. But that case involved a controversy between private parties about a tract of land, which each of them claimed under acts of Congress; and it became necessary for the court to interpret the acts for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the right; and as preliminary thereto it was held that the defendant in the case, as a qualified pre-emptor, who had filed his application to purchase the land under the pre-emption laws, and had offered to prove up his claim and tendered the purchase money, was in such privity with the title of the United States as enabled him to show that the "listing" of the land to the State, through which the plaintiff claimed title, was void, because the land was not of the class of land which, under the acts of Congress, the land department of the United States was authorized to list to the State.

Whatever may be said as to the law of that case, it is wholly inapplicable to the demand of the petitioner; for there is no pending contest between him and any other person in which his right to the land is involved. No one questions the title which he has obtained from the State. To him, therefore, as patentee of the State, the decision of the land department by which the land was "listed" to the State is conclusive (Wilkinson v. Merrill, 52 Cal. 424; S. C. 56 Cal. 559; Mace v. Merrill, 56 Cal. 554); and, inferentially at least, upon the facts stated in his petition, the title passed from the United States through the medium of the State to him when he received his patent, and its validity or invalidity has never been determined. Who has determined it? The legislature has not, nor has any judicial tribunal; and it cannot be tried by mandamus. Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488.) No officer of the State has authority to cancel a patent issued by the State for a tract of land, and refund the purchase money, upon the mere assertion by the patentee that the State had no title to the land when she sold and conveyed it. The invalidity of the title must be admitted by the State, or by some agency of her appointment, or be judicially determined before the purchase money can be refunded. Mandamus is not the remedy.

As we have repeatedly held, the office of a writ of mandate is to compel the performance of a purely ministerial duty. A ministerial duty is one in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. "It is," says Chief Justice Chase, "a simple, definite duty, arising under circumstances admitted or proved to exist, and imposed by law." (State of Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475.) No such duty arises out of the circumstances stated in petition, nor is any such imposed by the section of the Code under which the demand in this case was made; and it follows that the application must be denied.

Boss, J., concurring specially.—I agree that the petitioner in this case is not entitled to the writ sought. His purpose, as evidenced by the record, is to recover back from the State the money paid by him for certain land for which the State issued to him its patent, he claiming that the State had no title to convey. But it also appears that petitioner has availed himself of the benefits of the Act of Congress of March 1, 1877, entitled "an act relating to indemnity school selections in California." By that act it is provided that when land has been selected and sold by the State, but to which the State has no title, and such land is held by an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, such person shall be allowed to prove such facts before the proper land officer, and shall be permitted to purchase the land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, not to exceed three hundred and twenty acres for any one person. Pursuant to the provisions of this act the petitioner made application to purchase the land from the United States, and according to his petition has made proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver that he is the owner and holder of the State patent to the land, and that he is an innocent purchaser from the State for a valuable consideration. In order, therefore, to acquire the land from the general government at a special rate, and as a preferred purchaser, he represented to that government that he had already paid the State for it. For that purpose he relied upon the fact that the State had his money, and having thus secured the title, he now seeks by means of mandamus to recover back the very money on the faith and strength of which he secured the advantage. To my mind this does not appear just, and mandamus ought not to be awarded to enforce an inequitable demand. (Wood on Mandamus, p. 17, and authorities there cited.) So far as the equities of the case are concerned, the petitioner would be in an altogether different position could he say here, in effect: The State purported to sell me a piece of land, for which it received my money and gave me its patent. The State had no title, and I got nothing by the pretended sale and conveyance, and am therefore entitled to a return of my money. But this, as shown above, is by no means petitioner's position.

TIERY WRIGHT, APPELLANT, v. B. H. ROSEBERRY
ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

EJECTMENT—SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS—CERTIFICATION BY COMMISSIONER OF GENERAL LAND OFFICE.—The title to swamp and overflowed lands never vests in the State until the commissioner of the general land office certifies them over to the State as swamp and overflowed; and ejectment by one claiming title to such lands acquired from the State cannot be maintained against persons in possession under United States patents, without showing such certification.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Yolo County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was ejectment. The remaining facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

W. B. Treadwell, and C. P. Sprague, for Appellants.

Belcher & Belcher, and J. C. Ball, for Respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—The defendants are in possession of the demanded premises, and hold United States patents for the same. But it is claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that before defendants acquired any right or title to said land the title to it had passed out of the United States, and become vested in the State of California. The grounds of this claim as stated by one of appellant's counsel are as follows: "That on July 1, 1862, he (plaintiff) acquired the title of the State to the land in controversy; that the State had, prior to July 23, 1866, selected this land as swamp land, and had disposed of the same to purchasers in good faith under her laws; that due notice had been given to the United States land department of this selection; that within the time required by the Act of Congress of March 12, 1860, and before 1866, the State had segregated these lands as swamp; and that, under due and regular proceedings had under the fourth section of the Act of 1866, this segregation was approved by the United States land department, and the tracts here claimed designated swamp on the United States plat of the township."

The clause, of the fourth section of the Act of 1866, to which reference is made reads as follows:—

"That in all cases where township surveys have been made or shall hereafter be made under authority of the United States, and the plats thereof approved, it shall be the duty of the commissioner of the general land office to certify over to the State of California as swamp and overflowed all the lands represented as such, upon such approved plats, within one year from the passage of this act, or within one year from the return and approval of such township plats.

"The commissioner shall direct the United States surveyor-general for the State of California to examine the segregation maps and surveys of the swamp and overflowed lands made by said State; and where he shall find them to conform to the system of surveys adopted by the United States, he shall construct and approve township plats accordingly, and forward to the general land office for approval."

It is not claimed that "the commissioner of the general land office has ever certified over to the State of California as swamp and overflowed," any of the land in controversy. If he had it would be equivalent to a patent, and an action of ejectment might be maintained upon it against any one in possession under a subsequently acquired title. As it is the defendants are in possession, claiming title under United States patents, which purport to convey the entire premises. And the question is, can the plaintiff maintain this action upon the title which he has acquired from the State without showing that the land has been certified over to the State as swamp and overflowed? Counsel for appellant insist that although said land has never been certified over to the State according to the requirement of said act of Congress, the title to said land, nevertheless, became vested in the State. If that be so, the clause which requires the commissioner to certify over to the State as swamp and overflowed all the lands represented as such upon such approved plats, within one year from the passage of said act, or within one year from the return and approval of such township plats, is superfluous. The Act of September 28, 1850, contains a clause somewhat similar to this, and the construction which was given to it by the Supreme Court of the United States in French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 169, seems to us to militate against the position which appellant's counsel seek to maintain in this case. That act made it the duty of the secretary of the interior, as soon as practicable after its passage, to make out an accurate list and plats of the land described in said act, and to transmit the same to the governor of the State, and at his request to cause a patent to issue to it, and that thereupon the fee simple to said lands should vest in the State. In French v. Fyan, supra, the court held that the issuance of a patent to the State concluded the question of the character of the land, and that parol evidence to prove that it was not swamp and overflowed was, in an action at law, inadmissible. That the law devolved upon the secretary "the duty, and conferred on him the power of determining what lands were of the description granted by that act, and made his office the tribunal whose decision on that subject was controlling."

In Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, the same court said, "that when the law has confided to a special tribunal the authority to hear and determine certain matters arising in the course of its duties, the decision of that tribunal within the scope of its authority is conclusive upon all others."

Section 4 of the Act of July 28, 1866, makes it the duty of the commissioner in certain specified cases to certify lands over to the State. And it seems to be left to him to decide in each case whether or not it is a proper one for the exercise of that power. The most that can be claimed on behalf of appellant is that the commissioner has not performed his duty in this case. The law makes it the duty of the commissioner to certify over such lands within a specified period, but does not provide that in the event of his failing to do so the title to such lands shall vest in the State. And we are unable to find anything in said section four which impresses us as indicating that such was the intention of Congress.

But it is claimed on behalf of appellant that said section four must be read in connection with section one of the same act, which confirms to the State lands selected by her in part satisfaction of any grant, and under her laws disposed of to purchasers in good faith.

In Sutton v. Fassett, 51 Cal. 12, the court said: "The first section of that act does not relate to lands which had been segregated by the State as swamp and overflowed lands. The only section which purports to grant to the State—or in other words to confirm such segregation—is the fourth section." And that appears to us to be a reasonable construction of the language of said first section. It only applies to selections made of any portion of the public domain "in part satisfaction of any grant made to said State by any act of Congress." This would seem to have reference to grants of specific quantities, and not to a grant of an indefinite quantity. There would be no propriety in saying that the State accepted any number of acres of swamp land in part satisfaction of the grant of all the swamp land in the State. But in the cases of grants for school and improvement purposes where the quantities are limited and defined, deductions could be made, and it is expressly provided in said first section "that the State of California shall not receive under this act a greater quantity of land for school or improvement purposes than she is entitled to by law."

We therefore conclude that the title to the demanded premises has never vested in the State, and that the State could not convey a title to the appellant upon which he could maintain an action of ejectment against persons in possession of said premises under patents from the United States.

On the former appeal a remittitur issued out of this court containing the following order and directions:—

“It appearing that the court below has failed to find upon material issues made by the pleadings, to wit: Whether or not the plaintiff is the owner, or entitled to the possession of the north half of the northeast quarter of section thirty-six, the southeast quarter of section twenty-five, and the east half of the southeast quarter of section twenty-four of the lands in suit.

“Whereupon it is now considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court here that the judgment of the District Court of the sixth judicial district, in and for the county of Yolo, in the above-entitled cause be, and the same is hereby reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to find upon the foregoing issues, from the evidence already taken, and such further evidence as may be adduced by the respective parties, and thereupon to render judgment upon the whole case. The respective appellants in said actions severally to recover costs on the appeal.”

The court did find “that at the time of the commencement of this suit the plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession of the south half of the northeast quarter of section thirty-six, in suit, which was unlawfully withheld from him by defendant Roseberry; and of the east half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-five (containing eighty acres), which was withheld by defendant Simmons; and of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section twenty-four, which was withheld from him by defendant Powell; and that plaintiff is damaged by defendant Roseberry in the sum of $150, by defendant Simmons in the sum of $150, and by defendant Powell in the sum of $75.”

In addition to the lands described in this finding the plaintiff in his complaint alleged that he was the owner of the lands described in the remittitur. On the last trial the court set aside its former findings, and found that the plaintiff was not and never had been the owner, or entitled to the possession of all or any part of the lands described in the complaint, and entered judgment in favor of the defendants. In doing so appellant's counsel insist that the court did not follow the directions of this court, which were in effect that the court below should find, in addition to what it had already found, whether the plaintiff was the owner, or entitled to the possession of the lands described in said remittitur. This might be so, if this court had not reversed the judgment of the court below, and directed it to render a judgment upon the whole case. We think that the order and directions of this court, taken as a whole, amount to a reversal of the former judgment, and an order for a new trial.

There were some exceptions taken to the rulings of the court during the trial, but we are unable to discover any error for which the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE EX REL. JOSEPH FLINT, APPELLANT, v. C. C. HARRINGTON, RESPONDENT.

BOARD OF PUBLIC OFFICERS — MAJORITY OF QUORUM MAY ACT.—The majority of a quorum of a board of supervisors, a quorum being present, can perform any act which a majority of the board could perform if all were present.

OFFICE — REMOVAL — VACANCY — PRACTICING PHYSICIAN YUBA COUNTY HOSPITAL.—The office of "practicing physician of the Yuba County Hospital" is a county office, and a vacancy therein cannot be filled by the board of supervisors except upon petition signed by at least thirty qualified electors.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Yuba County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

A. L. Hart, Attorney-General, and J. H. Craddock, for Appellant.

The case shows that only two of the five members composing the board of supervisors concurred in the order of removal. This was clearly insufficient. That a minority of a board of supervisors, even though such minority be a majority of a quorum, can under any circumstances enact a valid order is a proposition, the public importance of which outreaches the necessities of the case at bar. Even in its broadest aspect it is believed to be not only without the support of legal principle, but in contravention of the positive requirements of section 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this State. "Words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons are construed as giving such authority to a majority of them, unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority." Here the authority is given to the board of supervisors, consisting of five members, without provision in the act giving such authority that any number less than the whole may exercise the authority given, and it is submitted that language will have lost its most useful function when the words, "construed as giving authority to a majority of them," are held, as was done by the trial court, to mean a minority of them, when such minority constitute a majority of a quorum.

The board was exercising judicial functions. Judge Redfield on this subject observes: "The proper distinction upon the subject seems to be that when the matter is of public concern, or of an executive or ministerial character, the act of a majority of the board will suffice, although the others are not consulted. But where the function is judicial, involving the determination of some definite question, the whole body must be assembled and act together." (1 Redf. on Rail., p. 84, § 6; Moore v. Ewing, 1 Coxe, 144, and cases cited; King v. Wykes, Andrew, 239; Billings v. Prinn & Delabere, 2 Black, 1017; People v. Coghill, 47 Cal. 361; Downing v. Rugar, 21 Wend. 178; Lee v. Parry, 4 Denio, 125; Keeler v. Frost, 22 Barb. 400; Horton v. Garrison, 23 Barb. 176; Stewart v. Wallis, 30 Barb. 344; Crocker v. Crane, 21 Wend. 211; Talcott v. Blanding, 54 Cal. 290.)

The appointment of the respondent was invalid because unauthorized by law. The reasoning of the trial court, which deduces the power to fill a vacancy from the power to appoint for a full term because the latter is the greater, is a clear instance of non sequitur. True, where there is no term fixed by law, the power of removal being incidental to the power of appointment, they may both be exercised at any time. There being no term, there can be no vacancy of the term to be filled. But when the term is fixed by law, and the mode and manner of filling it are prescribed, the mode and manner are the measure of the exercise of the power, and must be followed. Filling a vacancy is a distinct and separate function, in no way deducible from the former, but the subject-matter of distinct statutory provision, and most frequently exercised by a different tribunal. This power, if it existed in the board at all in the case at bar, existed by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 19 of section 4046 of the Political Code, enumerating the general permanent powers of the board. And the manner of its exercise is prescribed by section 4066.

B. W. Howser, W. G. Murphy, and E. A. Davis, for Respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—At the time of the alleged removal of the relator from the office of “practicing physician of the Yuba County Hospital,” the board of supervisors of that county consisted of five members, two of whom had been prohibited by an order of the Superior Court from participating in the proceedings, which it is claimed on behalf of respondent resulted in the removal of the relator from said office.

The three members of said board who had not been prohibited from proceeding in said matter heard evidence upon the charges laid before said board against the relator, and finally, by a vote of two to one, declared said office vacant.

Appellant’s counsel insist that even if said board had the power to declare said office vacant, a majority of a bare quorum of said board had no such power. But Dillon, in his work on “Municipal Corporations,” says that if a board of village trustees consists of five members, and “three only were present, they would constitute a quorum,” and “the votes of two, being a majority of the quorum, would be valid; certainly so where the three are all competent to act.” (1 Dillon on Corporations, 3d ed., 279.)

In Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, Dillon, J., said:—

“Three constituted a quorum. So far all is clear. Advancing in the argument, the first proposition I lay down is, that a majority of the quorum, all being present, have the power to act, and to decide any question upon which they can act. This proposition is clear upon the authorities. Thus in Rex v. Monday, Cowp. 538, Lord Mansfield, C. J., says: ‘When the assembly are duly met, I take it to be clear law that the corporate act may be done by a majority of those who have once regularly constituted the meeting.’ To the same effect, 2 Kent’s Com. 293: ‘A majority of the quorum may decide.’ (A. & A. on Corp. § 501; Cahill v. Kalamazoo Insurance Co. 2 Doug. (Mich.) 124; Sargent v. Webster, 13 Met. 497; In re Insurance Co. 22 Wend. 591; Ex parte Wilcocks, 7 Cowen, 402; Ex parte Wilcocks, 7 Cowen, 527, note a.)”

We are not aware of any case in which the contrary has been held, and must regard the law as well settled that in a case like this the action of a quorum is the action of the board, and that a majority of the quorum present could do any act which a majority of the board if present might do.

We are therefore of the opinion that by the removal of the relator from the office a vacancy was created in it which the board of supervisors was authorized to fill in the manner prescribed in sections 4046 and 4066 of the Political Code, and not otherwise. The former section confers upon the board the power “to fill by appointment all vacancies that may occur in county or township offices, except those of county judge and supervisors”; and the latter provides that “no appointment to fill a vacancy in office must be made by the board except upon petition, signed by at least thirty qualified electors of the county, if for a county office.” The law which authorizes the appointment of a practicing physician for said Yuba County Hospital fixes the term for which he shall be appointed, provides for his salary, and prescribes his duties. That, certainly, is sufficient to create an office, which Bouvier defines to be “a right to exercise a public function or employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it.” And if an office, it is undoubtedly a county office.

As the sections of the Political Code to which we referred provide how all vacancies in county offices, with two exceptions, must be filled, and as this office is not within the exceptions, we think, in the absence of any provision in the statute which creates this office for filling a vacancy in it, that it cannot be filled "except upon petition signed by at least thirty qualified electors."

Ordered, that so much of the judgment appealed from as adjudges "that the plaintiffs take nothing in this action," and "that the defendant C. C. Harrington is not a usurper of said office of practicing physician of the Yuba County Hospital, that he is entitled to the same," and that he recover costs herein, is reversed; and that so much of said judgment as adjudges "that said Joseph Flint is not entitled to said office of practicing physician of the Yuba County Hospital" is affirmed.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, APPELLANT, v. A. R. SHACKELFORD, RESPONDENT.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES—EJECTMENT.—Section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1878 is not retroactive; and where a defendant in ejectment shows that his adverse claim and occupancy began three years prior to the amendment of that section, and continued until the commencement of the action, a period of more than five years, and that he had paid all taxes levied and assessed upon the land subsequent to the amendment of the section, his adverse possession is established.

STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION—AMENDMENT OF THE CODES.—The form in which amendments of the Code have generally been made, by declaring that particular sections shall be amended so as to read in a given way, was adopted for the purpose of adjusting them to the original enactments, so that when the system should after repeated amendments become complete, the different parts might be put together without further revision, and thus form a perfect Code. The portions of the amended sections which are merely copied without change are not to be considered as repealed and again enacted, but to have been the law all along; and the new parts, or the changed portions, are not to be taken to have been the law at any time prior to the passage of the amended act.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Colusa County.

The action was ejectment. The remaining facts are stated in the opinion of the court, and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. JUSTICE McKEE.

Goad & Redding, and S. W. Sanderson, for Appellant.

The issue is: Is the plaintiff's right of action barred by the Statute of Limitations? or, put in another way,—

Has defendant, on the 28th day of October, 1881 (the date of the commencement of the suit), established an adverse possession under the facts as agreed upon?

It is plain that there is a vast discrepancy between what the defendant has done, and what the statute in October, 1881, says must have been done to claim the establishment of an adverse possession.

The defendant has not occupied and claimed the land adversely and continuously for five years and paid all the taxes, State, county, or municipal, levied and assessed upon said land.

The defendant has occupied and claimed the land adversely and continuously for five years, and paid all taxes, State, county, or municipal, levied upon said land since April 1, 1878.

He certainly has not performed the letter of the statute as it reads when the suit was brought.

The universal rule is that in disseizin the Statute of Limitations in force when the suit was commenced governs the case, and any deviation from its provision is fatal. (Potter's Dwarries on Statutes, 146, and cases cited; Manchester v. Doddridge, 3 Ind. 360; State v. Swope, 7 Ind. 91, and cases cited.)

Now, in the case at bar, does the amendment of April 1, 1878, to affect this adverse occupier, take away or impair any vested right that he has acquired under existing laws? Does it create a new obligation or attach a new disability to a past transaction in compelling him to pay all the taxes levied and assessed on said land?

This adverse occupier in 1878 is not in existence in the eyes of the law except as a trespasser, a tort feasor.

If the amendment of April 1, 1878, does not affect and include him, whom does it affect and include? What standing in court can he possibly have, unless he can show that he has complied with the strict letter of the statute as it reads five years from the date of his entry?

This we affirm to be the true and only criterion of an adverse occupier's status:—

Has he performed the strict letter of the statute as it reads five years from the date of his entry?

There is no such thing as the establishment of an adverse possession for three years, or for four years eleven months and twenty-nine days.

The establishment of adverse possession means an adverse possession taken and held with the requisites and circumstances specified in the statute for the required time, and until the adverse occupier can prove this, he is a trespasser subject to the will of the legislature. (Hill v. Saunders, 6 Rich. 67, 68; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 382; Tyler on Ejectment, 165.)

Dyas & Bridgford, for Respondent.

We claim that where a portion of the five years preceded the amendment of section 325 on April 1, 1878, that it is not necessary, in order to establish adverse possession in the defendant, for him to show payment of taxes for that time which elapsed before the date of said amendment.

The admitted facts show conclusively that the defendant complied with the requirements of said section 325 during all of that time which elapsed before the said amendment thereof, as said section stood before said amendment, and has since said time (April 1, 1878), complied with the requirements of said section as amended.

Then, on April 1, 1878, the defendant was, and had been since the 18th day of March, 1875, in the adverse possession of the lands described in the complaint.

The legislature, by the amendment of section 325, did not make that which was, and had been adverse, any the less adverse; and could not have done so without making a law which would have been retroactive, which section 325 does not purport to be. (Code Civil Proc. § 3; Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288.)

Counsel for plaintiff argue that the amendment of 1878 operates as a repeal of the old section. The only change made was the adding of the provision requiring the payment of taxes. So far as they are the same it is to be treated as a continuation of the old law, and not as a new enactment. (Code Civ. Proc. § 5.)

If section 325 is to be treated as a Statute of Limitation, then the time which had run before the amendment thereof is deemed part of the time prescribed as such limitation. (Code Civ. Proc. § 9; Benjamin v. Eldridge, 50 Cal. 612.)

SHARPSTEIN, J.—The record shows that the defendant had been in the adverse possession of the demanded premises more than three years before the legislature amended section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, however, that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under any section or sections of this Code unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes, State, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon said land," and such adverse possession continued until the commencement of this action, which was more than two years after the enactment of said proviso. Since the passage of said proviso the defendant is conceded to "have paid all the taxes, State, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon said land." But it is contended by the appellant that in order to establish an adverse possession it was incumbent on the defendant to show that he had paid said taxes during the entire period of his occupancy of the land. In other words, that he must not only show that since the passage of said proviso he has fully complied with all of its requirements, but that in anticipation of its passage he did all which he would have been required to, if said proviso had been enacted three years before it was. That this would be giving to said proviso a retroactive effect is quite clear, and that it cannot have because no part of the Code of Civil Procedure "is retroactive unless expressly so declared." (Code Civ. Proc. § 3.)

It is contended by appellant that by giving to this proviso a retroactive effect, i. e., by holding that the first three years of the respondent's possession were not adverse, by reason of his not having paid the taxes levied and assessed on the land during those three years, would not be to destroy a vested right, because he could acquire no right as against the owner of the legal title by less than five years' possession. The question in this case is not whether, if construed as the appellant insists it should be, the law would destroy a vested right, but whether if so construed the law would have a retroactive effect, which it cannot have because the legislature has not "expressly so declared."

And if it cannot have a retroactive operation it can in no way benefit the appellant in this case.

There is another provision of the same Code on which respondent's counsel relies. It reads as follows:—

"When a limitation or period of time prescribed in any existing statute for acquiring a right or barring a remedy, or for any other purpose, has begun to run before this Code goes into effect, and the same or any limitation is prescribed in this Code, the time which has already run shall be deemed part of the time prescribed as such limitation by this Code." (Code Civ. Proc. § 9.)

But the counsel for appellant contends that these sections only apply to cases which arose before the adoption of the Code in its original form. And that an amendment to the Code may, without any express declaration, have a retroactive operation. In other words, that the amended section should be considered as though it had been originally enacted in its present form. Our own views upon this point are very clearly expressed in Ely v. Holton, 15 N. Y. 598, from which we quote the following:—

"The form in which amendments, both of the Code and of the Revised Statutes have generally been made by declaring that particular sections shall be amended so as to read in a given way, was adopted for the purpose of adjusting them to the original enactments, so that when the system should, after repeated amendments, become complete, the different parts might be put together without further revision, and thus form a perfect Code. The portions of the amended sections which are merely copied without change are not to be considered as repealed and again enacted, but to have been the law all along; and the new parts, or the changed portions, are not to be taken to have been the law at any time prior to the passage of the amended act."

The Code, so far as it relates to the payment of taxes by persons holding lands adversely to the owners of the legal titles to such lands, did not go into effect until sixty days after April 1, 1878, and it did not in our opinion change the character of the defendant's possession prior to that date, because it was not retroactive, and if not retroactive it could not; and because under section nine of said Code the time which had already run when the amendment of April 1, 1878, went into effect must be deemed a part of the time prescribed by the Code as amended.

Judgment affirmed.

MCKEE, J.—I dissent. The right of entry upon the demanded premises, asserted by the plaintiff, was founded upon a United States patent, which was issued and delivered to the plaintiff on the 17th of March, 1875, and purported to convey the premises in question with other lands. The action upon this patent was commenced on the 28th of October, 1881.

On the 18th of March, 1875, defendant entered upon the land; and at the commencement of the action he was in possession of it, and had been in the actual and exclusive possession of the same continuously for six years before he was sued. During that time he claimed the land adversely to the title of the plaintiff, and for three years of the time, namely, from the year 1878 until the year 1881, he paid all the taxes which had been levied upon the land. Upon these facts the court below decided that the plaintiff's action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and ordered judgment accordingly. I think the decision and judgment are erroneous.

By the patent the plaintiff established the legal title to the property. From this fact two legal presumptions resulted: First, that the plaintiff, as holder of the legal title, had been possessed of the property within five years before the commencement of the suit; and secondly, that the occupation by the defendant was under and in subordination to the legal title.

Upon these presumptions the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, unless the defendant overcame them by proof that he had held and possessed the property adversely to the legal title for five years before the commencement of the suit. (§§ 318, 321, Code Civ. Proc.)

Negatively the proof shows that the defendant did not claim the land under color of title. His claim was that he had acquired title at the commencement of the suit by adverse possession under the Statute of Limitations. To establish the acquisition of such a title, it was necessary for him to prove that he had claimed and occupied the land for five years continuously before the commencement of the suit, by a substantial enclosure of the land, or by its usual cultivation or improvement, and the payment of all taxes which have been levied and assessed upon it. (§ 325, Code Civ. Proc.) These were the requisites and requirements of adverse possession as a source of title under the Code as it was when the defendant was sued. And the practical question arises, has the defendant proved an adverse possession with the requisites and requirements of the Code for the time prescribed?

The proof answers the question in the negative; for although it shows that the defendant occupied and claimed the land for the period of five years continuously, it also shows that he has not paid the taxes levied and assessed upon it during the period of five years. Therefore the Statute of Limitations has not run in his favor.

But it is urged that as the Code did not require the payment of taxes as essential to adverse possession before the amendment of April 1, 1878, it was not necessary for the defendant to prove payment of taxes for five years; and as he has, in fact, paid the taxes every year since 1878, for a period of three years, he has complied with the law.

The payment of taxes for five years was, however, one of the circumstances specified in the section of the Code invoked by the defendant as requisite to constitute the adverse possession necessary to confer title. As the Code stood when he invoked it, there was no such thing as a Statute of Limitations founded upon three years' adverse possession, and no such thing as a Statute of Limitations founded upon an adverse possession for ciple that no person is liable for the act or negligence of another unless there be shown such relations between them as invokes the rule of respondeat superior. (Pack v. Mayor, 8 N. Y. 225.)

Such relation does not exist where one in the exercise of an independent calling is working for another under an independent contract, and when such contractor has the entire selection of the time, mode, and means of doing the various parts of the work contracted for. J. C. Bates, for Respondent.

No one can escape the burden of an obligation imposed upon him by law by engaging its performance by another. (Shearman and Redfield on Neg. §§ 83, 84; Civ. Code, § 832; Zeile v. Hood, S. C. Cal. 1878, No. 5,341; Farrand v. Marshall, 21 Barb. 417. The last case has been approved in 80 N. Y. 583; 67 N. Y. 273; 57 N. Y. 77; see Creed v. Hartman, 29 N. Y. 594; *Gray v. The principle of law involved in this case we think definitely settled by Zeile v. Hood, supra.

By examining annotated edition of Civil Code, and cases cited under section 832, and then the present amendment, it will be seen that said section was materially changed.

We think that the legal duty of taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land whereon buildings rest, is clearly prescribed and expressed by said section of Civil Code, 832.

The statute places that duty on the owners, and we think that the responsibility cannot be avoided by a delegation of that power to others. (See Hilliard v. Richardson, 8 Gray, 353, cited by appellants.)

a certain day she was the owner and in possession of certain "tenements and buildings" upon a lot of land described, and owner of an unexpired lease-hold interest in the lot; that defendant was the owner in fee and in possession of an adjoining lot (describing it); that the plaintiff's land "and tenements" had the lateral and adjacent support from defendant's land, and plaintiff was entitled to have such support; that defendant commenced to excavate her lot adjacent to plaintiff's "land and buildings," for the purpose of construction, "and took away the earth therefrom without leaving proper or sufficient, or any support for plaintiff's said buildings, as required by section 832 of the Civil Code," and prosecuted "such grading and excavation" so carelessly and negligently adjacent to said plaintiff's buildings, some five feet in depth below the surface of plaintiff's land, and the official grade of the street in front thereof, "as to leave said plaintiff's land and buildings and tenements thereon" without proper or sufficient support, whereby the earth on plaintiff's premises gave way, and said "house and tenements of plaintiff," etc., were destroyed, to the damage, etc. The answer denied negligence, and set up an independent contract, etc.

The complaint seems to have been drawn, and the cause tried in the court below, upon the theory that it was the absolute duty of defendant in excavating her lot to protect the building of plaintiff. But, as there was no objection to the complaint in the court below, and we cannot say it entirely fails to set forth a cause of action, as the evidence offered by plaintiff was admitted without opposition; as no evidence was offered by defendant tending to prove that the soil of plaintiff's lot would not have fallen in except for the superincumbent building, and as the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of insufficiency of evidence to uphold the verdict, we cannot set the verdict aside unless error occurred at the trial.

It is urged by respondent that section 832 of the Civil Code has imposed upon an adjacent land owner obligations which were not his prior to the adoption of that section. We find, however, no new duty imposed upon one intending to excavate, unless it be the duty of giving reasonable notice of his intention. The section reads: "Each coterminous owner is entitled to the lateral and subadjacent support which his land receives from the adjoining land, subject to the right of the owner of the adjoining land to make proper and usual excavations on the same for purposes of construction on using ordinary care and skill, and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other, and giving reasonable notice to the other of his intention to make such excavation."

We inquire, what was the law when the section of the Code was adopted?

"Every one has so far the right to have his own soil sustained by that of his neighbor, that the latter may not dig so near to the land of the former as to cause the same to fall into the excavation by its own natural weight. He ought to guard against such a consequence by proper care, and the application of proper means of support. The right of lateral support in such case is an incident to the land itself. In the language of Rolle: 'It seems that a man who has land next adjoining to my land cannot dig his land so near to my land that thereby my land shall fall into the pit, and for this, if an action were brought it would lie.' (2 Rolle Abr. 565.) This doctrine is recognized and sustained by Campbell, C. J., in Humphries v. Broyden, by Parker, C. J., in Thirston v. Hancock, by Ch. Walworth, in Lasala v. Holbrook, and in Farr and Marshall which was fully and elaborately considered, and strongly sustains the above doctrine. But this right of a land owner to support his land against that of the adjacent owner does not, as before stated, extend to the support of any additional weight or structure that he may place thereon. If, therefore, a man erect a house on his own land so near the boundary thereof as to be injured by the adjacent owner excavating his land in a proper manner, and so as not to have caused the soil of the adjacent parcel to fall if it had not been loaded with an additional weight, it would be damnum absque injuria, a loss for which the person so excavating the land would not be responsible in damages." (2 Washburn on Real Property, 331.) Professor Washburn cites many cases in support of his views. It may be added, if the building has stood for a period of five years (in this State) before the excavation, the person who erected it has acquired a species of easement in his neighbor's land—a right to the support of his building as well as soil. No such question as this last is presented in the case now before us. As to a house recently erected it has been sometimes said the adjacent owner will be responsible for excavating upon his own land, so as to injure or impair its foundations, if the injury results from the negligent, unskillful and improper manner in which it was done. But the question returns, what is a negligent or unskillful excavation? If the digging would not have caused any appreciable damage to the adjacent land in its natural state, it would not be the ground of an action. The owner who has dug down his land has done what he had a right to do in a lawful manner.

It would seem that by neglecting to give notice to the adjacent proprietor, as required by section 832 of the Civil Code, the person excavating his own lot would become liable for injuries caused by a caving which would not have occurred except for the superincumbent weight of his neighbor's building. This by reason of the section which requires him to give the notice. There is no averment in the complaint that defendant did not give, and there is evidence that defendant did give, the notice. It is apparent that by giving the notice a person excavating cannot relieve himself of any portion of the prudent care with which he must have conducted the work in the absence of the statutory provision requiring notice. His excavation must be such as would not have caused the soil of the adjacent lot to tumble in had it remained in its natural state — not built upon. But if he gives the notice, and so conducts the work as that the soil, without the weight of the edifice, would not have fallen, his whole duty is performed. By the giving of the notice the coterminous proprietors are relegated to their common-law rights and duties. Their duties are correlative. The object of the notice is that the owner of the building may have his attention called to the work, and if necessary shore up his wall or strengthen his foundation. If the person making the excavation must only see to it, that the digging be such as would not have displaced or disturbed his neighbor's soil, but must protect against the burden of his neighbor's building, however great, the result must often be practically to deprive the owner of land of the right of reasonable excavation, where his lot lies next that occupied by a massive structure. The expense of preventing the fall of the building must ordinarily increase in proportion to its size and weight.

Since the enactment of the section of the Code the rights and duties of adjoining proprietors — with reference to the matter in hand — are substantially the same as they were before, provided notice is given by the party intending to excavate.

There was evidence that the work was done by an independent contractor, who agreed with defendant to excavate, to the depth of eight feet below the level of the street, the basement for the whole of a building to extend to the line of plaintiff's lot. The contractor swore the defendant had nothing to do with the selection of any of the men employed by him to do the work. Defendant testified: "I never spoke to any person who was grading the lot in question. I never had anything to do with the property after the work was commenced."

Defendant requested the court below to charge the jury:—

"If the jury shall find that the excavation of the lot was done by persons not employed by or under the control of the defendant, and that the defendant took no part in the said work or directed the same, they will find for the defendant.

"If the jury shall find that the defendant entered into a contract with another person to do all the work necessary to construct her building, including the excavation of the lot, and that the said work and excavation was done by him under said contract without any further control or direction by the defendant, they are instructed that the defendant is not liable for any negligence on the part of such contractor, or any one under his employment."

The court refused to charge as requested, to which defendant duly excepted.

The general rule is that one person is not liable for the act of another, unless the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, exists. It is clear that the relation of master and servant did not exist between defendant and the independent contractor, nor between defendant and the employees of the contractor. To the general rule there are exceptions, but plaintiff has not brought this case within any of them.

The owner of real estate may not relieve himself of the duties resting upon him as such by a contract, the result of which, while being executed or when completed, must necessarily create a nuisance. (Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 426; Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 358.) If the contract is such as that the necessary effect of its execution, according to its terms, is to produce the result complained of, the owner of real estate may be liable. (Cooley on Torts, 547.) And so, perhaps, if the specifications for the work must render it inherently defective. (Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469.) It has been said: "If a contractor faithfully performs his contract, and a third person is injured by the contractor in the course of its due performance, or by its result, the employer is liable, for he causes the precise act to be done which occasions the injury; but for the negligence of the contractor not done under the contract, but in violation of it, the employer is not in general liable." (Seymour, J., in Lawrence v. Shipman, 39 Conn. 589.) Of course the word "employer" is here used to designate the owner of the property or person contracting with the independent contractor by whom the injury is done.

In the case before us the contractor agreed to excavate defendant's lot, a thing of itself lawful. The mode and manner of doing the work was not expressly agreed upon; there was no inherent defect in a stipulated plan; the work would not necessarily create a nuisance. It is contended by respondent that it was the duty of defendant to insert in the contract an express term, to the effect the work should be so conducted and finished as not to disturb the soil of the adjacent lot, and that in default of such express provision the defendant is liable, because the work was done in accordance with the contract. But when a contract provides for doing a thing which may be, and generally is, done in a lawful manner, and is silent as to the mode of doing it, the contract is to be construed as requiring it to be done in a lawful manner. As the injury was caused by the contractor while doing work which, it must be assumed, could have been done without causing it, and the contractor had agreed so to do it, the injury was done in violation of his contract. The defendant was entitled to a charge to the jury that she was not liable if the damages were produced by the act of an independent contractor, or his servant.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

MOORE, J.—I concur. To the lateral and subjacent support which adjoining lands receive from each other the coterminous owners of such lands are entitled, subject, however, to the right of each to make excavations on his own land for construction. But the coterminous owner who exercises this right is bound by law to notify the owner of the adjacent land of his intention to excavate; he is also bound to take such precautions as will sustain the land of the other, and to use care and skill in excavating so as to prevent injury being done to the support of the adjacent land. More than that is not required of him; he is not bound to prop up a building on the adjacent land which the owner has built near the dividing line. A man who has built adjoining his neighbor's land ought to foresee the probable use by his neighbor of the adjoining land, and by convention with his neighbor, or by a different arrangement of his house, secure himself against future interruption. "This," says the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220, "seems to be the result of the cases anciently settled in England upon the subject of nuisance, or interruption of privilege and easements, and it seems to be as much the dictate of common sense and sound reason as of legal authority." (See also Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92; Radcliff v. Mayor, 4 Comst. 201; McGuire v. Grant, 1 Dutch. 362.)

This common-law doctrine has not been changed by section 832 of the Civil Code. By its terms the section limits the right of the coterminous owner to the lateral support which his land receives from the adjacent land. The section is, therefore, nothing more than a statutory form of expression of the rule that had been, previous to the adoption of the Code, judicially declared to be the law.

J. M. PHILIP ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. H. SIERING
ET AL., APPELLANTS.

PRACTICE — INSOLVENCY — JUDGMENT AGAINST ATTACHED PROPERTY — APPEAL—

After the commencement of the action the defendants were adjudged insolvent debtors, and all proceedings against them stayed. The answer set up no other defense than the adjudication in insolvency. The plaintiffs moved for a judgment on the pleadings, to be enforced only against certain attached property, on the ground that an attachment had been issued in the case, and property attached more than thirty days prior to the initiation of the insolvency proceedings. The court granted the motion and defendants appealed. The transcript on appeal did not show what papers were before the court upon the hearing of the motion. Held, that the judgment should be affirmed, it being incumbent on a party who alleges error to make it apparent by the record.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

E. G. Knapp, and Wm. H. Sharp, for Appellants.

Under the circumstances it was error to render judgment.

The effect of the declaration in bankruptcy is of itself an injunction against further proceedings. In the absence of an order authorizing it, the plaintiff cannot proceed with his suit— if he attempts to do so “his proceedings are illegal and void.” (Penny v. Taylor, 10 Bank. Reg. 200–203.)

The adjudication must be pleaded in issuable form, and when so pleaded the cause is suspended. (Gibson v. Green, 45 Miss. 209; Hecht v. Wassell, 24 Ark. 412; Frostman v. Hicks, 15 Bank. Reg. 41.)

A bankrupt is civiliter mortuus from the day he files his petition. (Johnson v. Geisritter, 26 Ark. 44; Barron v. Newberry, 1 Biss. 149.) The assignee stands as administrator. (Carr v. Gale, 3 Wood. & M. 38; 2 Ware, 330.)

The language of the Act of 1880 providing for a stay follows that of the United States bankrupt law. The object is to protect the debtor from being harassed by suits, and to prevent a race of diligence between creditors. (In re Rosenberg, 2 Bank. Reg. 236; In re Metcalf, 1 Bank. Reg. 201.)

By the filing of his petition in insolvency, the control and dominion of the insolvent's estate is transferred to the insolvent court.

Pending the proceedings, no order for the sale of the property to satisfy a lien can be made on petition for enforcement of the lien. (Clifton v. Foster, 103 Mass. 233; 3 Bank. Reg. 656; In re Cook & Gleason, 3 Biss. 116; Douglass v. St. Louis Z. Co. 56 Mo. 388.)

And an attaching creditor will not be allowed to proceed to trial and judgment, as there can be no party defendant. (Ex parte John Foster, 2 Story, 131.)

Disregard of the order staying proceedings is error, for which the judgment will be reversed. (Bandy v. Ransome, 13 Pac. C. L. J. 537.)

A judgment enforceable only against property is as erroneous as a general judgment.

Ray v. Wight, 119 Mass. 426, per Gray, C. J.: "Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5106, a plaintiff having a valid attachment lien upon the property of a defendant, who, pending the action, but not within four months after the attachment was made, has instituted proceedings in bankruptcy, is not entitled to a special judgment to be enforced only against the attached property until the question of the debtor's discharge is determined, and there be no unreasonable delay in endeavoring to obtain a discharge."

The assignee was a necessary party. (Gibson v. Green, 45 Miss. 209; Ex parte Foster, 2 Story, 157-159; Deas v. Thorn, 3 Johns. 544.)

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for Respondents.

The order appealed from should be affirmed because the transcript does not contain all the papers used on the hearing. (Baker v. Snyder, 58 Cal. 617.)

The case being before the court on the judgment roll alone, all presumptions are in favor of the judgment. (Thompson v. O'Neil, 41 Cal. 685; Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 339.)

The fact that the attachment in question was made more than one month next preceding the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, cannot by this appeal be questioned, and it follows that plaintiffs in the action had a valid attachment upon certain property of defendants, which attachment was not dissolved by those insolvency proceedings.

The plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to a judgment to be enforced against the attached property. (Bates v. Tappan, 99 Mass. 376; Bowman v. Harding, 56 Me. 559; Stoddard v. Locke, 43 Vt. 574; Daggett v. Cooke, 37 Conn. 341; Vaillant v. Childress, 21 Wall. 643; 11 N. B. R. 318; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612; Batchelder v. Putnam, 13 N. B. R. 404; Mason v. Warthen, 14 N. B. R. 347; Sacramento Bank v. Hadley, 2 Pac. O. L. J. 470.)

PER CURIAM.—The appeal as stated in the notice is from “the order overruling the demurrer, from the order directing a judgment and execution herein, and also from the judgment therein made and entered in the said Superior Court on the 20th day of April, 1881, in favor of the plaintiffs in said action, and against said defendants, and from the whole thereof.”

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled.

The answer alleges that after the commencement of this action the defendants were duly adjudged insolvent debtors, and all proceedings against them were stayed.

After the answer was filed the plaintiffs gave notice of motion for judgment upon the pleadings, on the ground that the attachment in the action was issued and property attached more than thirty days prior to the filing of the defendants' petition in insolvency; and it was stated in said notice that said motion would be based upon the pleadings, affidavit, and undertaking on attachment, the writ of attachment and return thereon of the sheriff, and upon all the papers on file in the action.

It does not appear from the transcript what papers were before or considered by the court upon the hearing of that motion. But it does appear that the court granted the motion and directed that the judgment should be enforced only against the property attached.

The judgment recites that it appeared to the court that property of the defendants had been seized and levied upon by the sheriff by virtue of a writ of attachment issued in this action more than one month before the insolvency proceedings were initiated by the defendants; that said property was then still in the hands and custody of said sheriff, and that said attachment had not been dissolved and was then in full force.

It is incumbent on a party who alleges error to make it apparent. That the record now before us fails to do.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNIE B. GALLOWAY, ADMX., ETC., APPELLANT, v.
JOHN C. ROUSE ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

APPEAL — SERVING AND FILING NOTICE.— Under section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the notice of appeal may be filed on a day subsequent to that upon which the service upon the adverse party is made.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Contra Costa, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The respondents moved to dismiss the appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

George Turner, and E. A. Lawrence, for Appellant.

Mills & Jones, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—"An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party or his attorney. The order of service is immaterial, but the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made with the clerk, as hereinafter provided, or the undertaking be waived by the adverse party in writing." (Code of Civil Procedure, § 940.)

This statute differs materially from the section of the former practice act regulating the mode of taking appeals, and as a consequence the decisions of this court based on the latter are no longer applicable.

As the statute now is, the notice of appeal may be filed with the clerk on a day subsequent to that upon which the service is made. In the language of the statute "the order of service is immaterial, but the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made" with the clerk, etc.

In the case at bar it appears from the certificate of the clerk that notice of appeal was served on the 20th of November, 1882, and on the 23d of the same month was filed with the clerk, together with an undertaking on appeal. From what has been said it follows that these steps constituted an effectual appeal.

No transcript on appeal having been filed within the time prescribed by the rules, and no extension of time having been obtained for that purpose, the motion to dismiss must prevail.

Appeal dismissed.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF H. S. DORLAND, DECEASED, ALICE DORLAND, ADMINISTRATRIX, APPELLANT, AND THE CREDITORS, RESPONDENTS.

ADMINISTRATION — ATTORNEY — VALUE OF SERVICES.— In determining the value of services rendered by an attorney in the settlement of an estate, the opinions of professional witnesses are not binding on the court.

IN.— DIVIDEND TO CREDITORS — ERROR IN AMOUNT.— A dividend ordered to be paid to creditors being in excess of the amount in the hands of the administratrix, the cause was remanded with instructions to correct the error.

APPEAL from a decree of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The administratrix filed her annual account, and written objections thereto were interposed by the creditors. Among the items objected to were certain credits for money purporting to have been paid to the attorney representing the administratrix for his services. The witnesses testified that the services were worth the amount paid, but the court thought otherwise, and reduced the credits from five thousand and seventy-five dollars to one thousand dollars. The additional facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

J. C. Bates, for Appellant.

M. Lynch, and G. D. Shadburne, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—The court below was not bound by the opinions of the professional witnesses as to the value of the services rendered by the attorney for the administratrix, and as to the proper amount to be allowed therefor. The court was authorized to compare its own judgment as to such value with the opinions of the witnesses, and make such allowance as should be just. (Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45; Anthony v. Stinson, 4 Kan. 211.)

The court charged the administratrix with a cash balance of $7,611.57. We see no error in this. The court permitted her to retain $2,930 for payment of expenses of administration. This left $4,681.57 with which to pay a dividend on claims. The court ordered a dividend of twenty-five per cent to be paid on claims, and in giving the names of claimants and the amounts to be paid for each, the aggregate is a trifle over $5,100. We apprehend that some confusion may have arisen in the clerical work of stating the amounts to be paid, and therefore the cause is remanded, with instructions to make such corrections as will make the aggregate of the sums to be paid as dividends not to exceed $4,681.57, and in all other respects the order and decree are affirmed.

E. HANSEN, RESPONDENT, v. LEWIS MARTIN ET AL.,
J. W. DAGER, APPELLANT.

PRACTICE — UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL — JUDGMENT AGAINST SURETIES UPON MOTION.—It is error to render judgment, under section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure against one only of the sureties on an appeal bond — no reason appearing why the other was not joined, except that he could not be found and served with notice. The section provides for a judgment "against the sureties," and this being a statutory proceeding, the course pointed out by the statute must be strictly pursued.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The plaintiff, several years ago, recovered a judgment against Lewis Martin for one thousand two hundred and twenty-seven dollars and costs. Martin appealed and filed an undertaking to stay execution as provided by the statute, with J. W. Dager and John T. Hill as sureties.

The judgment was affirmed, and upon the coming down of the remittitur the plaintiff moved the court upon affidavits setting out the above facts, for an order that J. W. Dager and John T. Hill appear and show cause why judgment should not be entered against them as sureties for the amount of the judgment recovered against Martin. Dager moved to dismiss the proceedings on the ground that Hill had not appeared to answer the order, nor had he been served with notice. The court found that there had been an unsuccessful attempt to serve Hill, denied the motion, and after a trial upon an answer setting up several defenses rendered judgment against Dager.

John C. Burch, for Appellant.

The words used in the section 942 "that they are bound," and not that they "jointly and severally are bound," as also that "judgment may be entered . . . against the sureties," and not against the sureties or either of them" if taken either in "their ordinary and popular sense," or that they were used in the law as such, and must be taken in their technical sense is conclusive that section 942 provided for a "joint" bond only as construed by section 1644, Civil Code.

The sureties received no benefit from the promise, and are not brought within the exception specified in section 1431, Civil Code, and under section 1659, Civil Code, they are not "severally," but jointly liable. So that no other than a joint judgment can be entered.

The undertaking given in this action contains factors which are not provided for by section 942. At p. 40, folio 113, Trans., the sureties are made to say: "We, the undersigned," . . . "do hereby 'jointly and severally' undertake and promise"—the words "jointly and severally" are interpolated upon the section; and at p. 41, folio 116, the words "and without notice to us or either of us," are also interpolated upon or in addition to the conditions provided in section 942. The use of these latter words might be construed to authorize judgment against them "or either of them," were it not for the fact that the words following immediately are "against the undersigned sureties," plural, using the language of the section providing for a "joint" judgment.

Notwithstanding the undertaking executed uses the words "jointly and severally" as above stated, we understand this to be a statutory bond, and it is well settled by this Supreme Court that when such a bond is given pursuant to the requirements of a particular statute or section of law, the provisions of that statute or section are deemed in law to have been incorporated into the bond.

It was said by this Supreme Court in Heynemann v. Eder, 17 Cal. 433: "Though not strictly an undertaking such as is contemplated by the statute, we think it should be construed in the same manner" their "agreement must be read in the light of the statute." Under this rule the "interpolated" words must be eliminated, and the bond left such as the Code (section 942) makes it and intended it to be, a "joint bond" upon which a "joint judgment" alone, and not a several or joint and several judgment may be rendered.

Tully R. Wise, for Respondent.

It has been decided over and over again that section 942 does authorize a judgment against the sureties upon motion. (Kelly v. Morgan, 54 Cal. 604; Ladd v. Parnell, 57 Cal. 232; Meredith v. Santa Clara Mng. Assn. of Balt., 56 Cal. 178; Wood v. Orford, 56 Cal. 157.)

This motion is the same as a scire facias. (Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 535; Davidson v. Farrell, 8 Minn. 262; Wright v. Simmons, 1 Smedes & M. 389; White v. Prigmore, 29 Ark. 211; Chippee v. Thomas, 5 Mich. 59; Ladd v. Parnell, 57 Cal. 232; Wood v. Orford, 6 Pac. C. L. J. 519; Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 430; Bouvier's Law Dic. Verb. recognizance.)

It is common practice in United States courts to enter judgment against stipulators at the same time as against principal.

No affidavit is necessary, but the case of Kelly v. Morgan is followed exactly by direction of the court. As the proceedings were based on papers in the case on the record, that is all that was necessary.

The parties can waive any legal or constitutional right, unless the law or Constitution expressly forbid it. (Connelly v. State, 31 Am. Rep. 34; Brown v. Leitch, 31 Am. Rep. 42; State v. Kaufman, 33 Am. Rep. 148; State v. Worden, 33 Am. Rep. 27.)

The court compelled us to proceed against Dager alone, because he had been served with notice, and Hill had not. This was proper. (Code Civ. Proc. § 579.)

PER CURIAM.—Martin, in appealing to this court from the judgment rendered against him, filed an undertaking with Dager and Hill as sureties. The judgment was affirmed, and on the going down of the remittitur the plaintiff moved, under section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, for judgment against the sureties. Notice of the motion was served on Dager only. The court entered judgment against him alone.

We think that it was error to render judgment under that section against one of the sureties only, no reason appearing why the other was not joined, except that he could not be bound and served with notice. The section provides for a judgment "against the sureties"; and this being a statutory proceeding, the course pointed out by the statute must be strictly pursued. The terms of the bond did not, if it could have done so, authorize a variation from the provision of the statute; it authorized the entry of judgment "against the undersigned sureties."

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

MARGARET M. HUTCHINSON, APPELLANT, v. A. G. AINSWORTH ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

TRANSFER -- DEFECTIVE ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY MARRIED WOMAN -- EVIDENCE.—

The certificate of acknowledgment of an instrument by a married woman is defective when it does not state that the notary made her acquainted with the contents of the instrument upon an examination without the hearing of her husband; and it is not error to prohibit its introduction in evidence.

Id.— PRACTICE — PLEADING.— When an acknowledgment is properly made but defectively certified, a party interested may have an action to correct the certificate; and where, in foreclosure proceedings, objection is made to the introduction of the mortgage on the ground that the certificate is defective, the plaintiff should be permitted to amend the complaint and prove that the acknowledgment was made in compliance with the statute, and have judgment reforming the certificate.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Alameda County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage made by defendant Anna Ainsworth, wife of defendant A. G. Ainsworth, upon her separate property, given to secure the payment of their joint note.

The certificate of acknowledgment attached to the mortgage was as follows:—

"STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
County of Alameda.

"On this third day of September, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, personally appeared before me, Will. H. Burrall, a notary public in and for said county, Anna Ainsworth, described as a married woman and the wife of A. G. Ainsworth, whose name is subscribed to the annexed instrument as a party thereto, and who is personally known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the said annexed instrument as a party thereto; and she, having been by me first made acquainted with the contents of said instrument acknowledged to me on examination, apart from and without the hearing of her said husband, that she executed the same, and that she does not wish to retract the execution of the same.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal the day and year in this certificate first above written.

"[NOTARIAL SEAL.]

WILL. H. BURRALL,
"Notary Public."

The defendants objected to the introduction of the mortgage on the ground of insufficiency of the acknowledgment, and the court sustained the objection. The plaintiff then moved to amend the complaint, and be allowed to prove that the acknowledgment was taken in exact conformity to the requirements of the Code, and for a judgment reforming the certificate. This motion the court denied, and gave judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the note, but denied the prayer for a foreclosure of the mortgage.

Geo. W. & W. B. Tyler, for Respondents.

The authorities are almost unanimous that a deed by a married woman improperly acknowledged is void. (1 Bish. Married Women, § 589; Knowles v. McCamly, 10 Paige, 342; Steele v. Thompson, 14 Binn. 84; Baxter v. Bodkin, 25 Ind. 172; Barry v. Donley, 25 Tex. 737; Willes v. Gattman, 53 Miss. 721; Marriner v. Saunders, 5 Gilm. 125; Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 13; Ewald v. Corbett, 32 Cal. 493; McLeran v. Benton, 43 Cal. 467; Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 498; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52, and cases there cited.)

If the deed is void, it certainly cannot be reformed as against Anna Ainsworth and her grantees, either at law or in equity.

Besides the cases cited supra, the following are in point: Leftwitch v. Neal, 7 W. Va. 569; Hamar v. Medsker, 60 Ind. 413; Martin v. Davelly, 6 Wend. 1; Wentworth v. Clark, 33 Ark. 432; Callahan v. Callahan, 4 Tex. 61; Butler v. Buckingham, 5 Day, 492; Lane v. McKeen, 15 Me. 304; Russell v. Ramsey, 35 Ill. 362; Dickinson v. Glenney, 27 Conn. 104; Selover v. A. B. Co. 7 Cal. 266; Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 13; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52.

As regards the admission of parol evidence, the following authorities are directly in point; all holding that a defective acknowledgment of a married woman's deed cannot be helped by parol evidence. (Russell v. Ramsey, 35 Ill. 362; Trimmer v.

Heagy, 16 Pa. St. 484; Hayden v. Wescott, 11 Conn. 129; Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Peters, 328; Elwood v. Klock, 13 Barb. 50; O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 381; Wilkinson v. Getty, 13 Iowa, 157; Looney v. Adamson, 48 Tex. 619; Jourdan v. Jourdan, 9 Serg. & R. 268; 1 Bish. Married Women, § 591; Landers v. Bolton, 26 Cal. 408.)

In all dealings with married women the maxim caveat emptor must be applied, and the doctrine of estoppel in pais does not apply. (Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495.)

PER CURIAM.—The certificate of acknowledgment was defective, in that it did not state that the notary, upon an examination without the hearing of her husband, made the married woman acquainted with the contents of the instrument. Section 1186 of the Civil Code requires that such separate examination must embrace as well the making her acquainted with the contents of the instrument as the acknowledgment by her; and section 1191 gives the form of the certificate in very plain language. The court, therefore, did not err in sustaining defendants' objection to the admission of the mortgage in evidence.

When the acknowledgment is properly made, but defectively certified, a party interested may have an action to correct the certificate. (§ 1202, Civ. Code.) We see no objection to the joining this action with the action for foreclosure. The court should have permitted plaintiff to amend her complaint and prove, if she could, that the acknowledgment was actually taken in compliance with the statute, and have judgment correcting the certificate.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

THE PEOPLE, RESPONDENT, v. JOSEPH HURTADO, APPELLANT.

HOMICIDE — EVIDENCE — CONFESSION BY WIFE OF ADULTERY — INSANITY.—Defendant was found guilty of murder in the first degree. The wife of defendant testified, on his behalf, that she confessed to him, prior to the killing, she had been guilty of adultery with the deceased, and that the confession was followed by great anger, weeping, and mental depression on the part of defendant. Defendant, having introduced evidence that a certain house in Sacramento was a house of ill-fame, offered to prove by a witness the independent fact that deceased had been seen entering the house in company with the defendant's wife. The wife's testimony had not been impeached. Held, that the court rightly excluded the testimony. It was her statement which could be claimed to be the cause, or one of the causes, which deprived him of his reason, not the truth of her statement, with respect to which he had no personal knowledge.

12.—MANSLAUGHTER—PASSION—PROVOCATION.—If a defendant charged with murder is so far in possession of his mental faculties as to be capable of knowing that the act of killing was wrong, any partial defect of understanding which might cause him more readily to give way to passion than a man ordinarily reasonable, cannot be considered for any purpose. To reduce the offense to manslaughter, the provocation must at least be such as would stir the resentment of a reasonable man.

13.—CHARGE.—The charge of the trial court must be taken together, and if, without straining any portion of the language, it harmonizes as a whole, and fairly and correctly presents the law bearing on the issues tried, the appellate court will not disturb the judgment because a separate instruction does not contain all the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire text.

14.—THREATS.—The defendant asked the court to charge, "If the defendant had been told of threats made by deceased against him, . . . then defendant had a right to arm himself," etc. The court refused to so instruct. Held, not error; it was for the jury to determine from the evidence whether the defendant was justified in arming himself and in using arms.

15.—DEPOSITION—CONSTITUTION.—Section 18, article 1, of the present Constitution is no prohibition upon the power of the legislature to authorize the taking of depositions by the defendant in every class of criminal cases.

16.—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS.—A witness, Morrison, testified that he told defendant of a conversation he had with his (defendant's) wife, in which she promised she would be good and do what was right. Defendant then asked the witness to state any conversation he had with her in which she made any admission of her adultery with Estuardo, the deceased. The court sustained an objection by the prosecution. Held, not error; it is manifest that any statement the wife may have made to the witness Morrison not made known to the defendant could not have had any tendency to overthrow his reason.

17.—INSTRUCTION—ASSUMING FACTS NOT PROVED—SEDUCTION.—The court refused the following instruction: "It is proper for the jury to take into consideration the statements made to him of the seduction of his wife by deceased, as proper for you to consider in arriving at a conclusion as to whether he understood and was legally responsible for the killing; also, to aid you in arriving at the conclusion as to whether the act was premeditated or done with malice." Held, not error; the instruction assumes that statements were made to defendant "of the seduction of his wife by deceased." Seduction implies more than illicit intercourse.

18.—DEGREES OF MURDER—PUNISHMENT.—The court refused the following instruction: "If you believe the defendant, in truth and in fact, when he killed deceased believed deceased had seduced his wife, while it is in itself no excuse or sufficient provocation to excuse murder, if you believe he wholly understood and could control his act at the time of the homicide, yet it is proper for you to take into consideration in arriving at the degree of murder, if any, of which he may be guilty; also it is proper for you to take such testimony into consideration in fixing the punishment if you should find him guilty of murder in the first degree." Held, not error; the belief by defendant that deceased had seduced his wife could not of itself tend to reduce the crime to murder of the second degree.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

C. I. Jones, A. L. Hart, and T. B. McFarland, for Appellant.

Attorney-General, and Johnson, for Respondent.

MCKINSTREY, J.—Defendant was found guilty of murder in the first degree.

Two defenses were relied on at the trial. First, that defendant was laboring under insanity when the fatal shot was fired; second, that the killing was manslaughter only.

The wife of defendant testified, on his behalf, that she confessed to him prior to the killing, she had been guilty of adultery with deceased, and that the confession was followed by great anger, weeping, and mental depression on the part of defendant. Defendant, having introduced evidence that a certain house in Sacramento was a house of ill-fame, offered to prove by a witness, one Glenfuegas, the independent fact that deceased had been seen entering the house in company with defendant's wife. The testimony would have tended to prove the adultery. The court below sustained the prosecution's objection to the testimony.

It is urged by appellant — the defendant — the evidence was admissible as corroborating the testimony of defendant's wife that she had confessed to her husband. No direct evidence was introduced by the people to contradict her statement that she had made the confession to her husband. We know of no principle which would permit defendant to strengthen or bolster up the statement of the witness that she had declared to defendant she had committed adultery, by proving that, in fact, she had committed adultery. Evidence that she had committed adultery would not tend to prove that she confessed to her husband she had committed adultery. It was her statement which could be claimed to be the cause, or one of the causes, which deprived defendant of his reason — not the truth of her statement, with respect to which he had no personal knowledge. It may be the presumption, to which she, in common with all other witnesses was entitled, that she was telling the truth, and the further presumption that she would not swear falsely she had been guilty of adultery unless she was in fact guilty, were balanced or overcome in the minds of the jurymen by the probability she would swear falsely to save her husband from conviction. But we cannot assume that the jury arbitrarily, because she was the wife of defendant, rejected her testimony, or that they rejected it at all, since, if they accepted her statement as absolutely true, the verdict may be just. The credibility of each witness — not directly impeached — must be determined by the jury, and we must presume was in this case determined by the jury, upon consideration of the manner of the witness, the inherent probability of the testimony, and the other evidence in the cause, admitted because of its relevancy to the issues tried. To admit evidence in itself totally irrelevant, because it might in some degree render more probable testimony which is relevant, would be to open up the way to the trial of side issues not made by the pleadings. If it were competent for the defense to give evidence tending to prove that defendant's wife had committed adultery, it would be competent for the prosecution, in rebuttal, to prove that she had not committed adultery; in the case before us, to introduce witnesses who should swear that the house referred to was a house of good repute, or that defendant's wife never entered it. Moreover, it would have been competent for the prosecution, in the absence of evidence on the part of defendant tending to prove her adultery, to cast discredit upon her testimony that she had confessed her guilt to her husband, by proving that she was entirely innocent. We are convinced the objection was properly sustained.

The court below refused the request of defendant to give the instruction following:—

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was not so insane, at the time of the homicide, as to be irresponsible for his acts, but at the time he was laboring under such a mental unsoundness as to cause him to be easily aroused to a sudden heat of passion, and that he committed the homicide without malice aforethought, but on a sudden heat of passion, aroused and caused by an act of injustice towards him, committed by the deceased, it will be their duty to find him guilty of manslaughter only."

The instruction was properly refused. If defendant was so far in possession of his mental faculties as to be capable of knowing that the act of killing was wrong, any partial defect of understanding which might cause him more readily to give way to passion than a man ordinarily reasonable, cannot be considered for any purpose. To reduce the offense to manslaughter the provocation must at least be such as would stir the resentment of a reasonable man.

It cannot be urged that the homicide is manslaughter because it was committed in an unreasonable fit of passion. In an abstract sense anger is never reasonable, but the law, in consideration of human weakness, makes the offense manslaughter when it is committed under the influence of passion caused by an insult or provocation sufficient to excite an irresistible passion in a reasonable person; one of ordinary self-control.

There was some evidence that defendant "lay in wait" for deceased. We cannot say, therefore, that the instruction in that regard was totally inapplicable and misleading.

Defendant excepts to the portion of the charge to the jury which reads: "If the defendant voluntarily killed the deceased, and you are satisfied from the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, of such voluntary killing, then it is your duty to convict him unless you find from the evidence that the case comes within some one of the specifications of excusable or justifiable homicide." This language follows and is a resume of the instructions of the court with reference to unlawful homicide. The question of insanity is elsewhere treated of, and considering the whole charge, it cannot be presumed that the language of the court was understood by the jury to mean that the volition of an insane man rendered him liable to punishment. "We must take the charge together, and if, without straining any portion of the language, it harmonizes as a whole, and fairly and correctly presents the law bearing on the issues tried, we will not disturb the judgment because a separate instruction does not contain all the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire text." (People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 93.)

Defendant asked the court to charge: "If the defendant had been told of threats made by deceased towards him . . . then defendant had a right to arm himself when he went to the Police Court," etc. The court properly refused the offered instruction. It was for the jury to determine from the evidence whether defendant was justified in arming himself and in using his arms.

On the application of defendant the deposition of one Lenora Beauteris—a witness too ill to appear in court—was taken on behalf of defendant. Defendant was not present when the deposition was taken. The witness was sworn by the clerk and her testimony taken by questions, propounded by the respective counsel, and answers thereto. The deposition was introduced in evidence by defendant. Defendant now contends in this court that the judge below, of his own motion, should have excluded the deposition, and that his failure to do so was error, for which a new trial should be granted.

Defendant's proposition is that a deposition cannot be used in a case of homicide, because of section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of the State. The section reads:—

"In criminal prosecutions in any court whatever the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial; to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to appear and defend in person and with counsel. No person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense; nor be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking in the presence of the party accused and his counsel of depositions of witnesses in criminal cases other than cases of homicide, where there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial."

The section, with the exception of the last clause, relates to the privileges of persons accused of crime. "In criminal prosecutions the party accused shall have the right," etc. He shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense; he shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property "without due process of law." There can be little doubt that the right to due process of law would include the common-law right to be confronted by his witnesses. To prevent misunderstanding, however, the framers of the Constitution added: "The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking in the presence of the party accused and his counsel, of depositions of witnesses in criminal cases other than cases of homicide, when there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial." It may be that by reason of the exception depositions cannot now be used against the defendant in cases of homicide, even although they are taken in the presence of the party charged with that crime, and with full opportunity for cross-examination. But in other cases the legislature may authorize depositions to be taken on the part of the prosecution. Inasmuch, however, as the tenor of the provision of the Constitution clearly shows, with the exception noted, that it was intended for the protection of defendants, there is no prohibition upon the power of the legislature to authorize the taking of depositions by the defendant in every class of criminal cases. In this view of the question it is not necessary to inquire how far the constitutional privileges accorded to defendants charged with crime may be waived by them.

A witness, Morrison, after testifying he had a conversation with the wife of defendant, said: "I told Joe (defendant) about the conversation I had with his wife, in which she promised she would be good and do what was right." He was asked by the defendant: "State now the conversation you had with her." To this question the prosecution objected, on the ground that the question called for incompetent and hearsay testimony. The court sustained the objection. Counsel for defendant then asked: "Now state any conversation you had with her before she went away, in which she made any admission to you of her adultery with Estuado." A like objection was sustained to the last question.

If the record showed that the witness had testified he had communicated to defendant a conversation with his wife in which "she made any admission of her adultery" with deceased, we would be inclined to hold the court below erred in sustaining the objections to the questions. But the witness had only stated that he told defendant about a conversation in which "she promised she would be good and do what was right." It is manifest that any statement she may have made to the witness not made known to defendant, could not have had any tendency to overthrow his reason.

Defendant asked the court to charge the jury:—

"It is proper for the jury to take into consideration the statements made to him of the seduction of his wife by the deceased as proper for you to consider in arriving at a conclusion as to whether he understood and was legally responsible for the killing; also to aid you in arriving at a conclusion as to whether the act was premeditated or done with malice." Also,—

"If you believe defendant in truth and in fact when he killed deceased believed deceased had seduced his wife, while it is in itself no excuse or sufficient provocation to excuse murder if you believe he wholly understood and could control his act at the time of the homicide, yet it is proper for you to take into consideration in arriving at the degree of murder, if any, of which he may be guilty; also it is proper for you to take such testimony into consideration in fixing the punishment if you should find him guilty of murder in the first degree."

The court in its general charge said: "Evidence of information given defendant that improper conduct or relations had occurred between defendant's wife and deceased is to be considered only as affecting the defendant's mental condition."

The court also charged very fully with respect to the subject of insanity, in language as favorable to defendant as he was entitled to have used. (Charges asked by defendant. Nos. 7, 12, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 35, 36.)

We cannot say the action of the court in refusing the instructions above quoted demands a reversal of the judgment or a new trial. The first of the two instructions assumes that statements were made to defendant "of the seduction of his wife by deceased." While we would not always and necessarily hold a charge erroneous which should assume a fact to be proven, if from the immediate context, or elsewhere in the instructions, it appeared that the existence or non-existence of the fact was left to be determined by the jury, we will not say that the rejection of such a charge is erroneous. Moreover, the word

"seduction" implies more than illicit intercourse between deceased and defendant's wife. A jury might well believe a husband would more probably be rendered insane by the act of one who should deliberately entice the wife from the path of duty — who should by arts and solicitation persuade her to sacrifice her chastity — than by her voluntary and unsolicited surrender of her person. It was for the jury to decide whether any statements were made to defendant with respect to an adultery committed with deceased, and to decide whether such statements showed that she had been seduced.

Nor did the court err in refusing the last of the two instructions above quoted. If defendant "believed deceased had seduced his wife" (and retained the possession of his reason so as to be responsible for his act), the circumstance might furnish a motive for the crime, but it could not of itself tend to reduce the crime to murder of the second degree; or, in other words, it could not tend to neutralize the effect of the circumstances which tended to establish that the killing was done with the express malice or predetermination to take life, which constitutes murder of the first degree. While any fact in evidence may be considered by the jury in fixing the punishment where a defendant is found guilty of murder of the first degree, yet the court below was called on to give or refuse the offered instruction as a whole, and did not err in rejecting the whole when, as we have seen, part was objectionable.

THE PEOPLE, ETC., APPELLANTS, v. M. RIGNEY ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

SACRAMENTO — CHARTER OF — POWER OF TAXATION UNDER.—The several acts of the legislature subsequent to the original charter of the city of Sacramento gives authority for the levy and collection of taxes in addition to those specified in such charter, and constitutes an enlargement of the taxing power conferred by the charter.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento.

The action was brought to recover delinquent taxes levied by the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento for the fiscal year 1882-83. The levy was for a general tax of one dollar on one hundred, a fire department tax of twenty-four cents, a school tax of thirty cents, a levee tax of eighteen cents, a police tax of sixteen cents, a redemption tax of seven cents, and a library tax of five cents; making a total of two dollars. The charter of the city passed April 25, 1863, authorized a levy of one per cent. The Statute of 1872 authorized a fire department tax, the Act of January 18, 1870, a school tax, the Act of March 30, 1878, a levee tax, the Act of March 6, 1872, a police tax, the Act of March 31, 1876 a redemption tax, and the Act of April 26, 1880, a library tax.

It was contended by defendants that these several acts were not an enlargement of the taxing power, but were intended merely to direct the application of the general tax of one per cent authorized by the charter—that the levy in excess of one per cent was void.

The complaint was demurred to and the demurrer sustained.

H. L. Buckley, W. A. Anderson, Catlin & Hamburger, and Freeman & Bates, for Appellants.

It is claimed that the city levy must be limited to one per cent. We propose to show an express authority for every cent levied.

The levy of a general tax of one per cent is sanctioned by sections 2 and 25 of the Charter, passed April 25, 1863. (Devlin's Comp. pp. 4 and 19.)

This is specifically appropriated by section 26 of the Charter, as follows:—

55 per cent thereof to a sinking fund.

8 per cent thereof to a school fund.

7 per cent thereof to a fire department.

30 per cent thereof to a general fund.

The fact that the proceeds of this tax are thus appropriated confutes the theory that levies subsequently authorized were to be paid out of the general tax.

The fire department levy is authorized by Statute of 1872, sections 9 and 10. ((Devlin's Comp. pp. 80, 81.)

The school tax. (See Devlin, p. 56, § 2.)

The levee tax. (See Devlin, p. 68, § 1, and p. 72, § 3.)

The police tax. (See Devlin, p. 93.)

The Fowle bond tax. (See Devlin, p. 113.)

The library tax. (§ 15,068 Hittell's Codes.)

R. T. Devlin, J. W. Armstrong, and J. H. McKune, for Respondent.

The respondent claims that the limitation of the taxing power in the board of trustees to one per cent per annum is still in force, and that so far as subsequent statutes have authorized the levy of taxes (special or general) they only direct what shall be done with the taxes raised by the levy of one per cent or less.

He also claims that the several acts under which the authorities of the city assume the right to enlarge the levy of taxes beyond one per cent are inoperative and void.

Assuming (for the argument) that the said acts passed subsequent to the charter are operative, do they enlarge the power in the board of trustees to tax? The rule is well settled that in the construction of statutes effect must be given to each provision if possible.

The limitation in the power to tax contained in the charter of Sacramento is perfectly consistent with the subsequent acts cited. The several taxes may be levied and yet not exceed the one per cent limit, and so all provisions stand and have full force and effect. (9 Cowen, 546.)

This principle is illustrated in the Mayor etc. v. Magruder, 34 Md. 381.

The several acts conferring the additional powers of taxation are unconstitutional. (Art. 4, §§ 25, 31, and 37, Const.; Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 383; State v. Ingersoll, 17 Wis. 631; State v. Andrews, 20 Tex. 230; Blakemore v. Dolan, 50 Ind. 194; Cooley Cons. Lim. 185.)

PER CURIAM.—We are of opinion that under the charter of the city of Sacramento and the several subsequent acts of the legislature for the levy of the respective taxes therein named, the trustees of the city had authority to make the tax levy in controversy. The several acts subsequent to the original charter gave authority for the levy and collection of taxes in addition to those specified in such original charter, and constituted an enlargement of the taxing power conferred by the charter.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded with instructions to overrule the demurrer.

EX PARTE E. HARRISON, ON HABEAS CORPUS.

CRIMINAL LAW — GAMBLING — SENTENCE UNDER SECTION 330.—Sections 1205 and 1446 of the Penal Code are inapplicable to sentences imposed under section 330, and a prisoner held in custody for failure to pay a judgment rendered under the provisions of that section is only entitled to be discharged upon the payment of the fine and costs in money, at any time within the term of imprisonment, or by serving out the term of his imprisonment. He has no right to pay either fine or costs by imprisonment at the rate of one dollar a day.

THE facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

F. A. Berlin, for Petitioner.

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

McKEE, J.—The punishment prescribed for the offense of gaming, as defined by section 330 of the Penal Code, is a fine of not less than two hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisonment in the county jail until payment of the fine and costs, not exceeding one year. Satisfaction of a judgment for fine and costs, rendered under the provisions of the section, can only be made in one of two ways; namely, by payment in money, or by imprisonment for the time fixed by the judgment, which must be within the maximum time prescribed by the section.

A prisoner held in custody for failure to pay such a judgment is only entitled to be discharged upon payment of the fine and costs in money, at any time within the term of his imprisonment, or by serving out the term of his imprisonment. Section 330 gives him no right to pay either fine or costs by imprisonment at the rate of one dollar per day.

Sections 1205 and 1446 of the Penal Code are inapplicable to sentences imposed under section 330. Section 1205 relates to the satisfaction of judgments in the Superior Courts imposing a fine only, and section 1446 relates to the satisfaction of such fines imposed by judgments in Justices' or Police Courts. Both provide for the payment of such fines by imprisonment at the rate of one dollar for each day's imprisonment. Any judgment for a fine only substantially conforming to the provisions of those sections would be valid and sufficient (Ex parte Ellis, 54 Cal. 204), and one held in custody under it would be entitled to a credit of a dollar for each day he may have remained in prison, and, at any time, would be entitled to his discharge upon paying the sum remaining due. (Ex parte Kelly, 28 Cal. 414.)

It would be otherwise, however, as to a party held in custody by a commitment upon a judgment for fine and costs imposed under the provisions of section 330. He would have no right to his discharge at any time within the term of his imprisonment without first paying in money the judgment against him. Both fine and costs must first be paid, or the prisoner serve his term of imprisonment. Until one or the other of these things be done the sheriff is bound to detain him in custody. (§ 1215, Pen. Code.) But to authorize his detention the judgment must, under the provisions of section 330, specify the amount of the fine and costs, and the punishment to be inflicted. That section fixes the minimum and maximum of the fine, and the maximum of the imprisonment for the offense; and it is the duty of the court in which conviction has been had to render judgment within the boundaries established, and to specify in the judgment the amount of the fine, and the term of the imprisonment, and in that regard the judgment should be certain and definite, and complete in itself, so that what it requires to be done may be known without resort to anything outside of it. A judgment rendered upon a conviction under section 330 must specify the term of imprisonment, otherwise it is not such a judgment as is authorized by the section. And as no term of imprisonment for the offense of which the petitioner was convicted under section 330 is fixed by the judgment under which he is held in custody, he is illegally held, and must be discharged.

It is so ordered.

THORNTON, J., and SHARPSTEIN, J., concurred.

McKINSTRY, J., specially concurring.—Section 1205 of the Penal Code cannot be dove-tailed into section 330 so that the two together may be read as defining the punishment applicable to the crime named in 330. Section 330 provides that one found guilty of dealing, etc., any of the games mentioned is punishable by fine, “and shall be imprisoned until such fine and costs of prosecution are paid, such imprisonment not to exceed one year.” The costs of prosecution are a different thing from the fine, and in section 330 the two things are spoken of as different. There can be no doubt that a person imprisoned under a judgment rendered according to section 1205 is entitled to his discharge when he has been imprisoned for a number of days equal to the number of dollars’ fine, although he has paid no portion of the fine or costs. He cannot be detained to “work out” the amount of costs at a dollar a day. But section 330 expressly provides that the person found guilty of the offense therein defined shall be imprisoned for a year, unless, in the mean time, he shall pay the fine “and costs of prosecution.” In such case he is not entitled to his discharge on payment of the whole of the fine (without the costs), nor is he entitled to his discharge at the expiration of a number of days equal to the number of dollars’ fine, or equal to the number of dollars of any portion of the fine remaining unpaid. He must remain in jail for the period of a year, unless he shall pay the costs as well as the whole of the fine. As under section 330 the costs of prosecution can be satisfied only by a payment, or by a year’s imprisonment, and as the fine and costs cannot be satisfied separately, in such manner as to relieve the party of any portion of the year’s imprisonment, section 1205 can have no application to judgments rendered upon conviction under section 330.

E. B. YOUNG, RESPONDENT, v. THOMAS S. MILLER ET AL., THOMAS S. MILLER, APPELLANT.

PROMISSORY NOTE — INDORSER — PLEADING — DEMURRER.— In an action against the maker and indorser of a promissory note, the complaint alleged in substance among other things that the note was presented at maturity to the maker for payment, but was not paid, whereof the indorser had due notice. The indorser demurred on the ground of the insufficiency of this allegation, and the demurrer was overruled. Held, that the allegation was sufficient, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

ID.—ANSWER — DENIAL.— The answer of the indorser denied that he had due or legal notice of the presentment of the note for payment, or the non-payment thereof. Held, that no issue of fact was raised by this denial.

ID.—ACCOMMODATION INDORSER — TENDER.— An alleged tender by the indorser held to be bad because the amount tendered was less than the sum due by the terms of the note, although he was an accommodation indorser, and the plaintiff had purchased the note of the maker at a discount.

ATTACHMENT — FEES OF SHERIFF.— Where an attachment is levied on separate pieces of real estate, the sheriff is entitled to fees for each levy.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing to retax costs.

The only defense was by the indorser, and judgment was rendered against him on the pleadings. The additional facts sufficiently appear in the head notes and opinion of the court.

P. B. Ladd, and Wilson & Otis, for Appellant.

John H. B. Wilkins, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The allegation of presentation of the note to the maker, the non-payment, and notice thereof to the indorser are sufficiently alleged. The denial of the defendant that he had due or legal notice of the presentation of the note to the maker for payment, and the non-payment thereof raised no issue of fact; and the allegations that defendant was an accommodation indorser, that the plaintiff purchased the note of the maker at a discount, and that the defendant tendered to the plaintiff the sum which he paid for the note with interest and cost of protest, constituted no defense to the action, because the amount tendered was less than the sum due by the terms of the note; and it was not error to render judgment for the plaintiff upon the pleadings. The levy of the attachment upon each separate piece of real estate constituted an independent levy on the property. In this case there were three distinct levies, for each of which the sheriff was entitled to the fees allowed "for levying an attachment on property."

Judgment and order affirmed.

Hearing in Bank denied.

WILLIAM BROWN, APPELLANT, v. ELIZA DELAVAL,
RESPONDENT.

PRACTICE—COSTS IN INJUNCTION SUITS WHERE JUDGMENT IS LESS THAN THREE HUNDRED DOLLARS.—In an action to enjoin the continuation of a wrongful act, and for damages already sustained thereby, a judgment for fifty dollars damages, but for no part of the equitable relief demanded, will not carry costs.

ID.—EXCEPTION TO ORDERS MADE AFTER JUDGMENT.—The appellate court will not review an order made after judgment unless it is excepted to.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco striking out a cost bill.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. B. Hart, for Appellant.

C. H. Parker, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—The plaintiff in his complaint demanded that the defendant be enjoined from throwing earth upon her land in such a manner that it would fall upon the plaintiff's land, and a judgment for five hundred dollars against the defendant for damages already sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the throwing of earth upon his land by the defendant. He recovered judgment for fifty dollars damages, but for no part of the equitable relief demanded in the complaint. He filed a bill of costs, which the court on motion of defendant ordered stricken from the files. From that order this appeal is taken.

The case as presented by the record is not distinguishable in principle from Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259, in which we said: "The plaintiff recovered a judgment for fifty dollars damages and the costs of the action. We think that the court erred in giving the plaintiff a judgment for costs. It is true that the plaintiff prayed an injunction, but this was denied, and the action thereafter should be treated as one for damages only. It is quite clear that a judgment for fifty dollars damages in such an action would not carry costs."

Besides, it does not appear that the order was excepted to, and we cannot review an order made after judgment unless it is. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 646, 647, 651.)

Order affirmed.

R. B. BUCKNER, PETITIONER, v. W. P. VEUVE,
RESPONDENT.

PROHIBITION — QUO WARRANTO — OFFICE.—Prohibition will not lie to prevent the usurpation of an office. Quo warranto is the proper remedy.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition. The petitioner was elected justice of the peace of San Jose Township at the election held January 8, 1883. The respondent was elected justice of the peace for the city of San Jose under the provisions of section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure. By virtue of the Act of March 17, 1874, the petitioner, as justice of the peace of the township, is ex-officio police justice or judge of the police court of the city of San Jose.

Petitioner alleged that on March 22, 1883, the respondent ousted him of the office of police judge for the city of San Jose, and wrongfully assumed to discharge the duties of that office, and prayed for a writ of prohibition, commanding the respondent to desist and refrain from discharging the duties of the office.

Wm. B. Hardy, for Petitioner.

PER CURIAM.—Quo warranto lies to prevent the usurpation of an office. Prohibition is not available as a remedy for that purpose.

Application for a writ of prohibition denied.

A. M. EASTON ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. M. O'REILLY ET AL., E. W. BURR, E. F. NORTHAM, AND HENRY JONES, APPELLANTS.

EJECTMENT—PRACTICE—AMENDING COMPLAINT—PARTIES—LANDLORD AND TENANT.—The action was ejectment. The complaint was filed in 1874, against defendants Burr and O'Reilly, who answered. In 1875, the complaint was amended naming as defendants O'Reilly, Northam, Burr, Silva, and John Doe Jones. In 1878, a second amended complaint was filed naming as defendants O'Reilly, one Haubricht, Burr, Northam, Silva, Henry Jones, John Doe, Richard Roe, and Peter Roe. The evidence showed that O'Reilly was not in possession when the suit was brought, and that he had sold the property just before the commencement of the action to Burr and Northam. From the time of the sale to Burr and Northam, and for several months after the complaint was filed Jones was in possession as tenant of Burr and Northam. Haubricht succeeded Jones and was in possession under a lease at the time of filing the second amended complaint. The court granted a nonsuit as to O'Reilly, Haubricht, and Silva, but refused it as to Jones. Defendants then moved for a nonsuit as to Burr and Northam on the ground that it was not proven that either of them was in possession personally or was the landlord of any defendant who was in possession at the time the action was commenced against such defendant; which motion was denied. Held, that no error was committed.

ID.—SWAMP LANDS—EVIDENCE—ACTS OF 1858 AND 1868.—The Act of the Legislature of 1858 did not forbid the sale of swamp and overflowed lands within the limits of five miles beyond the city and county of San Francisco, and where a certificate of purchase had issued under that act for lands within those limits, the Act of 1868 and amendments thereto containing a prohibition against the sale of such lands, do not defeat the rights of the purchaser, or those claiming under him, to a patent.

ID.—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The plaintiffs claimed title to the land under a patent from the State therefor as swamp and overflowed, issued in 1871, and following a certificate of purchase issued in 1859. The defendants pleaded the Statute of Limitations, and offered to prove an actual, exclusive, and continuous occupation and possession by them and their grantors under claim of title against all the world, for more than ten years before the issuing of the patent, and more than fifteen years before the commencement of the action, and that neither the State nor any one claiming under the State had received the rents, issues, or profits of the premises within that period. The action was commenced on the 20th of January, 1874, one of the defendants against whom the judgment was rendered being named in the original complaint, and the others in the first amended complaint filed on the 8th of March, 1875. Nothing was said in the offer as to the time at which the land had been certified to the State by the commissioner of the general land office as swamp and overflowed land. Held, that the offer was properly rejected.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts sufficiently appear in the head notes and opinion of the court.

A. N. Drown, and E. W. McGraw, for Appellants.

The nonsuit as to Henry Jones should have been granted. He was first made a defendant March 8, 1875. The only testimony as to his possession of the premises is that of defendant E. W. Burr, who says: "Haubricht went in under lease from Burr and Northam, about the middle of 1874. From December 10, 1873, until Haubricht went in, defendant Jones was in possession as tenant of Burr and Northam."

This evidence discloses the fact that Jones was the party as against whom the action should originally have been commenced, but he was not made a party to the original action, and when he first became a party in 1875, he was no longer in possession, but had yielded possession to Haubricht. (Lawrence v. Ballou, 50 Cal. 258.)

The motions for nonsuit in the cases of Burr and Northam rest on a different principle.

Burr was an original party defendant, Northam came in as defendant for the first time in 1875. The evidence fails to disclose that either one had a possessio pedis of the land in controversy at the time the action was commenced, or at any time thereafter.

The action was barred by sections 315 and 316 of the Code of Civil Procedure, defendant having been in the exclusive, actual, and continued possession and occupation of the premises for more than ten years.

Taylor & Haight, for Respondents.

MYRIOK, J.—This is an action of ejectment. The plaintiffs had judgment as to defendants Burr, Northam, and H. Jones, who have appealed.

The suit was commenced January 20, 1874, against Burr and one O'Reilly, who were served and answered. March 8, 1875, the plaintiffs filed an amended complaint, naming as defendants O'Reilly, Northam, Burr, Silva, and John Doe Jones. A second amended complaint (on which, and answers thereto, the action was tried) was filed August 29, 1878, naming as defendants O'Reilly, one Haubricht, Burr, Northam, Silva, Henry Jones, John Doe, Peter Roe, and Richard Roe, the last three being stated to be fictitious names. The defendants answered, alleging that the cause of action was barred by sections 315, 316, 318, 319, and 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

(On the trial plaintiffs gave in evidence a patent of the State of California (swamp and overflowed lands), dated November 29, 1871, to themselves; also a certificate of purchase, dated September 9, 1859, to F. P. Tracy, together with evidence to show that they had acquired the right of F. P. Tracy under the certificate.

First. The evidence as to possession showed that O'Reilly was not in possession when the suit was commenced, January 20, 1874. He had been in possession, and on the 10th of December, 1873, executed a deed to Burr and Northam, who have ever since claimed to own the land. From December 10, 1873 (when Burr and Northam took the deed from O'Reilly), until about the middle of 1874, defendant Jones was in possession as tenant of Burr and Northam, at which latter time Haubricht went in under lease from them; Haubricht was in possession at the time of filing the second amended complaint, by which he was made a party. It will thus be seen that when the suit was commenced, January 20, 1874, Burr and O'Reilly were not proper parties defendant. O'Reilly was made a party, but was not in possession; Jones was in possession, but was not made a party; and Burr being out of actual possession, was not joined with his tenant Jones.

By the first amended complaint, O'Reilly was again erroneously made a party; and Silva, Jones, Northam, and Burr were joined with him. In the second amended complaint the error as to O'Reilly was repeated; Haubricht (then in possession) was joined, as were his landlords Burr and Northam.

On motion of defendants' counsel the court granted nonsuit as to defendants O'Reilly, Haubricht, and Silva, and denied their motion for nonsuit as to Jones. The defendants then moved for nonsuit as to defendants Burr and Northam, and each of them, on the ground that it was not proven that either of them was in possession personally, or was the landlord of any defendant who was in possession at the time the action was commenced as against such defendant. As to these motions and rulings we have to say, the motion was properly granted as to O'Reilly and Silva, it was properly denied as to Jones—he was not in possession at either of the times when he was named as defendant, to wit, March 8, 1875, and August 29, 1878, but he was in possession when the suit was commenced, January 20, 1874; and when the complaint was amended March 8, 1875, and again August 20, 1878, the amended complaints respectively took the place of the preceding complaint. “The amended complaint supersedes the original, but there is no dismissal of the action. It simply takes the place of the other. No new or different action is commenced, and no new cause of action is introduced. There is no change in the identity of the cause of action. That is the same as before, and the commencement of the action dates from the filing of the original complaint and issuing of summons thereon.” (Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 501; Jones v. Frost, 28 Cal. 246.) The motion was properly denied as to Burr and Northam—their tenant Jones was in when the suit was commenced; he was a proper party, being in possession (Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623), and they were properly joined with him (§ 879, Code Civ. Proc.); the granting of the motion as to Haubricht would not entitle the landlords to a nonsuit, Jones being in possession as their tenant when the suit was commenced; the plaintiffs were entitled to pursue their action.

Second. The defendants assert that the land in controversy is located within five miles of the city and county of San Francisco, and claim that the patent is therefore void under section 70, Statutes 1869–70, p. 877. Conceding that the land is within the limits mentioned, it is sufficient answer to say that it appears from the certificate of purchase that the State received, September 9, 1859, payment in full for the land, and issued its certificate of purchase under the Act of 1858. (Statutes 1858, p. 198.)

The Act of 1858 did not forbid the sale of lands within the limits of five miles beyond the city and county of San Francisco. The purchaser had acquired vested rights under that act; by the terms of that act (§ 7) the purchaser or his assignee or legal representatives would be entitled to a patent after the lands should have been confirmed to the State. The Act of March 28, 1868 (Statutes 1867–68, p. 528, § 70), and the Act of April 4, 1870 (Statutes 1869-70), amendatory thereof, containing the prohibition against the sale of swamp and overflowed, salt marsh, and tide lands, within five miles of the city and county of San Francisco, did not pretend to, nor would they, defeat the right of the purchaser under the Act of 1858, or those claiming under him, to a patent.

Third. The defendants offered to prove that they and those under whom they claim had been in the exclusive, actual, and continued occupation and possession of the premises, claiming to own the same as against all the world, for more than ten years prior to the issuance of the patent to plaintiffs, and for more than fifteen years prior to the commencement of this action; also that the State, or any one claiming under the State, had not received the rents, issues, or profits of the premises within that period. The giving of the testimony was objected to, and the objection was sustained.

This court held in Manly v. Howlett, 55 Cal. 94, regarding swamp and overflowed lands, that the certificate of purchase did not pass the title as title; that in a suit for the recovery of the land commenced after the issuance of the patent, the Statute of Limitations cannot be held to have commenced running prior to the date of the patent. The counsel for defendants, in commenting upon the application of the decision in that case to the case now before us, urge that sections 315 and 316 were not involved in that case, and therefore that decision has no application here. In a recent case in this court (Wright v. Rosebery, 63 Cal. 252), we had occasion to comment upon the effect of the acts of Congress regarding swamp and overflowed lands, especially the Acts of September 28, 1850, and July 23, 1866, requiring the commissioner of the general land office to certify swamp and overflowed lands to the State. Although the Act of 1850 was a general grant to the State of all swamp and overflowed lands within the State, yet the character of swamp and overflowed would not be definitely fixed upon a specific tract until the action of the proper federal officers; and the offer of the defendants did not embrace the proof that such action was had more than ten years before the suit was commenced. It is true the plaintiffs did not prove such action; but their patent raised the presumption that all necessary steps had been taken. Even conceding (which we do not) that if the land had been certified to the State more than ten years before the commencement of the action, it would have been barred by sections 315 and 316, Code of Civil Procedure, we are of opinion that the offer of defendants did not embrace sufficient to present a defense to the plaintiffs' right of recovery.

We see no error in the record prejudicial to the appellants. The judgment is affirmed.

SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, RESPONDENT, v.
ALONZO E. HORTON ET AL., APPELLANTS.

APPEAL — DISMISSAL — ENTRY AND CORRECTION OF DECREE.— Where a decree of foreclosure is entered and subsequently, by order of the court, corrected as to a clerical error in the amounts, an appeal taken more than one year after the entry of the decree, but less than one year after the order correcting it, will be dismissed.

APPEAL from a decree of foreclosure of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order amending the decree, and from a judgment of deficiency.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

George N. Williams, for Appellant.

A. N. Drown, for Respondent.

The appeal is too late. (Code Civ. Proc. § 939, sub. 1; Thomas v. Anderson, 55 Cal. 45; McLaughlin v. Dougherty, 54 Cal. 519.)

The court always has power to correct errors in computation and clerical errors made by itself or officers, and to cause its decrees to be amended accordingly nunc pro tunc as of the date of original entry. (Freeman on Judgments, 67-71; Rousset v.

Boyle, 45 Cal. 69; Estate of Schroeder, 46 Cal. 316; Smith v. Kennedy, 63 Ala. 334.)

MYRICK, J.—The notice of appeal in this case states that the appeal is taken from the decree of foreclosure and sale entered August 4, 1880, from the amended decree entered October 8, 1880, and from the judgment of deficiency docketed December 2, 1880.

The decree of foreclosure was made in open court August 2, 1880, and was recorded August 4, 1880. The transcript before us shows no subsequent action of the court, except that in the decree of August 2, 1880, in stating the amount due on the mortgage at "forty-seven thousand seven hundred and eighty-three 42-100 dollars," the "seven," "seven," and "eighty-three 42-100" are erased with ink lines, and the words "four," "five," and "thirty-six" interlined, also in ink, in two separate places, making the decree read that the amount due was "forty-four thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars"; and on the margin is written "decree amended by order of court entered October 8, 1880; attest William A. Stuart, clerk." No docketing of any judgment for deficiency appears in the transcript. The notice of appeal was given September 15, 1881.

The notice of appeal was given too late. It should have been given within one year after August 4, 1880, the day when the decree was entered. The fact that the court on the 8th of October following corrected its decree as to the figures did not change the day of the entry of the decree; it was already entered. Doubtless by clerical error wrong figures were stated in the decree, and the court, perhaps of its own motion, as it had the legal right to do, corrected the error so as to make the record speak the truth.

The case before us is not such a case as would have been presented, if the decree of August 4th had been set aside, and another decree entered October 8th; it is merely a correction of amounts, not the entry of a new decree.

Appeal dismissed.

JAMES D. WALKER ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. LAURA L. BUFFANDEAU ET AL., JOHN H. WISE, AND THOMAS DENIGAN, APPELLANTS.

PLEADINGS — DEFECTIVE ALLEGATIONS AND DENIALS — OBJECTIONS ON APPEAL.— Certain defective allegations and denials, not objected to in the court below, sustained on appeal, and the objections to them overruled.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE — TWO MORTGAGES ON THE SAME DAY — RECORDING — EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTION.— Where two mortgages are executed and delivered on the same day, but recorded on different days, no presumption arises from the mere fact of recording as to their priority, nor does this fact tend to prove that the one first recorded was executed and delivered before the other.

ID.— FINDINGS — CONCLUSION OF LAW.— A finding as to the priority of the mortgages, stated as a conclusion of law, and based upon facts previously found, but not justified thereby, held, to be merely a conclusion of law, and not a finding of fact.

APPEAL from a judgment of the late District Court of the Fourth Judicial District, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Tully B. Wise, and E. P. Cole, for Appellants.

The mortgages being dated on the same day, are, in point of law, simultaneous, and must be decreed to be paid equally.

The court based its idea solely upon recording.

The recording acts do not give priority, they only protect the mortgage from being postponed to a subsequent bona fide encumbrancer. Under no circumstance does recording make priority of execution.

Section 1213 of the Civil Code makes every conveyance recorded, notice. Section 1214 makes it void as against a purchaser or mortgagee in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first recorded. This was the error of the lower court.

Between a purchaser in good faith, and a bona fide purchaser under the recording acts, there is no distinction. (Grimstone v. Carter, 24 Am. Dec. 230; Withers v. Little, 56 Cal. 370; James v. Morey, 14 Am. Dec. 475; Union Canal Co. v. Young, 30 Ill. 212.)

Sidney V. Smith & Son, for Respondents.

The facts found by the court are sufficient to sustain the ultimate conclusion, that the plaintiffs' mortgage was the superior one.

The plaintiffs' mortgage having been first recorded, the presumption is that it was in fact prior; and, there being no fact to destroy that presumption, the law will draw its conclusion in accordance with it. This is a case, therefore, of the probative facts being all found, and comes within the rule of People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171.

The finding that "the plaintiffs' said mortgage is a lien upon the premises described in the complaint prior and superior to the lien of the mortgage of the defendants Wise and Denigan," is a finding of fact. (Frazier v. Crowell, 52 Cal. 401.)

And it will be taken to support the judgment, although placed among the conclusions of law. (Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 192.)

PER CURIAM.—The action is to foreclose a mortgage executed by Buffandeau, deceased. With respect to the appellants (defendants Wise and Denigan), the allegation of the complaint is: "The defendants claim some right, title, interest, or estate in or to the said premises, subsequent, however, to said mortgage and subject thereto." To this appellants answered: "Defendants admit that they have an interest in said premises by way of mortgage from E. B. Buffandeau, dated the 18th day of April, 1877, to secure a promissory note," etc. "And they further allege they have no information or belief sufficient to enable them to answer the allegation of the complaint, that the claims of the defendants are subsequent, however, to said mortgage to plaintiffs and subject thereto, and so deny that their mortgage is subsequent or subject to the mortgage of said plaintiffs."

It is said by respondents that the portion of the answer above quoted raises no issue. It is urged, in the first place, the defendants could not base a denial that their interest, in the mortgaged premises, was subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage, upon an alleged ignorance of the facts. It has been held, very often, that where the fact alleged is such as that its existence or non-existence must, from its nature, be known to the opposing party, such party cannot be permitted to plead ignorance, or deny "upon information and belief." In such cases the party alleging a matter as a fact is entitled to an explicit denial, or to an admission. (Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 62; Brown v. Scott, 25 Cal. 189; Richardson v. Wilton, 4 Sandf. 708; Sherman v. N. Y. Central Mills, 1 Abb. Pr. 188; Chapman v. Palmer, 12 How. Pr. 37; Fales v. Hicks, 12 How. Pr. 154; Hance v. Rumming, 2 Smith, E. D. 48; Ketcham v. Zerega, 1 Smith, E. D. 553.)

It is said by respondents, in the second place, that the answer is evasive; it is not an express denial of the fact alleged. It is insisted that the answer does not even deny knowledge of the verity or falsehood of the averment actually made, but sets up a supposititious averment, and then alleges defendants' ignorance with respect to such averment; that, while the complaint alleges any right, or title, or interest, or estate, which defendants may have in the premises, to be subject or subordinate to plaintiffs' lien, the answer only declares defendants to be ignorant of the truth of a pretended averment "that the claims of the defendants are subsequent," etc.

Appellants, on the other hand, contend that the allegation of the complaint is insufficient to constitute a cause of action against them; that the allegation is, defendants "claim" some right, title, interest, or estate subsequent, etc.; that is to say, that defendants claim that such interest as they have is subsequent and subject to plaintiffs' mortgage.

If the plaintiffs had objected to the form of the denial in the court below the defendants might have been compelled to admit or deny expressly the allegation that their interest (as mortgagees) was subsequent and subject to plaintiffs' lien. The plaintiffs' further objection to the answer, and the objection of appellants to the complaint, cannot be considered here. The answer is as broad as the complaint, and the complaint does not entirely fail to state a cause of action. Admitting that a complaint in foreclosure should allege that an asserted right of a third party in the mortgaged premises "is subsequent and subject to" plaintiffs' lien, there is here an attempt to state the fact, which, if inartificial or imperfect, should have been specially objected to by demurrer or otherwise. The court below tried the issue of priority, as to which both parties introduced evidence, found certain facts bearing upon such issue, and concluded, as matter of law, that the mortgage of defendants was subsequent and subject to the mortgage of plaintiffs. There is no bill of exceptions, and, so far as appears, there was no motion by either party for judgment upon the pleadings, nor was the attention of the court called, by any special objection or application, to defects in the complaint or answer. Under these circumstances the interests of justice cannot be subserved by giving effect to points first made in this court.

Treating the pleadings as presenting the issue — "Is the defendant's mortgage subsequent and subject to plaintiffs' lien?" — it remains to inquire whether the court found upon that issue.

The District Court, amongst other facts, found that the mortgage to plaintiffs was executed and delivered April 18, 1877, and recorded the same day; that the mortgage to appellants was made and delivered April 18, 1877, and recorded April 26, 1877. In other words, that the mortgages were made and delivered on the same day, but plaintiffs' mortgage was first recorded.

As "a conclusion of law" from these facts the court found plaintiffs' mortgage as a lien upon the premises described in the complaint prior and superior to the lien of the mortgage of the defendants Wise and Denigan aforesaid.

It is urged by respondents, the fact that plaintiffs' mortgage was first recorded creates the presumption that it was prior.

Even if the prior record of the plaintiffs' mortgage created a presumption that their mortgage was first executed and delivered, such would not be a conclusive legal presumption, but a presumption which could be rebutted by satisfactory evidence. Hence the finding of the fact of previous record would not necessarily establish the plaintiffs' priority. Since Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 552, it has not been doubted that "findings" must be either of the ultimate facts, or of such probative facts as will enable the court to declare that the ultimate facts "necessarily result therefrom." The ultimate fact of priority of execution does not necessarily result from the finding of the prior registry of plaintiffs' mortgage. The plaintiffs' mortgage may have been first recorded and yet the appellants' mortgage been first executed and delivered.

Nevertheless, it would seem, that if the prior record of the mortgage created a presumption that it was executed and delivered before appellants' mortgage, or if the prior record even tended to prove plaintiffs' priority, the "conclusion of law" of the court below, "that plaintiffs' lien was prior and superior to the lien of defendants' mortgage," might be treated as a finding of the ultimate fact of plaintiffs' priority. Where, on the question of the ratification of a note, the findings embraced several facts tending to establish it, and then a conclusion from them that there had been a full ratification and confirmation, it was held, that such conclusion was the ultimate fact to be ascertained; that it was none the less a finding of fact because it was stated as a conclusion. (Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180.) But unless the previous findings, in some degree, tend to prove the ultimate fact, it is manifest that the conclusion (as in this case) "from the foregoing facts," must be treated as what it purports to be — a conclusion of law from the facts previously recited.

Why should the fact that one of two instruments made on the same day was first recorded be considered to create any presumption that the instrument was executed and delivered at an earlier hour of the day than the other? There is nothing in the nature of the mere fact of record which tends to prove the independent fact of prior execution and delivery. Nor is there any language in the statute which can be construed to make a prior record evidence of a prior execution. Sections 1213 and 1214 of the Civil Code read:—

"Sec. 1213. Every conveyance of real property, acknowledged or proved, and certified and recorded as prescribed by law, from the time it is filed with the recorder for record, is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees.

"Section 1214. Every conveyance of real property other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year is void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded."

Section 1213 declares that the filing for record of a conveyance, with the recorder, shall be constructive notice of its contents to "subsequent purchasers and mortgagees." And 1214, that a conveyance, not recorded, shall be void "as against any subsequent purchaser, or mortgagee, . . . in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded."

So far as the date of the execution of an instrument is concerned, the record of it, or a certified copy of its record, creates no other presumption than the production of the original would create, the presumption that it was made when it purports to have been made.

In the case before us, both mortgages were recorded on different days, both purport to have been made on the same day, and the court below found both were in fact executed and delivered on the same day. In the absence of a finding with respect to priority of delivery, we might presume, perhaps, the delivery of the two to have been contemporaneous. We certainly cannot presume the plaintiffs' mortgage was first executed and delivered because it was first recorded, nor does the fact it was first recorded tend to prove its prior execution and delivery.

The decree cannot be allowed to stand. Except that the court (the District Court) in which the cause was tried has gone out of existence we might remand the cause with directions that the court below, upon the evidence already taken and such further relevant evidence as might be introduced, find the facts necessary to a proper determination. But this course is now apparently impracticable. A new trial seems necessary.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHN O'KANE, RESPONDENT, v. JAMES DALY ET AL., HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, APPELLANT.

APPEAL — SERVICE OF NOTICE — DISMISSAL.—The plaintiff brought this suit to be discharged from a trust under an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, several other creditors, and the assignors were made defendants. The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society and some others denied certain allegations of the complaint, and asked that the assignment be declared void. The assignors and several of the defendants consented to a judgment discharging the plaintiff. The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society appealed, and served the notice on the plaintiff alone, who moved to dismiss the appeal. Held, that the motion should be granted for want of service of the notice of appeal on each of the parties interested in the judgment.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Respondent moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no proper service of the notice of appeal had been made. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Edward P. Cole, for the motion.

The notice of appeal not being addressed to any of the other defendants, and not being served on them of course does not give this court jurisdiction to determine any question in the judgment in which they are interested, or by which they may be affected. Daly and Hawkins have an interest in the validity of this assignment; this makes them adverse parties. (§§ 938, 940, Code Civ. Proc.)

All the defendants are interested in who shall be assignee. They are interested in the costs. Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to, or will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment, is an adverse party, whether he is plaintiff or defendant. (Senter v. Bernal, 38 Cal. 640; Cotes v. Carroll, 28 How. Pr. 446; Hiscock v. Phelps, 2 Lans. 118; Thompson v. Ellsworth, 1 Barb. Ch. 627.)

Tobin & Tobin, contra.

THORNTON, J.—This action is brought by O'Kane to be discharged from a trust under an assignment made to him as assignee by Daly and Hawkins for the benefit of creditors, under the provisions of the Civil Code. Several of the creditors were made parties defendant, among others the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society. Daly and Hawkins were also made defendants.

The society above named answered, denied several allegations of the complaint, and among other matters alleged that the assignment to O'Kane was void, and asked that it be so adjudged. Mary and Jane O'Meara also in their answer asked that the assignment be adjudged null.

Daly and Hawkins and several other defendants consented that a judgment should be entered discharging the assignee from the trusts of the assignment, and in accordance with the prayer of complaint. The society and the O'Mearas did not join in this consent. Judgment was rendered and entered in favor of plaintiff, discharging him from the trusts above mentioned. The judgment embraced other matters not necessary to be here mentioned. The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society alone prosecutes this appeal.

A motion is made by counsel for respondent O'Kane to dismiss this appeal, on the ground that no proper service of notice of appeal has been made. The notice of appeal was served on plaintiff alone.

We are of opinion that the co-defendants of the appellant were all interested in the judgment, and would be affected by its reversal, and by consequence the notice of appeal should have been served on each of them. (Senter v. Bernal, 38 Cal. 640; Hiscock v. Phelps, 2 Lans. 118; Cotes v. Carroll, 28 How. Pr. 446; Thompson v. Ellsworth, 1 Barb. Ch. 627.)

The only appeal attempted to be taken in the case is from the judgment, and as such appeal was not properly taken, we cannot consider any one of the various orders to which our attention has been called, no one of them being appealable.

The motion to dismiss the appeal must be granted. So ordered.

EJECTMENT BY LESSOR — EXPIRATION OF LEASE PENDING ACTION.— Lessees in the actual possession of land from which they are ousted by an intruder, without title or color of right, may recover the possession in an action commenced during the continuance of the lease, though not tried until after its expiration.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was ejectment. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

J. B. Crockett, and Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for Appellant.

George A. Nourse, for Respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—The counsel for defendant insists that although the plaintiffs were in the actual possession and occupation of the demanded premises at the time of the entry and ouster by the defendant, their possession was not of that kind which would enable them to maintain an action of ejectment against any one who might enter upon the premises by force and violence. And this insistence is based upon certain allegations in the complaint to the effect that one Naphtaly was at the time of the commencement of the action, and for more than five years prior thereto had been, the owner, and, by himself and his tenants, in the possession of said premises, and that in the month of September, 1873, said Naphtaly leased to the plaintiffs said premises, and that they entered upon the possession thereof and remained in such possession until evicted therefrom by the defendant in the month of January, 1879. "That, at the expiration of the term described in said lease, to wit, in the month of September, 1878, said lease was renewed by mutual agreement of said plaintiffs and said Naphtaly for one year"; and that at the date of the commencement of the action (June 28, 1879) said lease was in full force. From which the learned counsel for appellant argues that "if any one could then, at the expiration of the written lease, have maintained ejectment against the defendant, it was Naphtaly, the landlord, but instead of resorting to this remedy, he made an oral lease to the plaintiffs for a term of one year, which expired September 18, 1879, and the action was commenced June 28, 1879. The only possible ground on which they could then maintain ejectment against the defendant was that, as tenants of Naphtaly, the owner, under the lease for one year (which was then in force), they were entitled to be let into the possession of the demised premises by virtue of that lease. If it be conceded that they then had a good cause of action on that ground, the trouble is that the oral lease expired by its terms within less than three months after the commencement of the action, and about one year before the trial. The law is well settled that the plaintiff in ejectment must be entitled to the possession both at the commencement of the action and at the time of the trial to entitle him to a judgment of restitution."

Briefly stated the argument is this, that as the entry and ouster occurred before the expiration of the first written lease, the plaintiffs' right of action terminated at the termination of that lease, and was not renewed by the renewal of it; and conceding that under the new lease they were entitled to be let into possession and might maintain an action to recover it, they could not recover it after the expiration of said last mentioned lease, although they commenced their action before the expiration of it. It is alleged in the complaint that the entry and ouster by the defendant were in the month of January, 1879; and that the plaintiffs were then holding under the lease of September, 1878, which at the alleged date of said entry and ouster had several months to run. So that the complaint does not show that the alleged cause of action arose before the expiration of the first or written lease, but that it arose while the plaintiffs were holding under the second or oral lease. And it appears by the last brief filed by counsel for appellant that he so understands it. He says: "The complaint avers that the defendant entered in January, 1879, during the pendency of the one year lease, and the action was commenced in June, 1879, and the trial commenced on September 20, 1880, more than one year after the expiration of the oral lease."

At the date of the commencement of the action the lease had several months to run, but it had expired before the trial commenced. Therefore the appellant claims that it appears by the complaint that the plaintiffs at the time of the trial were not entitled to the possession of the demanded premises, and consequently not entitled to a judgment for restitution. The plaintiffs, however, do show that at the time the action was commenced they had a right to recover, and unless it appears that such right terminated during the pendency of the action, the verdict and judgment in their favor ought not to be disturbed on that ground. And this leads to the inquiry, does it appear in this case that the plaintiffs' right to recover terminated during the pendency of the action? Appellant's counsel insists that it does, and that it appears on the face of the complaint. And he relies upon the allegation that in the month of September, 1878, the plaintiffs took from Naphtaly a lease of the premises for one year, and as that term would expire before the action was tried, it is claimed that the plaintiffs' right terminated during the pendency of the action.

In none of the cases cited by counsel on this point did it appear that the plaintiffs' right to recover terminated during the pendency of the action, but that he had no right when he commenced his action, and sought to recover upon a right acquired during the pendency of the action. And the court simply said that, "to a recovery in ejectment the plaintiff must not only have a right of entry at the trial, but must have had it when the suit was brought." (Kile v. Tubbs, 32 Cal. 332.)

A complaint in ejectment need show no more than that at the time of the commencement of the action the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the demanded premises, and that the same is unlawfully withheld from him by the defendant. It need not show that the plaintiff will be entitled to such possession at any future period of time. As was said in Pico v. Pico, 56 Cal. 453, there is nothing in our Code which provides for anticipatory pleading.

In this case it did not appear by the complaint that the right to recover would terminate before the action was tried, because no attempt was made to predict when it would be tried. There was at least a possibility that it might be tried before the expiration of the lease under which the plaintiffs held when they commenced their action. If no mention had been made of any lease in the complaint, and all the facts alleged in regard to leases had been first brought out in the evidence, we might hold, on the authority of Foscalina v. Doyle, 47 Cal. 437, that "if the defendant intended to rely upon the fact that the plaintiff's right to the possession had expired during the pendency of the action, the fact should have been pleaded in a supplemental answer."

The complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the defendant did not move for judgment before the trial on the ground that it appeared on the face of the complaint the plaintiffs' right to recover had terminated during the pendency of the action, which he might have done if his present position be tenable. We therefore conclude that the only way in which advantage could be taken of the fact which it is here sought to take advantage of, would be by pursuing the course pointed out in Foscalina v. Doyle, supra.

But the allegations in regard to leases are mere surplusage. Strike them all out and sufficient remains to constitute a good complaint in ejectment, and the evidence would be sufficient to justify the verdict. There was evidence tending to prove that the plaintiffs had been in the actual possession of the land in controversy for many years, during which they had cultivated and improved it, and that it was enclosed by a substantial fence. That while they were so in the possession of it the defendant forcibly entered and took possession of it. He attempts to justify such entry on the sole ground of its being made for the purpose of pre-empting the land. But it is now well settled that land occupied, fenced, and cultivated as this is shown by some of the witnesses to have been at the time of such entry, is not open to settlement and entry under the pre-emption laws of the United States. Therefore, as was said in Foscalina v. Doyle, supra, the defendant "being a mere intruder, without title or color of right, the plaintiff was entitled, in virtue of his prior possession, to a judgment of restitution." In such a case it would be immaterial by what right the plaintiff claimed to be in possession. The simple fact that he was in the actual possession at the time of the forcible intrusion would entitle him to recover as against the naked intruder, who had forcibly entered without title or color of right. And it is admitted by appellant's counsel "that if the land be public land of the United States (as this land was) the law, as against a mere trespasser, will presume a grant from the United States to the person who first obtains actual possession." And that presumption as between the person who first obtains actual possession and a mere trespasser is a conclusive presumption. Otherwise it could so easily be overcome as to afford no substantial protection to persons in the actual prior possession of such lands.

Assuming, as we must in this case, that at the time of the defendant's entry the plaintiffs were in the actual possession of the demanded premises, and that at the time of the commencement of their action they were entitled to recover the same, we are of the opinion that that right did not terminate by reason of the expiration during the pendency of the action of the term of the lease between them and a stranger to the action, although it appeared that as between them and their lessor their right to the possession of the premises had terminated during the pendency of the action.

If we are correct in this it follows that there was no substantial error in any of the instructions given to the jury, and the court was justified in modifying the instruction asked by the defendant before giving it.

THE NEVADA BANK OF CALIFORNIA, RESPOND-ENT, v. WILLIAM DRESBACH ET AL., APPELLANTS.

JUDGMENT — JURISDICTION — APPEAL.—Where an appeal from a judgment is heard on the judgment roll, and it appears that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the parties to the action, and the judgment roll fails to disclose any error, the judgment must be affirmed.

Id.—MOTION TO VACATE — AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.—An affidavit of merits is indispensable as the basis of a motion to vacate a judgment.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing to vacate the judgment.

The grounds of the motion to vacate the judgment were that pending the action the defendants instituted proceedings in insolvency, and were discharged from their debts, including the debt to the plaintiff on which the action was brought. The motion was supported by affidavits, but there was no affidavit of merits apart from the statements made in relation to proceedings and discharge in insolvency, nor were these proceedings brought to the attention of the court until after the judgment was rendered. The additional facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

D. L. Smoot, for Appellants.

The court had no jurisdiction to render judgment. The insolvency court had stayed all proceedings, and had discharged the defendants from all their debts. (Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. 223; Gordon v. Longest, 16 Peters, 97; Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485; Rix v. McHenry, 7 Cal. 89.) Conceding that the court had jurisdiction, still the judgment should have been set aside. (Bennett v. His Creditors, 22 Cal. 42; Imlay v. Carpentier, 14 Cal. 173; Engels v. Lubeck, 4 Cal. 33.) The affidavits filed with the motion, and the papers on file show merits, because they disclose a discharge from the personal obligation to pay the debt. (Freeman v. Campbell, 56 Cal. 639; Hawley v. Campbell, 62 Cal. 442.)

There was no affidavit of merits. (Parrott v. Den, 34 Cal. 80.)

PER CURIAM.—This is an appeal from a final judgment and an order denying a motion to vacate and set it aside.

Defendants were regularly served with process. One of them appeared, demurred, and answered, the other did not. The demurrer was overruled. The case was tried; but at the trial defendants were not present by themselves or counsel, and the court, after hearing the evidence of the plaintiff, gave judgment against both defendants.

The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the persons of the defendants, and there is no error apparent on the face of the judgment roll.

On the motion to vacate the judgment there was no affidavit of merits. Such an affidavit was indispensable as the basis of the motion. (Parrott v. Den, 34 Cal. 79; Francis v. Cox, 33 Cal. 323; Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422; People v. Rains, 23 Cal. 129.)

JOHN GARDNER, RESPONDENT, v. OMNIBUS RAILROAD COMPANY, APPELLANT.

PAYMENT — EVIDENCE.—The action was brought to recover a balance alleged to be due the plaintiff for services rendered by him for the defendant as its superintendent. During the employment, one O'Neill was defendant's secretary and charged with the duty of paying all employees. Every month plaintiff signed and delivered to O'Neill, a receipt for his salary, but left the money with O'Neill, to be drawn from time to time as he desired. Held, that the evidence shows that the plaintiff confided in O'Neill and left the money with him in his individual capacity, and that the defendant is not liable for the loss occasioned by reason of leaving the money in his hands.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Lloyd & Wood, for Appellant.

Geo. W. and W. B. Tyle, for Respondent.

Ross, J.—Plaintiff sued to recover of defendant corporation the sum of eight hundred and two dollars and twenty-one cents, with interest from the 1st day of September, 1876, being a balance alleged to be due the plaintiff, at the date mentioned, for services theretofore rendered by him for defendant as superintendent of its street railroad. Plaintiff was engaged as such superintendent, at a salary of two hundred dollars per month, for many years immediately preceding September 1, 1876. On that day his services terminated. During most of that time he was also one of the directors of the defendant. During the same time one O'Neil was its secretary. When these relations were first assumed the safe that was moved to the defendant's office, to be used as its safe, contained certain papers, jewelry, trinkets and money belonging to the plaintiff, which the latter permitted to remain there, in charge of O'Neil for safe keeping. The secretary was charged with the duty of paying the employees of the defendant, and was furnished with the necessary funds for that purpose, and every month during the plaintiff's term of service, he signed and delivered to the secretary, in writing, a receipt acknowledging the payment by defendant of the full amount of his salary for such month. Such receipts are at least prima facie evidence of the payment of the money.

But the plaintiff seeks to avoid the effect of the receipts by saying that as a matter of fact, when he gave the receipts he did not get the money, but left it with the secretary, to be drawn by him from time to time as he desired. That the plaintiff did leave the money in the hands of O'Neil is quite clear from the record, but that the defendant is not responsible for any loss occasioned thereby we think equally clear. Plaintiff evidently had confidence in O'Neil. According to his own testimony, he left his private papers, jewelry, trinkets, and money made in speculations with him for safe keeping. In the same way, we think, the evidence shows he left his salary. In his testimony, the plaintiff says: "I was a director when Mr. O'Neil was made secretary. He was the secretary and I was the superintendent. We lived in one office for sixteen years and never had a dispute. I signed the receipt for salary because the money was safe. I was superintendent of the company, and whenever I wanted to draw it I knew it was good. I had all that I had as valuables in the safe, and private papers. I had two bags of money, one of foreign and domestic coins that amounted to several hundred dollars, and lots of other things. I never drew my salary money out except that I drew it out on order. Mr. O'Neil kept it there in the safe, and everything else while I was with the Omnibus Railroad Company." And again: "At the time I first commenced doing business in this way with Mr. O'Neil, I told him, this is my old safe, you are carrying the key of it, and my things are all in there, and I am going to make this my bank and going to leave my money with him (O'Neil). I being superintendent and director, I thought it as good as a bank. I will leave it here in the safe all the time. I speculated and made money on the outside, and I carried it there for safe keeping, and Mr. O'Neil always had the keys of that safe. I think Mr. Jordan had the key if he was absent."

Whatever loss occurred to the plaintiff by reason of leaving his salary in O'Neil's hands, the plaintiff must stand. Both he and O'Neil were officers of the defendant. The company furnished the latter with funds with which to pay the wages of its employees, and each month the plaintiff executed his receipt for his salary. So far as the company could see, it was paid in fact, and we think it was paid in contemplation of law as well as of the parties, the plaintiff, for reasons of his own, electing to leave the money in the hands of the individual O'Neil.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded.

JOHN HINKEL, RESPONDENT, v. HIS CREDITORS,
V. D. MOODY, A CREDITOR, APPELLANT.

INSOLVENCY — ASSIGNEE — CREDITOR — FRAUD — OPPOSITION.—Under the insolvent law of 1852, it was competent for the regularly elected assignee, being a schedule creditor, to file a written opposition to the insolvent's discharge on the ground of fraud in wilfully and knowingly omitting property from the schedule and executing sham deeds with intent to defraud creditors. Such an opposition having been stricken out by the court, held, error.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Wilson & Otis, for Appellant.

The striking out of the opposition to insolvent's discharge was error. (See §§ 8 and 10 of the Act of March 4, 1852; Stats. 1852, p. 69.)

The suggestion has been advanced by respondent that Moody had accepted the office of assignee, he is thereby precluded from impeaching the validity of his appointment, which respondent says he is attempting to do by filing this opposition. Judge Sanderson, however, in the case of Wilson v. His Creditors, 32 Cal. 406, 411, in construing section 20 of the act referred to, says:—

“So the creditors may oppose the discharge upon two grounds; first, any supposed illegality in the appointment of the assignee which would raise an issue of law as to the validity and regularity of all the previous proceedings; and second, any supposed fraud on the part of the insolvent, within the meaning of sections twenty-seven to thirty-two, both inclusive, which would raise an issue of fact to be tried by a jury, on a plea of not guilty by the insolvent." The opposition in the case at bar, it will be seen, rests solely on the ground of alleged frauds of the insolvent, and does not in any way pretend to be an attack upon the regularity of the assignee's appointment. That an opposition of this character has been always recognized as proper, and coming within the contemplation of section 20 of the act, we submit is not only conclusively shown by the case last cited, but by numerous other cases of which we content ourselves with citing the following. (Grow v. His Creditors, 31 Cal. 380; Sanborn v. His Creditors, 37 Cal. 609; Lambert v. Slade, 4 Cal. 337.)

Thos. V. O'Brien, for Respondent.

I respectfully submit that, having elected himself and qualified as assignee, appellant waived the right as a creditor to object to his own appointment as assignee.

That having undertaken the trust for all the creditors, he waived the right to object as a creditor to the surrender of the assets of the insolvent to himself, for the benefit of all the creditors.

So long as he continued to act as trustee, he could not seek to destroy their trust.

He would not be permitted to commit felo de ss. He would not be permitted to perpetrate a fraud on his beneficiaries by playing, in his capacity of trustee, into his own hands as attaching creditor. (Sanborn v. His Creditors, 37 Cal. 609; Cohen v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 195; Hastings v. Cunningham, 39 Cal. 144; Story Eq. Jur. § 322; Civil Code, §§ 2228-2234, 2283, 2306; Fox etc. v. Minor, 32 Cal. 112; Page v. Naglee, 6 Cal. 241; Hawley v. Mancius, 7 Johns. Ch. 275; 2 Paige, 603; Bishop on Insolvent Debtors, p. 278, § 293, and p. 127, § 148; Bump on Bankruptcy, 458; Strong v. Willis, 3 Fla. 124; Perry on Trusts, 3d ed. vol. 1, p. 540.)

McKEE, J. — This was a proceeding by Hinkel, the respondent, to be adjudged an insolvent debtor, and discharged from his debts. The proceeding was commenced under the provisions of the Statute of Insolvency passed March 4, 1852. In the schedule filed by the petitioner, Moody, the appellant herein, was named as a creditor to whom the insolvent owed a balance of four thousand dollars upon a promissory note. At a meeting of the creditors of the insolvent on the day fixed by the court for the appointment of an assignee, pursuant to notice given for that purpose, Moody was elected assignee. As such he qualified and entered upon the duties of his office. But as a creditor of the estate he also demurred to the petition of the insolvent, and at the same time filed a written opposition to his discharge upon the grounds that he had committed fraud in wilfully and knowingly omitting from the schedule of his property several parcels of real estate, of which he was really the owner, but for which, before filing his petition in insolvency, he had executed and delivered to his father sham deeds with intent to defraud his creditors.

The court overruled the demurrer, and on motion of the attorney for the insolvent struck from the files the written opposition accusing the insolvent of fraud.

The statute under which the proceeding was had provided for the filing of such an opposition by a schedule creditor of the insolvent, and prescribed the duty of the court with reference to it.

Section 20 provided as follows: "That in case after the appointment of said assignees, any one or more of the creditors of the insolvent debtor should deem it necessary to oppose it, on the ground of some fraud having been committed by the said insolvent debtor, or of the appointment not having been legally made, he shall within ten days next following the appointment of said assignees, lay before the court which has already taken cognizance of the case, his written opposition, stating specially the several facts of nullity of the said appointment, or of fraud by him alleged against the insolvent debtor, whereupon, in case of accusation of fraud, after having received the said insolvent debtor's answer, the court shall order a jury to be summoned of not less than six men, to be summoned in the same manner as juries are summoned in the District Court for the purpose of deciding on the same accusation."

Filed, as the opposition was, within the time prescribed by that section, and by the appellant as a creditor, who had proved and filed his claim according to law, the opposition was a part of the proceeding authorized by the insolvent law; and upon being filed it raised an issue which involved a question of fraud which it was the duty of the insolvent to meet, and the court to hear and determine. This issue the insolvent had the right to meet, either by demurrer or answer to the opposition containing the allegations of fraud. - (Wilson v. His Creditors, 32 Cal. 407.) On failure or refusal to demur or answer, the court, as in ordinary cases, could order a dismissal of the proceeding for failure to prosecute. (Sanborn v. His Creditors, 37 Cal. 609.) On filing an answer the duty was imposed on the court to try and determine the issue as prescribed by sections 20, 21, and 22 of the insolvent law; but until the issue was disposed of on demurrer or answer, it was erroneous to discharge the insolvent.

The fact that the opposition was filed by a creditor who had been elected assignee did not prejudice his right to make it — did not affect its validity nor oust the jurisdiction of the court to hear and decide the issue raised by it. As assignee, he was entitled to all the property of the insolvent from and after the surrender, even if it was not mentioned in the schedule (Poehlmann v. Kennedy, 48 Cal. 201), and when obtained he would hold it in trust for the benefit of all the creditors and of the insolvent himself, subject to the proceeding in which he was acting as assignee. By that relation to the estate he did not waive nor lose any of his rights as a creditor. In his capacity as creditor, he had the right to attack the proceeding in insolvency as a fraud upon the creditors. The Insolvent Statute of 1852 was not intended for the benefit of fraudulent insolvent debtors. (Stat. 1852, §§ 27, 28, 29.) Striking the opposition from the files was therefore erroneous. (Davenport v. His Creditors, 62 Cal. 29.)

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE UPON UPHOLSTERY AND FURNITURE IN HOTEL TO SECURE PURCHASE MONEY.—The action was brought to foreclose a chattel mortgage upon the furniture, carpets, beds, and bedding, and all belongings of whatever nature in and to the Brooklyn Hotel in the city and county of San Francisco, and upon the unexpired term of the lease of the hotel premises, good will, and everything appertaining to the hotel, given to secure the payment of the purchase money of all the property included in the mortgage. Held, that the mortgage being made to secure the purchase money of other property than the furniture and upholstery used in the hotel it is void.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. E. McElrath, and Clement, Osment & Clement, for Appellant.

It does not appear how much was the purchase price of the furniture, and how much that of the other items of the property. As ninety-three hundred dollars was paid, it may be, for aught that appears, that the furniture debt was extinguished. But that is unimportant. The material fact is that the furniture was mortgaged to secure the purchase money of other property in addition to that of the furniture. This is the incurable infirmity in the mortgage which vitiates it.

The provisions of the law, says our Supreme Court, "are plain, simple, and most imperative in their terms. The privilege of holding a lien upon certain kinds of personal property, in the possession of the mortgagor, is accorded to the mortgagee, in certain cases, upon the performance of certain conditions. These conditions are few, and easily performed, and there need be no difficulty, with ordinary care, in fully complying with them. But they are made essential to the validity of the mortgage." (Gassner v. Patterson, 23 Cal. 300, 301; Civil Code, § 2955.)

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — If the mortgage in question was made to secure the purchase money of anything besides one half of the upholstery and furniture used in the Brooklyn Hotel, it is void. (Civil Code, § 2955; Gassner v. Patterson, 23 Cal. 299.)

By the mortgage, "the mortgagor mortgages to the mortgagee his interest, being an undivided one half of all the effects and all belongings, of whatever nature or kind, of, in, and to the hotel in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, known as the Brooklyn Hotel, Nos. 210 and 212 Bush Street, together with all the furniture, carpets, beds and bedding, etc., etc.; also, the unexpired term of the lease of said premises, good will, and all and everything connected with or appertaining to said hotel, as security for the payment to him of the sum of thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) gold coin, on the 24th day of June, A. D. 1877, being the balance due on the purchase money of said and foregoing interest in the effects and things above mentioned, in and to the Brooklyn Hotel."

It is as clear as anything can be, from the loose manner in which the instrument is drafted, that the purchase money intended to be secured by it was the balance due of the purchase money of all the property included in the mortgage, which embraced other property than the upholstery and furniture used in the hotel.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded.

THE PEOPLE, ETC., EX REL. WILLIAM H. KNIGHT
v. WILLIAM BLANDING, RESPONDENT.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — EXTRA SESSION — CONFIRMATIONS BY SENATE.—The constitutional limitation on the power of the legislature when convened in extra session applies only to acts of legislation—the joint action of the Senate and Assembly. Whenever the legislature is lawfully convened, the Senate may confirm appointments made by the governor.

10.—EXPIRATION OF TERM OF OFFICE — APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR.—The respondent, Blanding, was a harbor commissioner under a commission dated March 8, 1878, for a full term of four years. Anticipating the expiration of the term, the governor nominated the relator, Knight, his successor, on the 12th day of April, 1881. The appointment was confirmed by the Senate at the extra session of 1881, and on the 8th day of March, 1882, a commission issued. Held, that the appointment was not invalid because the commission issued on the day on which respondent's term expired.

1D.—CONSTRUCTION OF WORD "AT."—The word "at" as used in section 2520 of the Political Code, to wit: "The governor shall, in like manner, at the expiration of their respective terms, appoint and commission their successors," is indefinite in its meaning, and may mean the exact moment of time, or near it.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The respondent Blanding was on the 4th day of March, 1878, by the governor nominated as a member of the State board of harbor commissioners, on the 6th day of March was confirmed by the Senate, and on the 8th day of March was commissioned to hold for the term of four years. A special session of the legislature, commencing April 4th, was held in the year 1881, pursuant to a proclamation of the governor. In the proclamation, among the purposes specified for convening the legislature, was the following: "To send appointments to the Senate for their confirmation."

On the 12th day of April, 1881, the governor nominated the relator as State harbor commissioner vice the respondent, term expiring March 8, 1882; on the 13th of April, 1881, the Senate confirmed the appointment, and on the 8th of March, 1882, the governor issued his commission, and the relator qualified, duly presented his commission to the board, and demanded of respondent the surrender of the office. Upon a refusal, this action to try the right to the office was brought by the attorney-general in the name of the people. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the appointment of the relator was invalid because: first, the consent of the Senate to his appointment was given during the extra session of the legislature of 1881; and second, because the appointment was made by the governor on the day on which the term of the respondent expired

for Appellant.

The prohibition contained in the Constitution is that the legislature, when so convened, has no power to legislate on any subjects other than those specified in the proclamation. We do not pretend that consenting to an appointment is a legislative act, and if it is not it does not come within the prohibition. The matter of appointments was mentioned in the proclamation, and was incidental to the extra session of the legislature, and was expressly provided for in the foregoing section of the Constitution; but if it were not, as we have shown by the briefs on file, the Senate, when lawfully convened in extra session, may do anything that it could do at a regular session, unless there be a clause in the Constitution that prohibits them.

The legislature when lawfully convened, whether in virtue of the provisions of the Constitution or the governor's proclamation, can, when not restricted by constitutional provision, do anything at an extra session that it might at a regular session. (Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; McAffee v. Russell, 29 Miss. 84.)

In this case, there is no such clause anywhere in the Constitution. The claim of counsel, that "articles of impeachment could not be preferred at an extra session," and therefore consent of the Senate to appointments could not be given at that time, is equally fallacious. The Constitution, article iv., § 17, adds: "The Assembly shall have the sole power of impeachment, and all impeachments shall be tried by the Senate," etc. Why, then, cannot articles of impeachment be preferred by the Assembly at an extra session? Is there any constitutional objection to it?

The maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, has no application to a State Constitution. The rule of construction invoked by the respondent does not apply to State Constitutions; in fact, it is right the reverse. The legislature can do all acts not prohibited by the Constitution, the State Constitution and the Federal Constitution being entirely different in this respect.

The appointment was not premature. (See Brady ex rel. —, v. Howe, 50 Miss. 607; State ex rel. Geo. B. Whitney v. Hiram Van Buskirk, 40 N. J. 463; Marshall v. Harwood, 5 Md. 423; People v. Reid, 6 Cal. 289; People v. Mizner, 7 Cal. 519; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614; People v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 588; 18 Am. Rep. 324.)

Knight was not appointed harbor commissioner until the issuance of his commission. (See People v. Taylor, 7 Pac. C. L. J. 480; Pol. Code, § 996, subd. 9; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137; U. S. v. Le Baron, 19 How. 74; People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38; State v. Allen, 21 Ind. 516, 521; Opinions of Atty.-Gen., vol. 4, p. 217; Story on Constitution, p. 398; 2d Story on Constitution, § 1546; People v. Murray, 70 N. Y. 526.)

Wallace, Greathouse & Blanding, for Respondent.

The governor had no power to convene the legislature in extra session, as upon an extraordinary occasion, for the purpose of enabling it to receive or consent to appointments; nor did the Senate have any power in extra session to consent to such appointments. (Constitution of 1879, art. v., § 9; see Jones v. Theall, 3 Nev. 233; also Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 86, 87.)

The Constitution of 1879 is mandatory and prohibitory, not directory. (Art. i., § 22.)

No other State Constitution contains this provision.

The governor must state the purposes for which he has convened the legislature, and each purpose must be capable of being qualified by the term "extraordinary occasion."

Each purpose must be distinct, must be an "extraordinary occasion," and must stand by itself. It cannot derive support from any other purpose stated in the proclamation. It would not be permissible to insert one good subject, and thus bolster up and fortify other and invalid subjects.

The legislature may legislate on the subjects specified in the proclamation, but on none other.

The two expressed exceptions exclude all not expressed. With scrupulous care, the Constitution has specified the two sole permissible exceptions, to wit: that the legislature may in extra session provide for the expenses of the session, and that it may provide, also, for all other matters that are incidental to the session.

"Extraordinary occasion" must qualify everything upon which the legislature can act in extra session; but "extraordinary occasion" can never qualify the action of anything less than the whole legislature. It cannot qualify or be an attribute of the action of the Senate as such, nor of the House as such. It cannot qualify or be an attribute of the action of the Senate alone in consenting to appointments, and hence that consent can never be given in extra session.

The power is to convene the legislature as a whole and for subjects upon which it can act as a whole; and, when so convened, the legislature can only act as a whole. There is no power given to convene either the Senate or House alone, as in the Constitution of the United States.

There is no reason in fact why an "extraordinary occasion" could ever arise as to appointments to office. The whole machinery of appointments is completely provided for and regulated by law. If there is an incumbent, he holds, and must hold, "although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified." (Section 879, Pol. Code; People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38; People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 407; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 619.)

Relator's appointment was and is void in that it was premature.

The appointment by the governor, on April 12, 1881, the consent of the Senate in extra session, on the following day, and the commission issued on March 8, 1882, were all ultra vires, in that they were made before the power to make them did or could exist. The mode and time of appointment to office are purely statutory, and to the statute we must look. The relator could not be appointed or commissioned prior to the expiration of the term of the defendant. (Pol. Code, § 2520.)

This section provides, as to harbor commissioners, that "the governor shall, in like manner [i. e., by and with the consent of the Senate], at the expiration of their respective terms, appoint and commission their successors." Defendant's term of office included all of the 8th day of March, 1882. He held office for four years from the date of his commission, and his commission was dated March 8, 1878.

When a public officer holds from a certain day, the first day is always excluded and the last included. (Best v. Polk, 18 Wall. 112, 119; Pol. Code, § 12; Watson v. Pears, 2 Camp. 294; Bank of Oswego v. Ives, 2 Hill, 355; Portland Bank v. Maine Bank, 11 Mass. 204; Smith's Commentaries, §§ 616, 617, 618.)

There are many cases which hold that prospective appointment is bad even where there are no statutory words limiting the time when it should be made. To this effect are Ivy v. Lusk, 11 La. An. 486, 488; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 300, 301; Noe v. Bradley, 3 Blackf. 158-161; Biddle v. Willard, 10 Ind. 62.

THORNTON, J.—It is urged that the appointment of the relator Knight is invalid, for the reason that the consent of the Senate to his appointment was given during the extra session of the legislature of 1881, when it was convened by proclamation of the governor, for the purpose of legislating upon certain subjects specified in the proclamation.

We concur in the view in regard to this point taken in the former opinion of the court, filed November 28, 1882, and adopt its language, which is as follows:—

“In our view of the matter, it is not necessary to consider whether the governor could constitutionally convene the legislature in extra session for the sole purpose of having the Senate consent to his appointments. Nor is it necessary to inquire whether that was one of the subjects specified in the proclamation by which he convened the legislature at that time. The fact that the legislature was lawfully convened on that occasion, and that while so convened the Senate consented to the appointment of the relator, is not disputed. The legislature had no power to act on that subject whether it was specified in the proclamation or not, and the constitutional prohibition is limited to subjects upon which the legislature would have power to legislate in the absence of any prescribed limitation. The prohibition applies only to acts of legislation, and it was wholly unnecessary to prohibit legislation by the Senate, because the Senate alone could not legislate. It might pass any number of bills, but until concurred in by the other House, and approved by the governor, they would have no validity. Therefore, the constitutional limitation on the power of the legislature to legislate, when convened in extra session, does not apply to this case, and the Senate had the same power to consent to the appointment of the relator that it would have had if the Constitution had authorized the governor to call an extra session of the legislature whenever he should deem it advisable to do so, without imposing any other limitations upon its power to legislate when so convened than are imposed on its power to legislate when convened in regular session.”

It is further argued that the appointment is invalid because it was made by the governor on the day on which the term of the respondent expired, and that the governor was not authorized to make such appointment until the respondent's term had expired. To sustain this argument we are referred to section 2520 of the Political Code, which, so far as bears on this question, is in these words:—

“As soon as may be after the passage of this act, the governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall appoint three harbor commissioners, who shall hold office, one for two years, one for three years, and one for four years, from the date of their respective commissions. The governor shall, in like manner, at the expiration of their respective terms, appoint and commission their successors for a full term of four years.”

Let it be conceded that respondent's term included the whole of the 8th of March, 1882, and that relator was appointed on the same day. We do not think with this concession that the argument is sound. The preposition “at” is indefinite in its meaning; such is the view of it taken by Dr. Webster. (See the word in Webster's Dictionary.) He says: “It is less definite than ‘in’ or ‘on’; ‘at the house’ may be in or near the house.” With reference to time, it may mean the exact moment or near it. In common speech the word is so used. When the legislature used the words in the section above quoted “at the expiration of,” it would be a very strained construction to hold that it was intended to designate the exact moment rather than a few moments before. It seems by the argument to be admitted that it may designate any time after the expiration, even a few moments after. If a few moments after, why not a few moments before? We see no reason why one construction is not as correct as the other.

It is consistent with the finding that the appointment was made on the last moment of the 8th of March. To hold under such circumstances that the governor could not lawfully exercise the power of appointment, would be adhering to the exact letter of the statute with a strictness not at all commendable. To lay down such a ruling as law, would seem to men of good common sense and fair judgment, as savoring of the absurd. To hold to the letter of the act as contended for by respondent, would tend strongly to establish the position that the power of appointment must be exercised at the very punctum temporis when respondent's term ended, or it would not be lawfully exercised. The interpretation urged by counsel for respondent may be an ingenious refinement, but it would not be a tenable construction of the section referred to.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

SWEENEY, APPELLANT.

NEW TRIAL — APPEAL — PRESUMPTION.—The action was brought to recover a balance alleged to be due for work done and materials furnished in the construction of certain buildings. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and a decision rendered in favor of the plaintiff for a portion of the amount claimed. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on several grounds, and among others that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision. The motion was granted, but it did not appear on what ground. The defendant appealed from the order. Held, that every intendment must be indulged to sustain the judgment, and that the court is authorized to presume that the motion was granted on the ground of insufficiency in the evidence.

PER CURIAM.—This action was tried by the court, and the decision was in favor of plaintiff. The plaintiff, nevertheless, moved for a new trial on the ground inter alia, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision. The court granted the motion, and from this order the defendant appealed.

It does not appear upon what grounds the new trial was granted, and, therefore, as every intendment must be indulged to sustain the judgment of the court below, this court is authorized to presume that it was granted on the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision.

In relation to this, it is the well-settled rule of this court that such motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and an order granting it will not be disturbed unless it appears that the court below has abused its discretion in so ruling. (Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 406; Bronner v. Wetzlar, 55 Cal. 419, and cases cited.)

No such abuse appears in this cause, and the order is affirmed.

SIMON BLUM, APPELLANT, v. LORENZO SUNOL ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

NEW TRIAL — PRESUMPTION — APPEAL.—Every intendment prevails in favor of the correctness of an order granting a new trial although made by another judge than the one who tried the cause, and such intendments must be overcome by affirmatively showing error.

ID.—FINDING — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE — DEPOSITIONS.—Where a finding has been made upon a conflict of evidence, or contrary to evidence, or without evidence, the appellate court will not interfere with the action of the trial court in granting a new trial, although the evidence upon which it acted consists of depositions and documentary and oral evidence.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco granting a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Wm. T. Wallace, John Currey, and B. S. Brooks, for Appellants.

And this court has decided that “where the testimony in the court below is in the form of depositions, the Supreme Court on appeal will re-examine it, and is not bound by the rule which forbids disturbing a judgment where there is a conflict of evidence." (Lander v. Beers, 48 Cal. 546; Wilson v. Cross, 33 Cal. 61.)

The Superior Court had no jurisdiction to set aside the findings and judgment, unless the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings. A mere difference of opinion as to the weight of testimony would not justify it. The statute does not authorize the court to set aside the verdict of a jury, because the court comes to a different conclusion on the facts. The successful party has a property in his verdict; and he can only be deprived of it for the causes stated in the statute. Judge Dwinelle sat in the place of the jury, and his findings stand as a verdict, but Judge Hunt did not occupy that position. (Canning v. C. P. R. Co., 50 Cal. 186; Glenn v. Arnold, 56 Cal. 631; Witherby v. Thomas, 55 Cal. 11; Helbing v. Svea Ins. Co. 54 Cal. 159; Griffith v. Moss, 47 Cal. 589; Merle v. Mathews, 26 Cal. 455.)

Godey*, 39 Cal. 167; Watson v. R. R. Co. 41 Cal. 17; Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 218.

McKEE, J.—The action in this case was tried and decided by the late District Court of Contra Costa County. After decision and judgment a motion was made for a new trial upon a bill of exceptions. Before the motion was heard the attorney for the plaintiff, having been elected judge of the Superior Court of the county, became disqualified from acting in the case, and the action was removed and transferred to the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco. There the motion was argued and submitted, and after a review of the evidence contained in the certified bill of exceptions, the court sustained the motion and ordered a new trial, and from the order this appeal has been taken.

Although the order was made by the successor of the trial court, or rather by another judge than the one who tried the cause, yet as every intendment prevails in favor of its correctness, the appellant is bound to overcome such intendments by affirmatively showing prejudicial error. No such error has been made to appear.

The issues tried involved the genuineness of certain instruments in writing, through which defendants claimed title to the real property in controversy in the case. Upon those issues much documentary and oral evidence was given by both parties; and, from an examination of the evidence contained in the record, we are of opinion there was no abuse of discretion by the court below in granting a new trial.

Where a finding has been made upon a conflict of evidence, or contrary to evidence, or without evidence, this court does not interfere with the action of the lower court in granting a new trial, although the evidence upon which it has acted may consist, as it does in this case, of depositions and documentary and oral evidence. (Canning v. C. P. R. R. Co. 50 Cal. 166; Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 534; Macy v. Davila, 48 Cal. 646; Altschul v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 535.)

LUCY M. BRIGGS, RESPONDENT, v. JAMES T.
HAYCOCK ET AL., APPELLANTS.

CONVERSION — WAREHOUSEMAN.— The plaintiff intrusted certain property to the Ten Cent Parcel Company, a corporation, to be stored. The company stored the property with warehousemen — to whose rights and duties the defendants succeeded — taking a receipt therefor. The defendants had notice that the plaintiff was the owner of the property. She tendered them the amount of the storage charges, seventy-eight dollars, and demanded the property, but did not present the warehouse receipt. Defendants refused to deliver it on the sole ground that it had been sold for the storage charges, but offered to deliver it for two hundred dollars. The court found that the property had not been sold, but was at the time of the tender and refusal in the possession of defendants. Held, that the refusal amounted to a conversion, and that the failure to produce the receipt constituted no defense, as the refusal was placed on the mere ground that the property had been sold.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Sawyer, and Ball, for Appellant.

The demand and refusal did not constitute conversion. (Balch v. Jones, 61 Cal. 234; Hilliard on Torts, 48.)

The receipt should have been produced. (Patten v. Baggs, 43 Ga. 167; Second Nat. Bk. v. Walbridge, 19 Ohio St. 419; Horr v. Barker, 8 Cal. 613; Davis v. Russell, 52 Cal. 615; Cochran v. Ripy, 13 Bush, 495.)

McAllister & Bergin, and G. F. Gordon, for Respondents.

The court is asked to reverse the judgment upon two grounds, namely:—

1. Non-production of the receipt.
2. There has been no conversion of the property.

It is too late to make these points.

The absolute and unqualified refusal to deliver the goods to respondent upon payment of all charges due thereon, without calling for any receipts, excused its production—and non constat that the point was ever made on the trial where it could readily have been obviated. (Rogers v. Weir, 34 N. Y. 463; Ball v. Liney, 48 N. Y. 12; Smith v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 90; Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 538; Gould v. Banks, 8 Wend. 567.)

ROSS, J.—Action for conversion of certain articles of personal property. The plaintiff's ownership of the articles is an undisputed fact in the case. As owner, she intrusted the property to the Ten Cent Parcel Delivery Company, a corporation, to be stored. Defendants' predecessors in interest were warehousemen, and with them the company stored the property, taking a warehouse receipt therefor. Subsequently the defendants succeeded to the rights and duties of the original warehousemen in respect to it. On the 18th of July, 1877, they had notice that the plaintiff was the owner of the property, and on that day delivered to her a portion of it on an order from the Parcel Delivery Company. Afterward, and on the 2d of July, 1879, the plaintiff tendered defendants the amount due thereon for storage, seventy-eight dollars, and demanded possession of the remainder of the property. Defendants refused to deliver the remainder on the sole ground that the same had been sold to pay storage charges; but at the same time offered to deliver it if plaintiff would pay them two hundred dollars. In truth, according to the findings, the property had not been sold, but was at the time of the tender and demand in defendants' possession.

On these facts the court below rightly gave judgment for the plaintiff. The circumstances attending the refusal of the defendants to surrender the property to the owner on tender of the charges due amounted to a conversion of it.

The objection that the warehouse receipt was not produced is not well taken. Defendants did not put their refusal to deliver on any such ground, but based it solely on the ground which, according to the findings, had no support in fact, that the property had been sold to pay storage charges. If they had asked for the receipt, perhaps it would have been produced.

Judgment affirmed.

THE PEOPLE, APPELLANTS, v. F. A. GIESEA,
RESPONDENT.

CRIMINAL PRACTICE — DISMISSAL OF PROSECUTION — SECTION 1882 OF THE PENAL CODE CONSTRUED.—The indictment in this case was demurred to and the demurrer sustained. This ruling was reversed on appeal. The trial court then fixed a day for the trial, against defendant's objections, more than sixty days after the remittitur was filed. The defendant demanded his discharge under section 1882 of the Penal Code, and the court so ordered and dismissed the action. Held, that this section has no application to such a case, and that the court erred in its ruling.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of Kern County, discharging defendant and dismissing the action against him.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Attorney-General, for Appellants.

J. W. Freeman, and R. E. Arick, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— This is an appeal from an order dismissing the cause and discharging the defendant.

The indictment in this cause was demurred to and the demurrer was sustained. On appeal by the people to this court, this ruling was reversed with directions to overrule the demurrer. On the return of the remittitur, the court fixed a day for the trial of the defendant, and against his objection, more than sixty days after the remittitur was filed. Thereupon the defendant, under section 1382 of the Penal Code, claimed his discharge, and that the case should be dismissed. The court below so ruled and made an order discharging the defendant and dismissing the cause. Thereupon, this appeal was prosecuted by the people.

We are of opinion that the case of the defendant does not come within the provisions of the section above referred to. That section has no application where the prisoner has demurred to the indictment, the demurrer sustained, the effect of which ruling had to be gotten rid of by an appeal.

The court in our judgment erred in its ruling, and the order is reversed and cause remanded, that proceedings may be had in the court below according to law.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF A. E. ROSE, DECEASED, CERTAIN MINOR HEIRS AND THEIR
GUARDIAN, APPELLANTS, AND H. HIRSHFELD, ADMINISTRATOR, RESPONDENT.

ORDER — APPEAL — COMPUTATION OF TIME.— Where the last day of the period allowed to appeal from an order is a non-judicial day, an appeal taken on the next day is in time.

PROBATE PROCEEDINGS — SALE OF REAL ESTATE.— A decree in probate directing the sale of real estate held to be invalid by reason of defects in the petition and proceedings with reference to various matters required by the Code, and particularly as to the necessity for the sale, such necessity not appearing from any facts set forth in the petition or stated in the decree.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the county of Kern confirming a sale of real estate.

The decree directing the sale was not appealed from, but treated as void. The additional facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

George V. Smith, and Stetson & Houghton, for Appellants.

R. E. Arick, for Respondent.

MYRIOK, J.— This is an appeal from an order confirming the sale of property sold as real estate, and directing a conveyance to be made.

The appeal was in time. The sixtieth day fell on Monday, January 2, 1882. The 1st day of January, 1882, being Sunday, the ensuing Monday was a non-judicial day (§ 11, Code Civ. Proc.), and the notice given on Tuesday, January 3d, was in time. (§ 12.) The motion to dismiss is therefore denied.

The petition for the sale of the property is fatally defective. Section 1537 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that the petition set forth the amount of personal estate that has come to the hands of the administrator, and how much, if any, remains undisposed of; the debts outstanding so far as can be ascertained or estimated; the amount due on the family allowance, or that will be due for one year; the debts, expenses, and charges of administration already accrued, and an estimate of what will accrue; a general description of the real property of the deceased or in which he had any interest, and the condition and value thereof, with other matters stated in the section. In endeavoring to be conformed to the above requirements, the petition described the personal property which had come to the hands of the administrator, and stated that it had been appraised at four thousand five hundred and eleven dollars. The petition then stated "that a portion of said property has been sold by a former order of this court, and your petitioner has realized therefrom the sum of three thousand dollars, and the balance remains to be disposed of." What property remains to be disposed of?

In regard to the debts, the petition stated: "That the debts outstanding against the said deceased, as far as can be ascertained or estimated, amount to this day to the sum of five thousand dollars, and are fully set forth in the schedule marked A, heretofore annexed and made a part of this petition." No schedule A is annexed to the petition, nor any schedule of debts outstanding. The petition stated: "That the amount due on the family allowance is the sum of $——; that the amount that will be due on said family allowance, after the same shall have been in force one year, is the sum of $——."

The petition also stated that the debts, expenses, and charges of the administration already accrued amount to two hundred and fifty dollars, "and are fully set forth in the schedule marked B, hereunto annexed and made a part of this petition"; and that the debts, expenses, and charges of administration that will accrue are estimated at five hundred dollars, "and are set forth in the schedule marked C hereunto annexed and made part of this petition." There is no schedule B or schedule C annexed to or accompanying the petition, nor any statement, except as above, of the debts, expenses, or charges of administration, accrued, or to accrue. There is no attempt at a statement of the condition of the property of the estate; nor of the value of the property asked to be sold, except the statement that it is of uncertain value on account of litigation with reference thereto.

The section of the Code above referred to provides if any of the matters therein enumerated cannot be ascertained, it must be so stated in the petition; but a failure to set forth the facts showing the sale to be necessary will not invalidate the subsequent proceedings if the defect be supplied by the proofs at the hearing, and the general facts showing such necessity be stated in the decree. The petition did not state that such matters required by the section as were omitted could not be ascertained, nor does it appear, directly or indirectly, that the defects were supplied by proofs at the hearing, nor does the decree authorizing the sale state any general or other facts showing a necessity for a sale. It is true, the order of sale states that it having appeared to the court by the petition that it was necessary to sell real estate, thereupon an order to show cause was made; but the order does not state that on the hearing a sale appeared to be necessary. The only statement in that regard is, it "appearing to the court that it would be for the benefit of the estate to sell the said real estate at private sale." These words express a choice as between a public and a private sale; but do not express a necessity for a sale. An attempted sale, based upon such a petition and order, would convey no title.

Order reversed.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF A. E. ROSE, DECEASED, CERTAIN MINOR HEIRS AND THEIR
GUARDIAN, APPELLANTS, AND H. HIRSHFELD, ADMINISTRATOR, RESPONDENT.

ADMINISTRATOR — FINAL ACCOUNT — VOUCHERS — PROOF.— An order settling the final account of an administrator reversed for want of proper vouchers, and because the proof as to the correctness of the account was too general and indefinite.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the county of Kern.

The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Stetson & Houghton, for Appellants.

R. E. Arick, for Respondent.

MYRICK, J.— This is an appeal from an order settling the account of the administrator.

Section 1631 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in rendering his account, the administrator must produce and file vouchers for all charges, debts, claims, and expenses which he has paid, and he may be examined on oath touching such payments; if a voucher is lost, or for other good reason cannot be produced on the settlement, the payment may be proved by any competent witness.

According to section 1632, he may be allowed any item of expenditure not exceeding twenty dollars for which no voucher is produced, if such item be supported by his own uncontradicted oath positive to the fact of payment, specifying when, where, and to whom it was made; but the aggregate of such allowances must not exceed five hundred dollars.

The vouchers produced by the administrator in this case, and used on the settlement of his account, numbered one to twenty-two, respectively, the receipts for sums paid the appraisers, clerk, attorney, and possibly some few others, were proper vouchers, and the items represented by them were properly allowed by the court; but the bulk of the so-called vouchers appearing in the transcript, from folio 57 to folio 88, are in no sense vouchers. We select one as a sample:—

BAKERSFIELD, September 24, 1878.

“Pay to the order of Fred Hanes twenty-seven 87-100 dollars, United States gold coin, value received, and charge to account of Rose estate.

“To H. HIRSHFELD, Admstr. Rose estate.”

This is not a voucher. H. Hirshfeld is the administrator of the estate. This paper may have been very well as a statement from M. Purcell to Mr. Hirshfeld that he should pay the amount to the person named; but it gives no information as to why the amount should be paid out of the funds of, or charged to, the estate; nor does it tend to prove that the amount was paid; it is no voucher from the payee. There is no statement of any fact in the account or in the report tending to show that the items represented by these so-called vouchers were incurred or paid in or about the business of the administration of the estate. The same may be said of the accounts and receipts contained in the transcript, from folio 91 to and including folio 96, except that these appear to have been receipted by the persons in whose favor the accounts were presented. The amount of $678.75 appears on the credit side of the account as cash paid L. Hirshfeld, supplies; but why the item was paid, or what relation the administration of the estate bore to these supplies, or to the payment, in no way appears. On referring to the voucher or account of L. Hirshfeld & Co., on which the payment was made, we find the supplies to consist of potatoes, cream tartar, coffee, sulphur, flour, cardles, tobacco, cigars, onions, leather, cash, tea, beans, bacon, rubber coat, pants, vest, axle-grease, sheeting, toweling, etc., etc.; but we are not informed in any manner what these articles had to do with the administration of the estate. It appears in the bill of exceptions that as to the items in the account of Hirshfeld & Co., the administrator was not particularly examined, but was asked generally as to whether they were necessary expenses in the care and management of the sheep and other property of the estate, and for the care and custody of the minor children, and he stated they were. The order settling the account contains no statement that proof of the correctness of the account was had, nor any finding as to its correctness. The evidence should have shown why the expenses were incurred, leaving the court to determine as to their necessity or propriety. When we observe that the items on the credit side of the account as allowed by the court aggregate $9,159.17, nearly one half of which is made up of items subject to one or the other of the above criticisms, we are free to say that the account was presented and attempted to be proven in a way far from that contemplated by the statute. It is a very easy matter for an administrator to present in writing a general synopsis of his administration, for doing so he is amply paid; we notice in this account an item of fees of administrator, $545.85, and for attorney's fees, $250; we think the requirements of the Code as to the method of conducting the business and settling the accounts should be complied with.

The order is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

THORNTON, J., and SHARPSTEIN, J., concurred.

ANDREW CASSIDY, RESPONDENT, v. MARY CASSIDY, APPELLANT.

DIVORCE — FINDINGS — PRACTICE.— In an action by the husband for a divorce on the grounds of habitual intemperance and extreme cruelty, the wife denied the allegations of the complaint, and set up as a separate defense extreme cruelty on the part of the husband. The court found in substance that the material allegations of the complaint were true, and rendered a judgment in favor of the husband. There was no finding upon the issue tendered by the wife as to the cruelty of the husband. Held, 1. That the finding was not sufficient to support the judgment. 2. That it was competent for the wife to plead the cruelty of the husband in defense of the action, and that the judgment could not be sustained in the absence of a finding on the subject.

PLEADINGS — COMPLAINT — DEMURRER.— Where a complaint contains two counts, one of which is good, a general demurrer to the whole complaint must be overruled.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the head notes and opinion of the court.

G. W. & W. B. Tyler, for Appellant, cited Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277; §§ 462 and 467, Code Civ. Proc.; Phipps v. Harlan, 53 Cal. 87; Billings v. Everett, 52 Cal. 661; Sift v. Canavan, 52 Cal. 417.

John Wade, and James McCabe, for Respondent.

McKINSTRY, J.— The defendant (appellant) demurred generally to the whole complaint. Appellant now claims there are two counts in the complaint, and that one is insufficient. There is but one count; but if there had been two, one being good, the general demurrer would have been properly overruled.

One of the findings of the court below was "all the material allegations of facts set forth in plaintiff's complaint are sustained and proven by the evidence." Such a finding does not uphold a judgment. We have no means of determining what the court below may deem "material" facts or averments. (Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277.) The finding with respect to "extreme cruelty" on the part of defendant is somewhat uncertain. If it be admitted, however, that such finding is sufficient, the record contains no pretense of a finding with reference to the counter-charges of the answer. It is well settled in this State that the findings must respond to all the material issues made by the pleadings. (Swift v. Canavan, 52 Cal. 417; Billings v. Everett, 52 Cal. 661; Phipps v. Harlan, 53 Cal. 87.) Defendant in an action for divorce may allege and prove facts constituting a cause of divorce against the plaintiff in bar of the plaintiff's cause of divorce. (Civil Code, § 122.) The averment of the facts constituting such recriminatory defense, and the denial thereof by plaintiff (which the law implies), creates a material issue, upon which the court should find.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

J. S. DYER, RESPONDENT, v. S. MARTINOVICH ET AL.,
APPELLANTS.

STREET ASSESSMENT.—An assessment was made for the grading of Leavenworth Street from Green to Union Street in the city and county of San Francisco. Between Green and Union Streets there was a small street thirty-five feet in width, terminating at one end in Leavenworth Street, and known as Lincoln Street. The cost of the work in front of Lincoln Street was assessed against the lots fronting on that street. In the assessment, Lincoln Street is designated by its name, but it is also numbered and referred to as a lot having a frontage of thirty-five feet on Leavenworth Street, and chargeable with a certain amount as its proportion of the cost of the work. On the diagram attached to the assessment there is a space marked Lincoln Street with a number upon it corresponding to the number in the assessment. Held, that the assessment was properly made, that Lincoln Street is not to be regarded as one of the lots assessed, and that the reference to it was merely for the purpose of a distribution of the cost of the work as between the lots liable therefor.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

J. C. Bates, for Appellant.

The assessment is too large and therefore void. (Prescott v. Prescott, 62 Me. 431; Glidden v. Chase, 35 Me. 90; Boyden v.

Moore, 5 Mass. 371; Dyer v. Chase, 52 Cal. 440; Donnelly v. Howard, 60 Cal. 291.

O. H. Parker, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — The appeal is from a judgment entered against defendants in an action on a street assessment.

No objection is made to the assessment and diagram other than that hereinafter stated. "The diagram and assessment show that Lincoln Street is a small street thirty-five feet wide, terminating in a main (Leavenworth) street. Lot 7, in suit, is assessed for Lincoln Street, but the assessment shows on its face that Lincoln Street is named and designated as lot 6, and assessed for $544.32, the same as other lots, except that other lots are assessed to 'unknown.'"

The assessment consists in two distributions of the amounts to be paid. In the first, the lots of private proprietors fronting on Leavenworth Street are numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7, and "Lincoln Street" is numbered as lot 6. This is followed by an "assessment against Lincoln Street for its proportion of the above-named expense; thirty-five feet grading," etc. This last consists of a distribution of the expense imposed by the statute upon the property fronting on Lincoln Street to the lots of property fronting on that street.

The assessment is to be read as a whole, and from this it appears that the land used as Lincoln Street is not assessed against "Mr. Lincoln," or against "Lincoln Street" as a person. The insertion in the first part of the assessment of Lincoln Street as "lot 6" may be treated as surplusage, or as merely indicating that the width of Lincoln Street on Leavenworth is not held in private ownership. Read together, the two parts of the assessment show that the property fronting on Leavenworth, and also fronting on Lincoln, was properly assessed.

Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF SONOMA COUNTY, RESPONDENT, v. A. J.
GOVE, APPELLANT.

PROMISSORY NOTE — TRANSFER — EQUITIES.— If a promissory note is transferred after maturity by an indorser who took it before maturity, and was not himself affected by any equities between the original parties, the holder acquires it relieved of such equities, and they are not available against him. (McKINSTRY, J., and ROSS, J.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE MCKINSTRY.

C. V. Grey, for Appellant, cited Civil Code, § 3123; Code Civ. Proc. § 388; Vinton v. Crowe, 4 Cal. 309; Hayward v. Stearns, 39 Cal. 58; Hart v. Cooper, 47 Cal. 77; Brown v. Witts, 57 Cal. 304; Fuller v. Hutchings, 10 Cal. 523; Baxter v. Little, 6 Met. 7.

A. W. Thompson, for Respondent, cited Code Civ. Proc. § 383; 1 Daniels on Negotiable Instruments, §§ 724, 726, 786, 803, and authorities there referred to.

MCKINSTRY, J.—The appellant Gove made his promissory note for eight hundred dollars to defendant Stuart, who indorsed it before maturity to the National Gold Bank and Trust Company. The bank discounted the note in the regular course of its business. After maturity, the bank for a valuable consideration transferred the note to E. W. Steele. Subsequently Gove, the maker, paid to Steele one half the sum then due upon the note, claiming that as between himself and Stuart the instrument was an accommodation, and each was liable to the other for one half only. Steele refused to recognize the alleged claim, but consented to receive the sum paid as a partial payment, and such sum was indorsed as a payment in the usual manner. Afterwards Steele transferred the same for value to the plaintiff. As between themselves there was an agreement between Gove and Stuart that each should pay one half the note, but of this neither the National Bank, Steele, nor the plaintiff had notice when they respectively bought the note.

This action was commenced August 30, 1877. Defendant Stuart was discharged from his debts under the insolvent laws June 27, 1879, and judgment went for him in the court below. That court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the balance due against the appellant Gove.

Upon this state of facts it is contended by appellant the judgment should be reversed, because plaintiff was chargeable with notice that the note was an accommodation note, and that the maker had paid all he was liable to pay to Steele. Appellant relies upon the proposition laid down in Vinton v. Crowe, 4 Cal. 309, and approved in Hayward v. Stearns, 39 Cal. 58. In the first of these cases the proposition is thus stated: "A negotiable note, taken by the holder after its maturity, is taken subject to all subsisting equities between the maker and payee, but not such as subsisted between the maker and any intermediate holder."

The facts in Vinton v. Crowe are not reported, but in Hayward v. Stearns the defense relied upon the fact that while the note remained in the hands of Turner, who took after it was overdue, the latter became indebted to the maker in a sum greater than the amount of the note. There can be no doubt the law was properly applied in that case, and it must be supposed that the facts in Vinton v. Crowe were analogous. At all events, the general language employed by the court is not to be interpreted as establishing that every indorsee who takes a negotiable instrument after maturity is bound by the equities subsisting between the payor and payee; if, indeed, the fact that, as in the case before us, the note was made for the mutual accommodation of the original parties can be considered as an equity within the meaning of the rule.

"It is a settled principle that if the party who transferred the instrument to the holder acquired the note before maturity, and was himself unaffected by any infirmity in it, the holder acquires as good a title as he held, although it were overdue and dishonored at the time of the transfer." (Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 726, citing many American cases; Chitty on Bills, 13th Am. Ed. 250; 9 Ex. 690.)

Here the note was discounted by the National Bank before it became due, without notice of the agreement between the original parties.

In England it is well established that the general rule, that the purchaser of overdue paper can stand in no better position than his transferrer, does not apply so far as to invalidate bills and notes drawn, indorsed, or accepted for accommodation, overdue at the time they are negotiated or transferred, it being considered that parties to accommodation paper hold themselves out to the public by their signatures, to be bound to every person who shall take the same for value, the same as if it were paid to themselves. And the fact that the purchaser knew that the paper was so drawn, indorsed, or accepted for accommodation, does not weaken his position. (9 Ex. 690.) But inasmuch as the decisions in the United States do not uniformly follow the English rule, and as the facts of the case at bar do not demand a decision of the question, we express no opinion with respect to this last point.

H. B. CONGDON, APPELLANT, v. WM. S. CHAPMAN,
RESPONDENT.

SALE — AGREEMENT — PERFORMANCE.— The plaintiff sold to the defendant certain shares of the capital stock of a corporation, to be paid for out of the first moneys which could be realized from the sale of any stock of the corporation owned or controlled by the defendant, who agreed to make all reasonable efforts to realize on the same without unnecessary delay for the purpose of paying the plaintiff. The suit was brought to recover the price of the shares sold. The answer alleged in substance that the defendant had complied with the agreement as to the efforts to be made by him to realize on the stock, but had not been able to sell any portion of it. The court below found in his favor upon the matters so alleged. Held, that these matters constituted a defense to the action, and that the plaintiff could not recover.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The case came up on the judgment roll. No motion was made for a new trial, and the evidence was not before the court. The following is a copy of the agreement on which the questions in the case arose:—

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., November 20, 1876.

MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT.

H. B. Congdon sells to W. S. Chapman thirty thousand shares of the capital stock of the Erie Consolidated Mining Company, at the price of ten cents per share. Said Chapman agrees to said purchase, and to pay for said stock in gold coin, from the first moneys which can be realized from the sale of any stock of said company owned or controlled by him. Said Chapman agrees to purchase from said Congdon such further quantities of said stock as he may supply within thirty days, at the same price and on the same terms. Said Chapman acknowledges the receipt of said thirty thousand shares of said stock this day delivered to him by said Congdon, and said Chapman agrees to use all reasonable efforts to realize on the stock of said company owned or controlled by him without unnecessary delay, to the end that said payment may be made to said Congdon.

WM. S. CHAPMAN,
H. B. CONGDON.

Witness, FORD H. ROGERS.

More than three years elapsed between the date of the agreement and the commencement of the action.

Cary & Troutt, for Appellant, argued that the agreement should be construed as requiring payment within a reasonable time, and that the defense set up in the answer could not be maintained, citing Hicks v. Shouse, 17 Mon. B. 483; Ubsdell v. Cunningham, 22 Mo. 125; Sears v. Wright, 24 Me. 278; Nunez v. Dautel, 19 Wall. 560; Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554.

Pillsbury & Titus, for Respondent, argued that the effect of the agreement was to provide for payment out of a special fund to be raised by selling of stock, and that the construction contended for by the counsel for the appellant would be substantially to make a new contract between the parties; that the respondent had done all the agreement required him to do, and is not liable.

PER CURIAM.—The plaintiff sold to the defendant certain shares of the capital stock of the Erie Consolidated Mining Company, upon defendant's agreement to pay for the stock, at a stated rate per share, "from the first moneys which can be realized from the sale of any stock of said company owned or controlled by him (Chapman); . . . and said Chapman agrees to use all reasonable efforts to realize on the stock of said company owned or controlled by him without unnecessary delay, to the end that said payment may be made to said Congdon."

By this agreement the parties clearly expressed their intention that the stock should be paid for out of the first moneys that could be realized from the sale of any stock of the company owned or controlled by Chapman, the latter further agreeing to use all reasonable efforts to realize on the stock without unnecessary delay, "to the end that said payment may be made to said Congdon."

At the trial the court below found that the defendant used reasonable diligence and made all reasonable efforts to sell the stock, but had been unable to sell any of it. Under such circumstances, to hold the defendant liable in this form of action would be to make and enforce between the parties a contract essentially different from the contract that they themselves made, and from that declared on herein.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK, LIMITED, APPELLANT, v. GRANGERS' BANK OF CALIFORNIA, RESPONDENT.

CORPORATION — TRANSFER OF STOCK — EQUITIES.—A transfer of shares of the capital stock of a corporation by the owner thereof to a bona fide purchaser for value, vests the title in such purchaser free of equities between the seller and the corporation of which the purchaser was ignorant at the time of the transfer, though provided for by a by-law of the corporation. The existence of such a by-law is not enough to charge the purchaser with notice, nor is it enough that the purchaser, being also a corporation, has a similar by-law which is printed on each of its certificates of stock. The power of corporations to make by-laws for the transfer of their stock does not include the power to create liens thereon, affecting purchasers for value without notice.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The stock in question was transferred to the plaintiff by one Fowler as security for the payment of a debt previously contracted, the time of payment being extended in consideration of the transfer. The stock was represented by a certificate issued to Fowler as the owner thereof, and the transfer to the plaintiff was regularly made by assignment and delivery of the certificate. At the time of the transfer, Fowler was indebted to the defendant in a large amount, and the defendant claimed a lien on the stock under one of its by-laws, for the payment of this indebtedness. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the indebtedness or the existence of the by-law. A demand by the plaintiff for a transfer of the stock on the books of the defendant was refused, and the action was brought to recover damages for such refusal. The defendant was incorporated under the provisions of the Civil Code. The additional facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Chickering & Thomas, for Appellant.

1. Our general proposition is that a bona fide purchaser of corporate stock, for value and without notice, takes it free of all equities between his vendor and the corporation.

Plaintiff was a purchaser for value. Our forbearance to sue, and our renewal of Fowler's obligation on the faith of the security, are valuable considerations. (Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335; Cary v. White, 52 N. Y. 138; 2 Pomeroy Equity, § 749.)

2. The plaintiff had no actual or constructive notice of the by-laws of the defendant. Nothing can be statutory notice which is not expressly declared by the statute to be notice.

3. Plaintiff had no actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to the by-laws of defendant. The facts do not bring the case within either of the two classes spoken of by Wigram, V. C., in Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare, 43, 55, 56, which is cited in 2 Pomeroy's Equity, § 605, and spoken of therein as "the most comprehensive and accurate generalization" of the law of constructive notice "ever attempted by any judge or text-writer."

4. Stocks are quasi negotiable instruments, and those who purchase them in good faith, for value and without notice, take them free of all equities. (Winter v. Belmont Mining Company, 53 Cal. 428.)

5. The defendant held out Fowler to the world as the legal owner of the stock, and is bound by his disposition of it to a purchaser for value without notice. (Winter v. Belmont Mining Company, supra; Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 147; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 113; Stone v. Marye, 14 Nev. 362; Holbrook v. New Jersey Zinc Company, 57 N. Y. 616.)

6. The by-laws of a corporation are not binding on third parties. They need only look within the four corners of the certificate. (Mechanics' Bank v. Smith, 19 Johns. 115; Lowry v. Commercial Bank, Taney, 310; Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 369; Angell & Ames on Corp. § 359; Salisbury Mills v. Townsend, 109 Mass. 115; Bank v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, and citations.)

Pillsbury & Titus, for Respondent.

1. Corporations have power to make by-laws regulating the transfer of stock. (Civ. Code, § 354, sub. 6; St. Louis etc. Ins. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 149; Cunningham v. Alabama Trust Co. 4 Ala. 652; Mechanics' Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 45 Mo. 513; Field on Corporations, § 304; Pendergast v. Bank of Stockton, 2 Sawy. 108.)

2. When the holder of stock is indebted to the corporation, and the corporation has a lien on the stock for the debt, a transferee of the certificate is not entitled to a transfer of the stock on the company's books, except he first pay the debt. (McCready v. Rumsey, 6 Duer, 574; Reese v. Bank of Commerce, 14 Md. 271; Mechanics' Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 599; Union Bank of Georgetown v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 390; Stebbins v. Phoenix F. I. Co. 3 Paige, 350.)

3. Certificates of stock are not negotiable securities in the sense that an indorsement and delivery thereof to a bona fide purchaser, for value and without actual notice, cuts off equities between the corporation and the holder and transferrer of the stock. (Mechanics' Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 623, 624; Bank of Georgetown v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 390; Stebbins v. Phoenix Fire Ins. Co. 3 Paige, 350; Angell & Ames on Corporations, §§ 352, 353, 3d ed.; Dunn v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 11 Barb. 580; Weaver v. Barden, 3 Lans. 338; 49 N. Y. 286; Hall v. Rose Hill etc. Road Co. 70 Ill. 673; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382; 1 Am. R. 115; Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 99; Sherwood v. Meadow Valley M. Co. 50 Cal. 412; Note to 6th ed. Parsons on Contract, vol. 1, p. 290.)

SHARPSTEIN, J.—The court found that prior to and at the time of the transfer of thirty shares of the capital stock of the corporation defendant, by one Fowler to the corporation plaintiff, said Fowler was indebted to the defendant in a sum greatly in excess of the value of said stock, and that said indebtedness had never been paid, and that by virtue of a by-law of said corporation defendant, it was justified in refusing to enter said transfer upon its books until said indebtedness should be paid. Said by-law reads as follows:

“All transfers of stock shall be subject to all debts and equities in favor of the corporation, against the person or corporation making such transfer, and existing or arising prior to the regular transfer thereof upon the books of the corporation, and no transfer of shares shall be made upon the books of the corporation until all dues and demands thereon due to the corporation from the party or parties representing such shares shall have been paid.”

The court also found that the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of that by-law, and that it never tried by inquiry or otherwise to obtain any such knowledge. It is not found that prior to said transfer the appellant was informed or knew of the indebtedness of said Fowler to the respondent.

It is found that many of the banking corporations of this city, including the corporation plaintiff, had by-laws similar to the one above quoted, and that the latter corporation had such a by-law printed upon his certificates of stock, from which the court drew the conclusion "that the corporation plaintiff, its managers and other officers, had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to the contents of the code of by-laws of the corporation defendant herein."

The only circumstances, however, of which the plaintiff had actual notice was that it had a similar by-law of its own, a copy of which it had printed upon every stock certificate issued by it. As the defendant did not print a copy of said by-law upon any stock certificates issued by it, we do not think that the circumstances of the plaintiff having a similar by-law, coupled with the fact that a copy thereof was printed upon all certificates of stock issued by it, was equivalent to actual notice of the fact of the defendant having such a by-law, although the plaintiff neglected to make any inquiry, and might have ascertained if it had, that the defendant had such a by-law.

The respondent's counsel, however, insist that even if the plaintiff be "a bona fide purchaser for value and without actual notice," it took the certificates subject to the equities which existed, at the time of the transfer, between the defendant and Fowler. If the law conferred upon the defendant the power to make such a by-law, we are not prepared to deny that it might have the force and effect claimed for it by respondent's counsel. The provision of the Civil Code which it is claimed confers such power upon corporations declares that "every corporation, as such, has power . . . to make by-laws not inconsistent with any existing law, for the management of its property, the regulation of its affairs, and for the transfer of its stock." (Civ. Code, § 354.) The transfer of stock is provided for in another section, of which the following is a copy:—

"Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the proprietor, or his attorney or legal representative, and delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid except between the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer." (Civ. Code, § 324.)

The shares for which Fowler held a certificate were personal property, i. e., his personal property, and he could transfer it by its indorsement and the delivery of the certificate to the plaintiff or any one else. Fowler being the holder of the certificate, was in the possession of the shares for which it was issued, and those shares were his personal property, which he was authorized by law to transfer by an indorsement and delivery of the certificate to the plaintiff. The defendant was not in possession of the shares for which Fowler held the certificate, and such shares being his personal property, the defendant had no general lien upon it for any balance which might be due it from Fowler in the course of business. (Civ. Code, § 3054.) The lien, if any, must have been created by the by-law above quoted, and it seems to us that no lien could be created in that way which would affect a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, to whom the stock was transferred in the mode prescribed by the Code. We think that the by-law which it is claimed gives the defendant such a lien, is clearly inconsistent with the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code which we have quoted.

The provision that "the transfer is not valid, except between the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer" does not, as we construe it, justify the defendant in its refusal to enter upon its books the transfer from Fowler to the plaintiff, any more than it would in the absence of any such by-law as the one upon which the defendant relies for its justification in this case. If there was a valid transfer of the stock from Fowler to the plaintiff, the latter had a right to have it transferred on the books of the defendant. The defendant might make by-laws regulating the transfer of stock, but it could not, under the power to regulate the transfer of stock, create a secret lien upon it, which would adhere to it in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice. This question was elaborately, if not exhaustively, discussed in Bullard v. Bank, 18 Wall. 589, and in Driscoll v.

West Bradley & C. M. Co. 59 N. Y. 96, and the conclusion reached in both cases was that a corporation could not, under the power to make by-laws for the regulation of the transfer of stock, "create or declare a lien upon the stock by by-law, nor refuse to permit a transfer until the indebtedness of the stockholder to the company be paid."

The proposition that the possession of certificates of corporate stock which bear the proper indorsements is prima facie evidence of ownership, and that the holder for value without notice of prior equities obtains a perfect title as against such equities is not weakened, but rather strengthened by the provisions of our Code relating to that subject.

Without such a petition or recommendation the appellant contends that the board could not acquire jurisdiction to order the work done. Such is our understanding of the law. COLUMBUS BARTLETT, ADMR., ETC., RESPONDENT, v.
FRANKLIN D. COTTLE, APPELLANT.

PROMISSORY NOTE WITH SECURITY.—FORM OF ACTION.—Where a mortgage is given to secure the payment of a promissory note, an action cannot be maintained on the note alone, unless the security is valueless. If the security has any value, the action must be brought in pursuance of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The note in question was secured by a mortgage on real and personal property. The action was brought on the note alone, the complaint being silent as to the mortgage. The existence of the mortgage was set forth in the answer as matter in abatement of the action. The court below found that the security was of no value, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff.

B. S. Brooks, for Appellant, argued that the evidence did not justify the finding that the security was valueless.

C. L. Smith, for Respondent.

Section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure is designed merely to protect defendants from more than one action for the recovery of a debt. If the plaintiff elects to proceed on the debt alone he may do so, but will be debarred from subsequently attempting to foreclose the security in another action. (Ould v. Stoddard, 54 Cal. 613.)

THORNTON, J.—It is contended that the judgment in this case ought not to stand, because the security was not valueless when the action was commenced. On an examination of the testimony, we are of opinion that the security was not without value at the time referred to. The respondent in his calculation of value of the security leaves out the value of the houses on the leased property (the security in question), which was testified to by Perrine, the lessor. This action on the note; then, cannot be maintained under the provisions of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure. According to this section, there can be but one action, and that of the character prescribed in it.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded.

ASA FISK, RESPONDENT, v. THOMAS S. MILLER,
APPELLANT.

PROMISSORY NOTE—INDORSEMENT.—H. made his promissory note payable to the order of M., but intended for his own accommodation. Before the maturity of the note, M. wrote his name on the back at the request of H., who thereupon sold the note to F. Held, that M. became an indorser, and is liable as such.

ID.—PLEADING.—An averment that the note was presented to the maker at maturity for payment, and payment thereof demanded, but the same was not paid, of all which due notice was given to the indorser, is a sufficient averment of presentment, refusal, and notice.

ID.—PROTEST.—The certificate of a notary showing the presentment to and demand upon the maker for payment, and his refusal to pay, and that notice of such demand and non-payment was given on the next day by the notary to the indorser by delivering the same at his residence to a person of discretion in charge apparently acting for him, is prima facie evidence of the facts stated, and these facts are sufficient to show notice to the indorser of the dishonor of the note.

TENDER.—A tender made was held to be bad for insufficiency in the amount.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The note in controversy was payable sixty days after date, and the plaintiff purchased it before maturity at a discount of seventy-five dollars, the note being for seven hundred and fifty dollars, with interest at the rate of one per cent per month. After the commencement of the action, the indorser tendered to the plaintiff an amount equal to the sum he paid for the note and the interest and costs which had then accrued, but the plaintiff refused to accept it. The action was brought against the maker and indorser, but the only defense was by the indorser.

P. B. Ladd, for Appellant.

John H. B. Willins, for Respondent.

Ross, J.—The note in suit was made by the defendant Harker, indorsed before maturity at the request and for the benefit of Harker by the defendant Miller, and then sold by Harker to the plaintiff. Miller, by his act, became indorser, and liable as such. (Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 484.)

The averment in the complaint of presentment, demand, refusal, and notice we think sufficient. It is, "that said note at maturity was presented to said George M. A. Harker for payment, and payment thereof demanded, but the same was not paid, of all which due notice was given to said defendant, Thomas S. Miller." The protest of the notary shows the fact of presentment to and demand on the maker for payment, and refusal on his part to pay, and the further fact that notice of such demand and non-payment was given on the next day by the notary to the indorser, by delivering the same at his residence, No. 1,208 Leavenworth Street, in the city of San Francisco, to a person in charge, of discretion, apparently acting for him. The protest was prima facie evidence of those facts, and the facts show a sufficient notice to the indorser of the dishonor of the note. (Pol. Code, § 795; Civ. Code, § 3144.)

The tender relied on, if otherwise good, was insufficient in amount.

MORTGAGE OF GROWING CROP — LANDLORD AND TENANT.—The mortgagee of a growing crop planted by a tenant under a contract which entitles the landlord to a portion of the crop, only succeeds to the interest of the mortgagor; and where the mortgage is made by the tenant, and the mortgagee takes possession, harvests the crop, and converts the whole to his own use, he is liable for the share of the landlord on a proper demand for its delivery.

EVIDENCE — DEPOSITIONS.—Certain depositions were taken on behalf of the plaintiff under subdivision 2 of section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The attorney for the defendant was present, and cross-examined the witnesses. Before the depositions were offered, it was shown that when they were taken the witnesses resided in the county of Alameda, and that they continued to reside there at the time of the trial. The action was brought and the trial had in the city and county of San Francisco. The depositions were admitted against the objection of the defendant to the sufficiency of the showing as to the absence of the witnesses. Held, that no error was committed in overruling the objection.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court

L. S. Clark, for Appellant.

William Matthews, for Respondent, cited Wentworth v. Miller, 53 Cal. 10.

McKEE, J.—By a verbal contract between the plaintiff and one Witt, the latter agreed to sow in grain a tract of land which the plaintiff leased to him for the farming season of 1877-78, and to harvest the crop raised thereon, have it threshed, sacked, and hauled at his own expense to a place called Sunol's Station, and deliver it there to the plaintiff, who was to divide it according to the terms of the contract.

After Witt had planted the crop he mortgaged it to the defendant Molloy, and left the leased premises; Molloy entered into possession under his mortgage and harvested the crop, but kept it all, and refused to deliver any portion of it to the plaintiff.

Molloy had no right to the whole crop. As mortgagee in possession he succeeded to the contract of his mortgagor with the plaintiff, and was bound by its terms. (§ 822, Civ. Code.) The only interest which he acquired in the crop was the interest of the mortgagor under the contract. (Wentworth v. Miller, 53 Cal. 10.) That was an undivided interest in common with the plaintiff; he and the plaintiff were, therefore, tenants in common of the crop; and when he repudiated the relationship, and refused to deliver to the plaintiff her share of the crop, he was guilty of a conversion, and liable for the value of the plaintiff's share in the crop.

There was no error in overruling the objections made to the admission of the depositions of witnesses for the plaintiff. The depositions had been taken under subdivision 2, section 2021, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant, by his attorney, had attended the taking of the same, and cross-examined the witnesses; and before reading the depositions in evidence, testimony was given tending to show that at the time of the trial the witnesses resided in another county, and were then absent from the county where the case was on trial. This was satisfactory to the court, and the ruling of the court as to the sufficiency of that testimony is not reviewable on appeal. Upon the testimony the depositions were admissible under section 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

THEW NUNAN, APPELLANT.

SALE — DELIVERY — CHANGE OF POSSESSION.— S. C. & Co. while indebted to D. & G. sold the property in controversy — thirty-three tons of hay — to the respondents, and agreed to deliver it to them at a landing on the Sacramento River. The vendors immediately hauled the hay to the landing, and delivered it on board a schooner chartered by the respondents. While the schooner was in transit to San Francisco, where the respondents were doing business, the appellant, as sheriff, attached the property in an action by D. & G. against the vendors, and sold it, and applied the proceeds to the satisfaction of their claim. Held, in an action against the sheriff to recover the property or its value, that the sale was followed by an immediate and continued change of possession, and not being fraudulent in fact, the seizure was unlawful.

REPLEVIN — DAMAGES — INTEREST.— In an action to recover personal property or its value, interest on the value of the property is allowable, by way of damages for detention, from the date of the wrongful taking.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to recover certain personal property or its value, and the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars as damages for the detention. There was no evidence upon the question of damages caused by the detention, but the court gave judgment for a return of the property with legal interest on its value from the wrongful taking, or if not returned, for the value of the property with legal interest thereon as damages for the detention from the date of the seizure.

The other facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

George D. Shadburne, for Appellant.

There was no immediate delivery or continued change of possession from Schmidt, Christian & Co. to plaintiffs of the property in question, hence any transfer thereof was fraudulent as to the creditors of Schmidt, Christian & Co., and was void as to any of their creditors while they remained in possession. The transfer claimed by plaintiffs to them of the property in question was made, if made at all, with intent to defraud. (§ 3439, Civ. Code.)

Of this the statute does not demand conclusive proof. (White v. Leszynsky, 14 Cal. 165; Purkitt v. Polack, 17 Cal. 327; Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457.)

And as long as the seller preserves sufficient control over the goods to retain the right of stoppage in transitu, he prevents the vendee from accepting them as his own within the meaning of the statute. No damages were proved or allowed at the trial, yet the judgment awards interest as damages, which we claim was error. (§§ 627, 667, Code Civ. Proc.; §§ 1917, 3336, Civ. Code.)

F. J. Castelhun, for Respondents.

There was not only an immediate delivery, but an immediate change of possession, which continued uninterruptedly until the defendant took the hay from plaintiffs' agent, Capt. Snyder.

As to the right of stoppage in transit, the seller lost it the moment the hay arrived at Hudab's Landing. (§ 1755, Civ. Code.)

But even if the seller had the right of stoppage, he could only exercise that right under the conditions contained in sections 3076, 3077, 3078, 3079, and 3080, Civ. Code.

As to all other persons but the seller, the purchaser's right is supreme. (§ 3080, Civ. Code.)

Interest was properly allowed as damages on the value of the property. (§§ 627, 667, Code Civ. Proc.; §§ 3287, 3288, 3333, Civ. Code; Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Hisler v. Carr et al. 34 Cal. 641; Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412; Freeborn v. Norcross, 49 Cal. 313.)

McKee, J.—Action to recover the possession of personal property or its value. The action was tried upon an issue of justification, under a writ of attachment against the plaintiffs' vendors.

Demand and refusal were admitted; it was also admitted that the defendant, acting as the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, by a writ of attachment sued out in the case of Dalton & Gray against Schmidt, Christian & Co., seized the property as the property of the attachment debtors, and afterwards sold it, at execution sale, by an execution issued on a judgment rendered in the case, and applied the proceeds of the sale to the satisfaction of the execution. But the court found that the property at the time of its seizure belonged to the plaintiffs, and that it was not subject to the levy of the attachment or execution. It is contended that the finding is not sustained by the evidence.

There was no substantial conflict of evidence. The property consisted of thirty-three tons of hay, which had been raised by Schmidt, Christian & Co., on a ranch situate on the Sacramento River. In October, 1879, they sold the hay on the ranch to the plaintiffs, and agreed to deliver it to them at a landing on the river known as Hudab's Landing. Immediately after the sale they had the hay hauled to the landing, where, soon afterwards, it was taken by the plaintiffs' agents on board a schooner which the plaintiffs had chartered to bring the hay for them to San Francisco, where they wanted to use it. The schooner arrived at her wharf in San Francisco with the hay, but before it was unloaded the defendant seized it by virtue of the attachment; and it is contended that being on board the schooner, the hay had not been delivered on the wharf to the plaintiffs, and was in law in the possession of the vendors, and subject to the attachment against them.

But the sale made on the ranch was complete and not executory; and it was accompanied by an immediate delivery, when the hay was hauled to the landing in pursuance of the contract of sale, and followed by a change of possession when the plaintiffs by themselves or their agents received the hay on board the schooner to be carried to San Francisco. That possession thus acquired continued uninterruptedly in the plaintiffs until the seizure of the hay by the defendant. Being in them at the time of the seizure, the hay was not in the possession of the vendors, and the seizure was wrongful, unless the sale itself was fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the vendors.

In the transaction between the vendors and vendees, it is not claimed there was any fraud in fact; and as the sale was bona fide, accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by a change of possession, it was not fraudulent in law. Being free from fraud in law and fact, the conclusion that the hay was the property of the plaintiffs at the time of the seizure by the defendant, and not subject to the attachment against their vendors, was legitimately drawn.

It was not erroneous to allow interest, by way of damages, on the value of the hay from the day it was wrongfully taken from the plaintiffs. (Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Freeborn v. Norcross, 49 Cal. 313; Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412; § 3287, Civ. Code.)

CHARLES S. BRYCE ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. OREN JOYNT, APPELLANT.

PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE.—On an issue as to whether one of several persons sued as partners was a member of the partnership when the transactions in question took place, the books of the firm, in the absence of other evidence, are not admissible to prove his connection with the partnership. But evidence tending to show that he was a member being first introduced, and it appearing that he had access to the books during a considerable period covering the dates at which the transactions occurred, and that he examined them on several occasions, and caused balance sheets to be taken from them and rendered to him, the books and the entries in them are competent to be submitted to the jury.

ID.—PRELIMINARY PROOFS—EVIDENCE TO CONTRADICT.—The sufficiency of the preliminary proofs to justify the admission of the books is a question for the court, and it is not error to reject evidence offered before the books are admitted to contradict these proofs. The rejection of evidence thus offered does not preclude its introduction at a subsequent stage of the trial in order to obviate the effect of the books.

ID.—INSTRUCTION.—The rights of the defendant in such a case are properly guarded by an instruction to the jury not to consider the books at all as evidence unless they believe from the evidence that the defendant knew their contents, and consented to the entries made in them, or knowing of them assented to them afterwards.

OFFER OF EVIDENCE—PRACTICE—APPEAL.—An offer of evidence cannot be considered on appeal unless there is a ruling upon it and an exception taken.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought against three persons as partners, but was afterwards dismissed as to two of them without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to proceed against the remaining defendant as a member of the firm. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice McKee.

E. W. McGraw, for Appellant.

1. The books were not admissible for the purpose of showing that the defendant was a member of the partnership. (Robins v. Warde, 111 Mass. 244; Abbott v. Pearson, 130 Mass. 192; McNeill's Exrs. v. Reynolds, 9 Ala. 313.)

2. The admissibility of the books was a question for the court, and not for the jury, and the court erred in deciding it without hearing the evidence on both sides. (Best on Evidence, 113; Bartlett v. Smith, 11 Mea. & W. 485, 486; Boyle v. Wise— man, 11 Ex. 360; Cleave v. Jones, 7 Ex. 421; Corfield v. Parsons, 1 Cramp. & M. 730; Harris v. Wilson, 7 Wend. 57; Livingston v. Kiersted, 10 Johns. 382; Gorton v. Hadsell, 9 Cush. 511; Jones v. Hurlbut, 39 Barb. 409; 1 Greenl. on Evidence, 13th ed. § 49, note 3; Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 2101, 2102.)

Chickering & Thomas, and Wm. M. Pierson, for Respondents.

1. Before offering the books, it was proved by evidence aliunde that the defendant was a partner. The books were admissible in corroboration of such evidence. (2 Greenl. on Evidence, § 483; Collyer on Partnership, § 770; Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 437; Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795; Frick v. Barbour, 64 Pa. St. 120; Chidsey v. Porter, 21 Pa. St. 393; McCann v. McDonald, 7 Neb. 305; 2 Wharton on Evidence, §§ 1132, 1194; Parsons on Partnership, 195.)

2. The defendant was familiar with the books, frequently examined them, and had balance sheets made from them. Under these circumstances, the books were admissible irrespective of any other proof that he was a member of the firm; and a prima facie case for their admission being made out, it was proper for the court to admit them without hearing further evidence. (Code of Civil Procedure, § 2102; Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 342.)

3. The effect of the books as evidence was carefully guarded by the instructions of the court. (Union Water Company v. Crary, 25 Cal. 504.)

McKEE, J.—In this case the only issue raised by the pleadings involved the question: Whether Oren Joynt, the appellant, was at the dates of the transactions in controversy, a co-partner with the other defendants in the firm of Hubbard Ward & Company. The transactions with the company took place in March, 1877.

At the trial of the issue, after evidence had been given on behalf of the plaintiffs, tending to prove that on the first of March, 1876, Oren Joynt, George C. Joynt, and Hubbard Ward formed a partnership, under the firm name of Hubbard Ward & Co., and that in March, 1877, Oren Joynt was still a member of the firm and continued therein until the failure of the firm in the fall of 1877, counsel for the plaintiffs proved the identity of the cash book, journal, and ledger of the firm, and, in connection therewith, gave evidence tending to prove that the defendant, during the years 1876-77, had had access to the books, and on several occasions had examined them and caused balance sheets to be taken from them and rendered to him. Upon that evidence the plaintiffs then offered some of the entries in the books and the books themselves as evidence, and, over the objections of the defendant, the court admitted them, and the ruling is assigned as error.

In and of themselves the books were not admissible for the purpose of proving partnership. Until there was evidence of the fact, at the times of the entries on the books, the entries are to be regarded as res inter alios, mere declarations of a third person, and not made under oath, which are not binding and are inadmissible to prove the fact. Partnership, like agency, must be proved by evidence aliunde. But when there is such evidence, sufficient in the judgment of the court to lay the foundation for the admission of corroborative evidence, then the books and the entries therein may be admitted as the facts and declarations of parties between whom such a relationship exists. (Abbott v. Pearson, 180 Mass. 191; Robins v. Warde, 111 Mass. 244; McNeill's Exrs. v. Reynolds, 9 Ala. 318.)

The case of Hale v. Brennan, 28 Cal. 512, like the case in hand, involved a question of partnership, i. e., whether there existed, between the plaintiff and the testator of the defendant in the case, a co-partnership in the business of keeping a hotel. At the trial it was admitted that the plaintiff was owner of one half of the hotel; evidence was also given tending to prove that the business had been carried on and the books kept in the name of the "Santa Cruz Hotel"; that the entries in the books had been made by the testator and the clerk of the hotel, and that, after the death of the testator, the plaintiff had taken possession of the books. Upon that proof the books were offered and admitted in evidence, and it was held they were properly admitted. "They may," say the court, "have offered very little evidence upon the main question; . . . but if they afforded any they were admissible."

Of course, the admissibility of the books depended upon the preliminary proof of partnership before the court at the time when the books were offered as evidence. But whether there was sufficient evidence of the fact, to serve as a foundation for their admission, was a question for the court, although the fact itself was ultimately to be found by the jury.

It is conceded that the admissibility of the books was a question for the court; but it is claimed that the defendant had the right to introduce counter-testimony upon the point of access and examination of the books, and that the right was denied him. The record shows no denial of the right, if such existed; for it shows that after the witnesses who had testified to the defendant's access to and examination of the books, had been cross-examined by his counsel, the counsel then stated to the court: "If the court thinks the admissibility of the books depends on that testimony, which is a question for the court, I think we would have a right to introduce counter-testimony upon that point, as to whether Joynt ever examined the books. We offer to put Oren Joynt on the stand to show that he never did." Upon this offer no ruling was made by the court, nor was one pressed; and the court ruled "that the books were admissible under the showing made." To that ruling no exception was taken. But when the entries on the books were offered, objections were made that "they were not admissible to prove partnership, and that the court should not pass upon the admissibility of the books until it has heard the evidence on both sides." Those objections were overruled, and to that the defendant then excepted.

But the ruling was not erroneous; for the books had been admitted, and the entries upon them, which were proposed to be read to the jury, tended to prove that the defendant was a member of the firm, and participated in its profits. Besides, a court is not bound to take counter-proof upon a preliminary question raised for its consideration and decision as to the admissibility of corroborative evidence of a fact in issue. It may permit such a course to be taken; but whether it will or not is a matter within its discretion, with which the appellate court will not interfere unless there has been an abuse of discretion. (Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 342; Butler v. Beech, 55 Cal. 29.)

Nor was the defendant deprived by the ruling of the court of the right to prove on the trial that he had not had access to the books and had not examined them. That right, indeed, was reserved to him by the court, but he refused to exercise it; for, so far as the record shows, at no time during the trial did he offer any evidence in rebuttal of the plaintiff's evidence; consequently there is nothing in the record contradicting the evidence in the case, that the defendant had access to the books, examined them, and had balance sheets taken from them and furnished to him; nor is there any evidence in the record to disprove the partnership.

Moreover, the court in its charge to the jury instructed them that "they should not consider the books at all as evidence, unless they believed from the evidence that the defendant knew their contents, or consented to the entries made in them, or knowing of them assented to them afterwards." The right of the defendant could not have been more carefully guarded. There is no affirmative and prejudicial error in the record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

McKINSTRY, and ROSS, JJ.—We concur. There was evidence tending to prove that Joynt was informed of the contents of the books without objecting to the manner in which they were kept. Evidence of his having examined the books, together with the entries themselves, properly went to the jury as tending to prove his recognition of the partnership.

Hearing in Bank denied.

WILLIAM TRENOUTH, APPELLANT, v. ALEXANDER
GORDON ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE. — Under the circumstances set forth in the opinion of the court, held, that it was competent for the defendants to defeat the action by showing that the legal title was outstanding in third persons, without connecting themselves with such title.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

James B. Townsend, for Appellant.

Houghton & Reynolds, and M. G. Cobb, for Respondents.

The plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of the title of the defendants; that being so, defendants can show title out of plaintiff and in a third party. (Moore v. Tice, 22 Cal. 516; Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal. 536; Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567.)

MYRIOT, J.—This is an action of ejectment. Plaintiff alleges possession and ownership in himself on the 1st of July, 1874, and an ouster on that day by defendants.

Plaintiff's claim of title is, in substance, as follows: One Antonino Buelna was the owner of a Mexican grant for four leagues. He died testate, leaving a widow surviving him. His will devised the four league grant, to each of five persons an undivided one fifth, his widow being one of the five. Another of the five was one Juan Bautista Buelna, who died, leaving two children. Plaintiff claims title as grantee of these two children. The widow of Antonino executed to Salvador Castro a deed of one league of the land, who presented to the United States land commission a petition to have the same confirmed to him. The land was so confirmed, and a patent was issued in 1861. The widow presented a petition for the confirmation to her of the other three leagues, which was granted, and a patent issued in 1861. In the proceedings before the land commission the petitioners claimed to be the owners, respectively, of the lands petitioned for.

Each of the defendants has been in the possession of the tract claimed by him for ten years before the suit was commenced, under deeds, claiming ownership.

There is no evidence that either plaintiff or his grantors, the children of Juan Bautista Buelna, were ever in possession of any of the premises in controversy; nor is there any evidence that the father of the grantors was ever in possession of any particular parcel of the land. He lived on the land in 1844, but on what portion, or how much he occupied, if any, does not appear; for aught that appears he may have been a tenant of the claimant. His children were there in 1844; one was born that year, and one the year before. He died in 1846; where, does not appear. The children had no interest prior to the death of their father; and there is no evidence that they have been on the land or in possession since that event. Under such circumstances it was competent for the defendants to defeat the plaintiff's right to recover (even if he otherwise would have had the right), by proving that the persons holding the legal title had conveyed the same to third persons without connecting themselves with that legal title.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WILLIAM MOHLE, APPELLANT, v. WILLIAM
TSCHIRCH, HENRY DIERKS, RESPONDENT.

ATTACHMENT — PREFERRED CLAIMS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.—In an attachment suit certain laborers gave notice of preferred claims under section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and on the recovery of a judgment in that suit, the attached property having been previously sold under a stipulation between the parties, and the preferred claims having also been prosecuted to judgment, the court ordered that the latter judgment be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale. On appeal from this order, the section of the Code creating the preference was objected to as being unconstitutional, and it was further objected that the preference was lost by the sale of the property under the stipulation instead of an execution. Held, that neither of these objections was well taken.

1st.— ASSIGNMENT OF THE CLAIMS.—In such a case the preference given is not affected by an assignment of the claims after the service of the notice.

2d.— SUFFICIENCY OF NOTICE.—The notice was served on the day succeeding the levy of the attachment, and contained a statement that the claims were "for work and labor done for the defendant during the past sixty days." Held, that the notice was sufficient to show that the claims were for services rendered within sixty days prior to the levy.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, directing the payment of certain moneys in the hands of the sheriff.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

E. B. Drake, for Appellant.

C. E. Royce, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—Defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of six hundred dollars money loaned, and the further sum of ninety-eight dollars for wages as a laborer, a portion of the latter sum being for work done within sixty days prior to the levy of the attachment as hereinafter mentioned.

Plaintiff brought suit to recover his gross demand, and issued therein an attachment on the 13th, which was levied upon personal property of defendant on the 15th of November, 1880. On the 16th of the same month six laborers served a notice of preferred claims, under section 1206, Code of Civil Procedure, on the sheriff, the plaintiff and the defendant, and the same day they and the plaintiff stipulated and agreed with defendant, by written stipulation filed in the action, that the attached property should be sold on the 18th "for the benefit of this plaintiff or those who were entitled to the proceeds of said property." On the 18th judgment was entered by confession in the action, and the property was sold by the sheriff for six hundred and twenty-five dollars, which sum is now in the hands of that officer.

Five of the six laborers subsequently assigned their claims to the sixth, Dierka, who, on the 24th of November, within the ten days, brought suit to recover the amount of the claims and recovered judgment in the justices' court.

Afterward Dierks, on petition filed in this action, obtained an order on the plaintiff and the sheriffs to show cause why the latter should not pay the amount of said justice's judgment out of the moneys in his hands. On the 19th of January, 1881, the Superior Court made the order for the sheriff to pay the amount of said judgment, from which this appeal was taken.

It is contended by appellant that section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional, in that it provides for taking private property without due process of law, and that it is special legislation. The section provides for notice to the attaching creditor, and the latter knows that his attachment will hold the property for the benefit of the claims of the preferred class which may be established. Our attention has not been called to any subdivision of section 25 of article 4 of the State Constitution, which prohibits such legislation as is enacted in section 1206 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is also urged that the claimants lost their preference because the sale was not made under execution, but under a stipulation in the cause made by plaintiff, defendant, and the labor claimants. The sale under the stipulation was, however, but a substituted sale for one under execution.

It is also urged that the judgment in this action was for ninety-eight dollars for labor done, and therefore the claimants and their assignee, Dierks, are prohibited from a preference as to that sum. But as the funds in the hands of the sheriff was six hundred and twenty-five dollars, and the amount directed to be paid to respondent was two hundred and seventy-six dollars, leaving a balance of more than ninety-eight dollars to be applied on plaintiff's judgment herein, the point of appellant is not available here.

Appellant claims the notice of the claims of the laborers did not show that their claims were for services rendered within sixty days prior to the levy of attachment herein. The attachment was levied on the 15th of November, and the notice (served on the sixteenth) contains a statement that the claims were "for work and labor done for the said defendant during the past sixty days."

Another point of appellant is that the laborers asserting their preferred claims lost the benefit of section 1206 by the assignment to one of their number, and the prosecution of their claims to judgment by him. We can see no legal reason why, after liens in favor of the claims have attached by reason of the notice, an assignment of the claims should not carry the benefit of the liens. Such must be the effect of the assignment if valid, and the assignment is not expressly, nor do we think impliedly, prohibited by the section of the Code.

Order affirmed.

D. BIAGI, RESPONDENT, v. JOHN HOWES ET AL.,
APPELLANTS.

APPEAL — DISMISSAL OF — UNDERTAKING.—The defendants appealed from an order dismissing a motion for a new trial by serving and filing a notice and giving the undertaking required by section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Subsequently they served and filed a notice of appeal from the judgment and filed the undertaking required by section 942 of that Code. The plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, because the undertaking required by section 941 had not been given. Held, 1. That the appeal from the judgment is ineffectual for want of the undertaking required by section 941 — the undertaking on appeal from the order dismissing the motion for a new trial being inapplicable to the appeal from the judgment. 2. That the attempted appeal from the judgment failing, there is no such appeal pending, and the motion to dismiss must be denied on that ground, this course being regarded as the better practice in such a case.

MOTION to dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Henry E. Highton, for Appellants.

P. B. Nagle, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal from the judgment.

Judgment was rendered and entered in the court below in favor of plaintiff March 28, 1882. On the 2d of June following, defendant's motion for a new trial was dismissed by the Superior Court. On the 17th of the same month defendant filed and served a notice of appeal from the order dismissing his motion for a new trial, and on the same day filed an undertaking on appeal, as required by section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

July 12, 1882, defendant served and filed a notice of appeal from the judgment, and on the same day filed the undertaking provided for in section 942 of the Code.

Here was an attempt to take two separate and distinct appeals at different dates. The question is, could defendant, after having perfected an appeal from the order dismissing the motion for a new trial — assuming the order to be appealable — give this court jurisdiction of an appeal from the judgment by subsequently filing and serving a notice of appeal therefrom without giving the undertaking required by section 941. Section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares "the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal" the undertaking required by section 941 be filed. In the case before us no such undertaking was filed within five days after service of the notice of appeal from the judgment. The undertaking filed within five days after service of notice of the appeal from the order does not refer to and cannot be made applicable to the subsequent and independent notice of appeal from the judgment.

This is not the case of a single notice of appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial, followed, within the time limited, by an undertaking for costs and damages in this court.

We cannot consider the notice of appeal from the judgment as of any avail, and inasmuch as no appeal from the judgment is pending, the motion to dismiss is denied. (Reed v. Kimball, 52 Cal. 325.)

The practice with respect to such attempted appeals has not been uniform. Sometimes they have been "dismissed." But as such dismissals should be without prejudice, the form of the order is not very material. We consider it better practice, however, simply to refuse to hear the party who claims to have appealed, without having appealed in fact.

The motion is denied.

WILLIAM H. CLARK, RESPONDENT, v. HANNAH M. SMITH, EXECUTRIX OF THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF HIRAM SMITH, DECEASED, APPELLANT.

SUMMONS — SERVICE — MOTION TO DISMISS.— In an action on a promissory note given by the deceased, and to foreclose a mortgage executed to secure its payment, the summons was served on the executrix by publication ten years after the commencement of the action, and the executrix thereupon moved the court to vacate the summons and dismiss the action as to her for want of diligence in its prosecution. It appeared that the deceased had conveyed the mortgaged property to another person, and was not the owner of it at the time of his death. It also appeared that a claim for the payment of the debt had been presented to the executrix in due time, and rejected by her. The court denied the motion on condition that the plaintiff file a stipulation waiving his right to a judgment for any deficiency that might arise on a sale of the mortgaged premises. Held, that under these circumstances the action of the court below should not be disturbed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

There was a large number of defendants, but the only question on appeal was between the plaintiff and the executrix. As an excuse for the delay in serving the summons, it was shown that she had been absent from the State nearly all the time subsequent to the commencement of the action, and that her place of abode could not be ascertained by the plaintiff.

Stetson & Houghton, for Appellant.

B. S. Brooks, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—Hiram Smith deceased January 17, 1870. In his lifetime he gave to plaintiff his promissory note, and to secure the same executed a mortgage upon certain real property. After Smith's death plaintiff presented to Hannah M. Smith, executrix of his estate, his claim for the payment of his mortgage debt, which she rejected, May 28, 1870. Plaintiff began this suit to foreclose the mortgage on the 26th of August, 1870.

In the summer of 1880, on application of plaintiff, an order was made that service of summons by publication be made upon Hannah M. Smith, and an alias summons was then issued. Subsequently Hannah M. Smith moved the court to dismiss the action against her, and to vacate the alias summons, on the ground that plaintiff had failed to prosecute the action with due diligence.

The motion was denied, "but upon condition that the plaintiff file herein within five days after receiving notice of this order, a stipulation waiving all claim for judgment for any deficiency that may arise after the sale of the mortgaged premises," etc. Hannah M. Smith appeals from this order.

It is stated in the points of appellant's counsel that in his lifetime Hiram Smith sold the mortgaged land to one B. F. Moulton.

In his affidavit, filed by appellant on her motion to dismiss in the court below, John W. Stewart swears that he is the sole surviving executor of B. F. Moulton, deceased, and that "said B. F. Moulton was, at the time of his death, the owner of the land in the complaint described, having acquired the same by purchase from Hiram Smith," etc. Appellant on said motion also filed the affidavit of James F. Cossett, who swears therein that he was appointed by the Probate Court one of the appraisers of the estate of B. F. Moulton, deceased, that the premises described in the complaint were included in the inventory of the estate of Moulton.

It thus appears that the appellant has become merely a nominal defendant. The order of the court below by its terms limits the plaintiff to a collection of his mortgage debt out of the land mortgaged, the title to which, by appellant's own showing, had passed to Moulton in the lifetime of Hiram Smith. Under the circumstances, even if we would have otherwise been inclined to interfere with the discretion of the Superior Court, we decline to reverse an order which sufficiently protects the estate of Hiram Smith and his heirs.

Judgment affirmed.

DENNIS O. DINAN, RESPONDENT, v. F. FITZ GIBBON ET AL., APPELLANTS.

ASSAULT — DEADLY WEAPON — PROTECTION OF PROPERTY — INSTRUCTIONS.—

The plaintiff sued to recover damages for an alleged assault in which he was seriously wounded by the discharge of a gun. The defendant Gibbon and the mother of the plaintiff were the owners of adjoining lots in the city of San Francisco, and a dispute existed between them as to the division line. Gibbon erected a shed about ten feet high near the line, and the plaintiff claimed that the roof of the shed projected over upon the land of his mother. Gibbon was notified of the projection, but disregarded the notice. There was evidence tending to show that he believed the shed to be wholly on his own land, that at the time of the assault, the plaintiff, assisted by several other persons, was proceeding with force and violence to remove what he claimed to be the projecting portion of the roof, that Gibbon was not present, but his nephew, acting under directions from him, appeared with a loaded gun, and declared his intention to protect the shed from injury, that the plaintiff and one of the persons with him attempted to get possession of the gun, and that a struggle ensued in the course of which the gun was discharged and the wound inflicted. The court instructed the jury substantially that the mere fact of the use of such a weapon gave the plaintiff the right to recover. Held, that the instruction was erroneous.

The facts are stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE MCKEE.

Jarboe & Harrison, for Appellants, argued that the instruction of the court as to the right to use fire-arms in defense of property was erroneous, citing section 197 of the Penal Code; Pond v. The People, 8 Mich. 166; People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2; Miller v. State, 74 Ind. 1; Taylor v. Clendening, 4 Kan. 534; Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75.

Fox & Kellogg, for Respondent, argued that the defendants were not acting in defense of person or habitation, and that the instructions of the court, taken as a whole, fairly submitted the case to the jury, citing Brooks v. Crosby, 22 Cal. 42; Conroy v. Duane, 45 Cal. 597; Siemers v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418.

MCKEE, J.—This was an action to recover damages as compensation for injuries sustained from an assault on the plaintiff alleged to have been committed by the defendants.

The case was given to the jury upon evidence tending to show that the alleged assault had been committed under the following circumstances: Defendant Gibbon and the mother of the plaintiff were owners of adjacent parcels of land in the city of San Francisco. There was a dispute between them as to the true division line of the lots. Gibbon had constructed near to what he believed to be the line a shed about ten feet high, the roof of which, according to the assertion of the plaintiff, projected over a part of his mother's lot and came near to her house. Notice of the projection was given to the defendant, but he gave no heed to it. In that state of the question, the plaintiff on the 25th of September, 1876, took several men on to his mother's lot to saw off that part of the roof of the shed which extended over so much of his mother's lot as lay between her house and the supposed dividing line, and to move her house close up to that line. One of the men had mounted the roof of the shed and was in the act of sawing off the projection when the defendant, Quinlan, appeared on the balcony of the house on Gibbon's lot armed with a double-barreled shotgun, which Gibbon had loaded with powder and buckshot, and put it in the hands of Quinlan, "to watch his property against the Dinans." To prevent Quinlan from using the gun against the person on the shed, the plaintiff and another caught hold of the gun and a contest resulted between the parties, in which the gun in the hands of Quinlan was discharged into the body of the plaintiff, severely wounding him.

On submitting the case to the jury, the court, among other things, instructed them as follows:—

"1. You are instructed that the controversy over this piece of land did not justify the use of fire-arms in its settlement; that a person has no right to use deadly weapons excepting it be in the defense of life or in the protection of his domicile. Those are the only cases in which a party is authorized under the laws of this State to use anything which is calculated to produce death.

"2. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant did use this weapon for the purpose of this transaction—for the purpose of producing great bodily injury—if he used it, in fact, at all, to resist the encroachment even of the plaintiff in this action, then it is your duty, under the law, to find a verdict against him for the actual damages which the plaintiff sustained, whether there was malice in it or not.

"3. The very fact that the defendant used this unlawful weapon gives the plaintiff the right to recover."

Of course, if the evidence showed that the defendant only used the weapon for the deliberate purpose of producing great bodily injury on the plaintiff, it would have been the duty of the jury to find for the plaintiff. The use of a deadly weapon for such a purpose would render a party not only civilly but criminally liable. No one is justifiable in law, even under a pretense of right, to inflict on another a wanton and malicious assault. But if the defendant used the weapon "to resist the encroachment of the plaintiff" as a trespasser on his premises, such use would not be unlawful, unless it was unnecessary. For there is no doubt that a person in the lawful possession of premises has a right to protect them or to eject an intruder upon them; and in the exercise of his right, for that purpose, he may use such force as may be reasonably necessary. Acting within the limits of a reasonable use of force to protect himself or his property he is justifiable in law; but if he exceeds the force necessary he becomes a trespasser ab initio. Yet the necessity of the force which was resorted to to repel the "encroachment" of the plaintiff upon the defendants' premises, and the question whether the defendants used more force and violence upon the person of the plaintiff than was necessary for the protection of their property, should have been left to the jury. It was interfering with their constitutional right to determine all matters of fact, for the court to instruct them that the mere use of the weapon to resist the encroachment of the plaintiff gave him the right to recover.

Besides, if the plaintiff was the aggressor, and had actually employed others to destroy what was confessedly the property of the defendant, and was aiding and abetting them in such attempt to destroy it, in the performance of which he received his injuries, these circumstances were proper for the consideration of the jury in mitigation of damages, although they may not have been sufficient to justify the defendants for the use of a deadly weapon; and it was error to lead the jury away from the consideration of these things by instructing them that the mere use of the weapon entitled the plaintiff to their verdict.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ROSS and McKINSTRY, JJ.—In view of the testimony on the part of defendants, we agree that the court below erred in giving the third instruction mentioned in the opinion of Mr. Justice McKEE, and, therefore, concur in the judgment.

MARY FINNIGAN, APPELLANT, v. THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — EARNINGS OF WIFE.—Under section 168 of the Civil Code, the earnings of the wife are not liable for the debts of the husband.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city

• and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The lower court found that the plaintiff and the defendant Daniel Finnigan were husband and wife, and had been such since the year 1850, and that while this relation existed plaintiff made the sum of $1,874.29, by renting rooms and conducting a saloon business, within five years last past, and that during this time the defendant Daniel Finnigan contributed nothing to the support of the plaintiff or his family, and that plaintiff and defendant did not cohabit, because cohabitation was disagreeable to plaintiff, and because she refused to cohabit with the defendant Daniel Finnigan. She was not a sole trader. She deposited the money in the bank, and it was seized under an execution against the husband.

Charles F. Hanlon, for Appellant.

A. A. Pardow, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—The respondents' proposition in this case is, that money earned by a wife may be taken for the debt of her husband. The question is solved by a provision of the Code not referred to by counsel on either side. It is section 168 of the Civil Code, and reads: "The earnings of the wife are not liable for the debts of the husband."

That part of the judgment appealed from, together with the order denying the motion for a new trial, reversed, and cause remanded.

JOHN T. JOHNSON, APPELLANT, v. WILLIAM BROWN ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.—A continuous adverse possession of land for five years vests the occupant with title.

1D.— AGREED BOUNDARY.— Where the owners of adjacent parcels of land recognise a particular line as the boundary between their respective parcels, and hold possession adversely in conformity to such line for more than five years, each is estopped from afterwards questioning the line so recognised as the true boundary.

1A. — PAYMENT OF TAXES. — The provision of the Code requiring the payment of taxes as an element of adverse possession, has no application where the Statute of Limitations had run prior to the adoption of that provision. A title acquired under the statute cannot be divested by a subsequent enactment.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

O. V. Grey, for Appellant.

Leonard Reynolds, for Respondents.

The authorities are abundant to the point that when the owners of adjoining lands have acquiesced for a considerable time in the location of a division line between their lands, although it may not be the true line according to the calls of their deeds, they are thereafter precluded from saying it is not the true line. (Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 626.)

When a grantee of a lot in San Francisco, by mistake and in good faith, takes possession of a strip adjoining his lot, and remains in the adverse possession of it for five years subsequent to the Act of April 18, 1863, such adverse possession would bar an ejectment. (Grimm v. Curley, 43 Cal. 250; Stuyvesant v. Dunham, 9 Johns. 61; Columbet v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 395; McCormick v. Barnum, 10 Wend. 104; Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. 286; Baldwin v. Brown, 16 N. Y. 359; Reed v. Farr, 35 N. Y. 113; Biggins v. Champlin, 8 Pac. C. L. J. 811.)

McKee, J.— Ejectment to recover a strip of land about a foot wide and a hundred feet deep.

The case shows that the land formerly belonged to the plaintiff, as part and parcel of a tract of land one hundred feet wide and one hundred feet deep, situate on the Potrero Nuevo in the city and county of San Francisco. In October, 1870, the plaintiff, being then the owner of the tract, sold to the defendant a lot twenty-five feet wide and one hundred feet deep, off the southern side of the tract. At the time of the sale he pointed out a fence on the southern side as the southern line of the tract. The defendant, after he had received his deed for his lot, entered within that fence, and with a pole and tape line measured off, northerly from the end of the fence, a distance, as he supposed, of twenty-five feet front. The measurement included the strip of land in controversy, but the fact was not known to the plaintiff or the defendant. The former was not present at the measurement, but he was immediately informed of it by the latter, and he recognized it and acquiesced in it as correct. At all events, being coterminous proprietors, it was then agreed between them that if the defendant would build his house close up to the supposed division line, the plaintiff would build a fence along the line from the house to the rear line of the lots. The house and fence were, in fact, built by the respective parties, and formed what was supposed to be the northern line of the defendant's lot; and that line in connection with the fence on the southern side made an enclosure of the lot within which the defendant has resided, occupying to the lines of both fences, continuously and adversely to the plaintiff, as adjacent proprietor, from October, 1870, until the commencement of the action in June, 1878. This adverse possession of the land vested the defendant with title. (Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 539; Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 381; Langford v. Poppe, 56 Cal. 73.)

Besides, where owners of adjacent parcels of land have occupied adversely to each other for more than five years, their respective tracts by a division line, which each has recognized and acquiesced in as the true line, during all of that time, either is estopped from afterwards questioning it as the true line. (Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 626; Columbet v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 395; Moyle v. Connolly, 50 Cal. 295; Biggins v. Champlin, 59 Cal. 113; Cooper v. Vierra, 59 Cal. 282.)

Evidence as to the payment of taxes by plaintiff on the adjacent lot of seventy-five feet front, which remained to the plaintiff after he had conveyed to the defendant, was properly excluded. The evidence was immaterial. The defendant was not bound to prove that he had paid the taxes levied on the strip of land in dispute, to establish his adverse possession of it; for the statute requiring the payment of taxes as an essential element of adverse possession was not passed until April, 1878, three years after the Statute of Limitations had run in his favor. The title acquired under the Statute of Limitations before the passage of the law could not be divested by the law. (Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288.)

Order affirmed.

D. J. QUIMBY, RESPONDENT, v. JOHN L. LYON ET AL.,
APPELLANTS.

PLEADING — MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.—In an action for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff, it is not necessary to allege a request or demand for the payment of the money. Such an allegation is usual, but not essential to the sufficiency of the complaint.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Harmon & Galpin, for Appellants, argued that a demand was necessary, and should have been alleged. The principal authorities cited by them are referred to in the opinion of the court.

E. F. Preston, for Respondent, contended that no demand was required, and cited a large number of authorities in support of his position. The following are the most important: Utica Bank v. Gieson, 18 Johns. 485; Calais v. Whidden, 64 Me. 253; Stetson v. Howe, 31 Me. 353; Hawley v. Sage, 15 Conn. 54; Spence v. Thompson, 11 Ala. 746; Rutherford v. McIvor, 21 Ala. 750; Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 577, 579.

McKINSTRY, J.—The appeal is on the judgment roll, and the single point is made that the complaint does not allege a demand and refusal to pay the money. The objection was not made in the court below.

The complaint avers: "Heretofore, to wit, on the 29th day of December, 1878, the said defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500, gold coin of the United States, for money had and received by said defendants upon the 28th day of December, 1878, for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. That no part," etc.

It is settled that the "common counts" can be used in this State. (Abadie v. Carrillo, 32 Cal. 174.)

"In point of form there are in pleading two descriptions of request, one termed a special request, and the other, the licet scpe requisitus." (1 Chitty's Pleadings, 16 Am. Ed. 541.)

A special request need not be stated or proved in the case of common counts for goods sold, work and labor, money lent, etc. The licet scpe requisitus, though usually inserted in the common breach to the money counts, is of no avail in pleading, and the omission of it will in no case vitiate the pleading. (Chitty's Pleadings, 329-331.)

As was said by the Supreme Court of Connecticut: "When money is received by one man, which belongs to another, the law raises a promise on the part of the receiver that he will pay it, and that, too, without any previous request. If, therefore, from the situation of the parties, or the relation in which they stood to each other, this implied promise could have been rebutted, the defendant should have shown it. But as he has shown nothing but a desire to keep the plaintiff's money, his case must be governed by the general rule applicable to a precedent debt or duty." (Hawley v. Sage, 15 Conn. 56.)

The action for money had and received may be maintained whenever an equity arises from the circumstance that one man has money which he ought to pay to another. There is no presumption that the one in possession holds the money under a contract express or implied to retain it until the party entitled to it shall actually demand it.

The California cases relied upon by appellants do not sustain their position. In Reina v. Cross, 6 Cal. 30, it was said: "A party receiving money to the use of another is rightfully in possession until the same is demanded." But there were two counts in the complaint and the other was held good, so that the dictum with reference to the first was not necessary to the determination of the appeal. In Stanwood v. Sage, 22 Cal. 517, it would seem that the complaint did allege a demand, and the court did not hold, nor was it called on to hold, that the averment of demand was necessary. Campbell v. Jones, 38 Cal. 507, was an action, in tort, for specific personal property, with damages for its detention. The complaint showing affirmatively that defendant came rightfully to the possession of the property, the omission to aver a demand for its delivery or refusal, or its conversion, rendered — said two of the five justices — the complaint fatally defective.

Judgment affirmed.

J. J. PETTIGREW, RESPONDENT, v. JACOB DOBBELAAR, APPELLANT.

DEED — SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION. — The action was ejectment, and plaintiff introduced two deeds in support of his title. The first, after stating that the property was situated in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, described it as follows: "Gift Map No. 2, lots No. 398 to 405 inclusive," etc. The descriptive clause of the second deed was as follows: "All lands and real estate belonging to the said party of the first part wherever the same may be situated, together," etc. This deed was executed in Illinois. Held, 1, that if there was a map of lands in San Francisco known as "Gift Map No. 2," the description in the first deed is sufficient; and 2, that if the lands in controversy belonged to the grantor mentioned in the second deed, they passed by the execution of that deed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the head note and opinion of the court.

N. B. Mulville, for Appellant, cited § 1092, Civ. Code: § 2077, Code Civ. Proc.; Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 149.

R. W. Hent, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — Appeal by defendant from a judgment for the recovery of certain lands.

Appellant claims the deed from Harvey to Lacey is void, because it contains no description of the lands sought to be conveyed.

The deed purports to remise, release, and forever quit claim . . . those certain pieces and parcels of land in the county of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: "Gift Map No. 2, lots No. 308 to 405 inclusive. Gift Map No. 2, lots No. 406, 407; together with all tenements, hereditaments thereto belonging, and also all the estate, right, title, and interest," etc.

If there was a map of lands in San Francisco known as "Gift Map No. 2," the description is sufficient. We cannot say, therefore, that it is insufficient. (Penry v. Richards, 52 Cal. 496.)

Appellant also urges the second deed from Harvey to Lacey contains no description, and is void. The descriptive clause is, "all lands and real estate belonging to the said party of the first part, wherever the same may be situated, together," etc.

If the lands in controversy belonged to Harvey they passed by the deed last mentioned. (Lick v. O'Donnell, 3 Cal. 59.)

The testimony of Harvey — if believed by the court below, and it would appear from the finding it was believed — proved that defendant occupied with the consent of plaintiff's grantor, with an agreement on his part that he would surrender possession on demand. The demand was made.

Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

BARBARA JENNINGS, ADMINISTRATRIX, ETC., APPELLANT, v. THEODORE LE ROY ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — POWER OF THE LEGISLATURE — CHANGING THE GRADE OF A STREET. — The Act of the 1st of April, 1878, changing the grade of Bay Street in the city and county of San Francisco, was not in violation of any constitutional provision in force at the time of its passage, although its effect was to modify pro tanto the general statutes relating to street grades and improvements in San Francisco, and no provision was made for compensation to the owners of adjacent lots.

WORK DONE IN CHANGING THE GRADE — ASSESSMENT AND PRIOR PROCEEDINGS — STATUTES APPLICABLE. — The general statutes above referred to, as modified by the act in question, held to govern in relation to the assessment for the work and proceedings prior thereto.

ER. — FINDINGS — EVIDENCE. — The court below found that the resolution of the board of supervisors ordering the work to be done was not published after its introduction and before final action thereon, and that certain notices required in the course of the proceedings prior to the assessment were not given. The plaintiff gave in evidence the assessment, diagram, warrant, and affidavit of demand and non-payment, with the indorsements thereon showing the same to have been duly recorded, and no other evidence was introduced in regard to the proceedings. The assessment, diagram, and warrant being prima facie evidence of the regularity of the previous proceedings, held, that the findings could not be sustained.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to collect an assessment upon lots fronting on Bay Street, in the city and county of San Francisco, for grading that street under the act of the legislature passed April 1, 1878, entitled "an act to authorize the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to order Bay Street graded, and to change its grade."

Section one of the act authorized and empowered the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to order graded the whole or any part of Bay Street from the east line of Larkin Street to the east line of the Presidio Reservation, without receiving any petition from any person therefor, with the proviso, that the board shall have the grading between the east line of Larkin Street and Fillmore Street done either as a whole or in subdivisions, at their discretion; and that they shall have the grading between Fillmore Street and the east line of the Presidio Reservation done either as a whole or in subdivisions, at their discretion.

Section two of the act changed the old grade, and fixed and established a new one.

Section three of the act repealed all acts in conflict with its provisions, in so far only as they are inconsistent.

J. M. Wood, and J. C. Bates, for Appellant.

All proceedings by the board of supervisors were regular and correct, there being no objection taken to the assessment, diagram, warrant, and return when introduced and read in evidence, which of course prima facie proved the regularity and correctness of all prior proceedings. (Stats. 1871-72, p. 815, § 12; Smith v. Cofran, 34 Cal. 317.)

The conclusion of law, on page 39 of transcript, would lead one to imagine that the trial court thought the Act of

April 1, 1878, unconstitutional and void, as providing a different mode of procedure for Bay Street from other streets that required the same kind of work done. A similar question was distinctly raised and squarely passed upon in the case of Oakland Pav. Co. v. Bier, 52 Cal. 275.

In that case the court say: . . . "It is urged that the sections of the act relating to Broadway Street are unconstitutional, but we see no ground upon which that proposition can be maintained. No reason is suggested why the legislature, in providing for the improvement of the streets in a city, may not devise or adopt two or more modes for that purpose, if the condition of the streets, in the opinion of the legislature, seems to require it. Nor is there any force in the objection that the council has no power to levy an assessment in the usual manner to pay for the improvement. (Cooley's Con. Lim. p. 497.)

There can be no doubt that the petition of property owners can be dispensed with in all street assessment proceedings.

In the case of Hewes v. Reis, 40 Cal. 263, Justice Temple uses the following language: "It was competent for the legislature to have authorized the board to make the contract without publishing a notice of intention and without inviting bids, and then to have compelled the defendants to pay the amount through its sovereign power of taxation."

B. S. Brooks, for Respondent.

The principal question is, whether the cost of grading Bay Street, under the act passed April 1, 1878, entitled "an act to authorize the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to order Bay Street graded, and to change its grade," was a charge upon the lots fronting on the said street. It was not claimed that the work had been done in compliance with the provisions of the general street improvement law of the said city and county, or so as to create any charge against the said property under that law, but the right was claimed by virtue of the special act, and it was admitted that the width and grade of said portion of Bay Street had been established before that.

To construe the act according to its terms, makes it constitutional and just. To interpolate into it a clause that it is to be done at the expense of the adjoining property would render it unjust, and of doubtful constitutionality.

While it gives a discretion to the board to do the work or not at their pleasure, and if they decide to do it, then in such parcels as they please, it does not require any notice to the property owner, or fix any time or place when he can be heard. "It is fundamental law that no man shall be deprived of his rights, either of person or property, without an opportunity of being heard. He cannot be heard unless he have a reasonable notice of the time when, and the place where, his rights are to be adjudged." (N. J. Turnpike Co. v. Hall, 2 Har. (N. J.) 337; State v. Newark, 1 Dutch. 411; Hess v. Cole, 3 Zab. 124; State v. Jersey City, 4 Zab. 662.)

It was accordingly held that a law which did not itself provide for such notice and hearing was unconstitutional and void. (Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183; State v. Morristown, 5 Vroom, 445-454; State v. Plainfield, 38 N. J. L. 95, 98.)

It is a special law, "unequal and partial legislation." (Cooley, 389-393; Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 85; Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, p. 80; People v. Cooper, 83 Ill. 594.)

We have a special act establishing the grades of the streets of the city, and fixing a mode of procedure by which the grade may be changed, and providing for the ascertainment and payment of damages.

This is in accordance with a principle, now recognized in all or nearly all the States, that a change of an established grade should not be made without compensation. (Ryan v. Boston, 118 Mass. 248; Herzer v. Milwaukee, 39 Wis. 360; People v. Green, 64 N. Y. 606; McCarthy v. St. Paul, 22 Minn. 527; Mayor v. Nichol, 59 Tenn. 338; Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535; Damour v. Lyons City, 44 Iowa, 276; Armstrong v. St. Louis, 3 Mo. App. 151; Schumaker v. St. Louis, 3 Mo. App. 297; Lane v. Boston, 125 Mass. 519; Cambridge v. Middlesex Co. Com. 125 Mass. 529; Akron v. Chamberlain Co. 34 Ohio St. 323; Donovan v. Springfield, 125 Mass. 371.)

MYRIOT, J.—The Act of April 1, 1878, (Stats. 1877-78, p. 931), must be construed as having the effect of changing the grade of Bay Street at the points therein designated, and of authorizing that street, between the termini named, to be graded to the line of grade thereby established, without a petition from property owners. At the time of the passage of that act there was no constitutional objection to its passage. It was competent for the legislature to pass the act, even though it might, in effect, repeal or modify some provisions of existing laws, and that without re-enacting the statutes as modified or changed. The purpose of the act is sufficiently stated in its title. The respondent claims that when the line of grade has once been established (the street not being in fact graded to the line), the adjacent property owners have a right of property in the line of grade as established which cannot be taken from them without compensation. We have not been referred to any case or to any text writer which sustains the proposition. The cases are uniform, that the owner holds his property subject to the right of the legislative authority to establish and change grades; some cases, however, have stated that the owner is entitled to damages if his improvements or his right to use them are affected. The case before us is not such a one.

The court found that the resolution ordering the work to be done was not, after its introduction, published before final action thereon; that notice of the nature and character of the work to be done, with specifications, was not posted in the office of the superintendent of streets; and that no notice of the award was published. The only evidence upon that subject was the assessment, diagram, warrant, and affidavit of demand and non-payment, with the indorsements thereon showing due recording. The statute (Stats. 1871-72, p. 815, § 12) makes the warrant, assessment, and diagram prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent, and of the regularity of all the acts and proceedings of the board of supervisors, upon which they are based; therefore there was some evidence of the regularity and correctness of the proceedings, and, there being no evidence in conflict, the findings above referred to are not sustained.

We are of opinion that the general statutes concerning the improvement of streets in the city and county of San Francisco, as modified by the Act of April 1, 1878, apply to the case before us.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF FRANCISCO PALOMARES, DECEASED, A. BRISWALTER, APPELLANT.

ADMINISTRATION — SETTING APART PROPERTY FOR MINOR CHILDREN — DECREE — NOTICE. — Upon proper application the lower court made a decree setting apart certain property appraised at fourteen hundred and forty dollars, for the use and benefit of minor children. It appeared from the inventory that the whole estate did not exceed fifteen hundred dollars. The decree recited that notice had been given of the hearing of the petition as directed by a previous order of the court, that testimony was taken, and that the widow had consented. Afterwards, Briswalter, a creditor, filed a petition asking that the decree be set aside, alleging that no publication of notice to creditors had been given, that the proceedings were taken to defraud and hinder the creditors of deceased, that the proper notice had not been given, and that the property was of far greater value than fifteen hundred dollars. The court denied the prayer of the petitioner. Held, (1) that notice to general creditors was not necessary; (2) that the proceedings being regular, and the court having found that proper notice by posting had been given, and that the value of the estate did not exceed fifteen hundred dollars, its judgment cannot be interfered with.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, refusing to vacate a decree setting apart certain property for the use and benefit of minor children.

Andres Briswalter, the appellant, was a judgment creditor of the deceased. The remaining facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

F. H. Howard, for Respondent.

MYRICK, J.—The deceased died intestate, leaving him surviving, a widow and four minor children. Letters of administration were regularly issued, and appraisers duly appointed. An inventory and an appraisement were duly made and returned on the 14th of February, 1882, with the affidavits required by the Code, from which it appeared that the estate of the deceased consisted of a piece of land of the value of $1,440. On the 17th of February, 1882, the administrator presented and filed a petition, stating the above facts, and that the widow had property of her own, and did not require any allowance, and asking that the whole of the property, after paying the expenses of the last illness, funeral charges, and expenses of administration, be assigned for the use and support of the minor children. The court by its order of February 17th, set the hearing of the petition for February 28, 1882, and directed notice to be given by posting in three public places. On the 28th of February the court made a decree assigning the whole of the property for the use and support of the minor children. This decree recites the facts above stated; also, that due notice of the hearing had been given as required by the previous order, that testimony was taken, and that the widow had consented that the property be set apart to the children. July 12, 1882, the appellant, Briswalter, filed a petition that the decree of February 28th be set aside, alleging that no publication of notice to creditors had been given; that the proceedings to have the property set apart were taken for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of deceased; that no notice was given of the proceedings beyond posting notices at the county clerk's office, at the county tax collector's office, and at the outer door of the court-room of the court, all of which places were in one building known as the court-house building; that the petitioner knew nothing of the proceedings until long after the order was made; and that the property was of far greater value than $1,500. On the hearing of this petition affidavits were read on the part of petitioner stating the value of the land to be far in excess of $1,500, and on the part of the respondents stating the value to be less than $1,500, and the court denied the prayer of the petition. From this order of denial the petitioner appealed.

For the decision of this appeal it is necessary only to say that no notice to general creditors was required to be given; and that the proceedings appear to have been regular. According to section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if, on the return of the inventory, it shall appear therefrom that the value of the whole estate does not exceed $1,500, if there be a widow or children, or both, notice is to be given by posting or otherwise, as the court or judge may direct; and if, on the hearing, the court finds the value not to exceed $1,500, it shall, by decree, assign for the use and support of the widow and children the whole of the estate, after the payment of the expenses of the last illness, funeral charges, and expenses of administration, and there must be no further proceedings in the administration unless further estate be discovered. In this case it does appear from the inventory that the value of the whole estate did not exceed $1,500, and on the hearing the court found that notice had been given as required (thereby determining, as it had the right to do, that the places of posting were three public places in the county), and after hearing evidence found that the value of the property did not exceed $1,500. Admitting that the court below could, if it had been imposed upon by a false inventory and appraisal, or by false testimony on the hearing, have set aside the decree of February 28th, we see no ground for doubting the correctness of the ruling in this case. The proceedings appear to have been regular and according to law. The statute has confided to the appraisers in the first instance, and to the court in the second instance, the duty of ascertaining and fixing the value; and the reasonable and proper exercise of their judgment cannot be interfered with.

Order affirmed.

WILLIAM TRENOUTH, APPELLANT, v. L. B. GILBERT
ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — TENANTS IN COMMON — TRUST — FINDINGS — EVIDENCE. — In an action between tenants in common of real estate to establish a trust in favor of the plaintiff as the equitable owner of an undivided interest, the legal title having been acquired by the defendants, and the Statute of Limitations being pleaded in bar of the action, the court found in substance that the cause of action accrued more than four years before the commencement of the action, and that there had been a continuous adverse possession by the defendants for more than five years prior thereto. Held, on a review of the evidence, that it was insufficient to support the finding as to the adverse possession of the defendants.

ED. — PURCHASE FROM TENANTS IN COMMON. — Certain findings, in relation to a purchase of the interests of some of the tenants in common by the defendants and their grantors while in possession holding adversely, examined by the court, and their effect determined with reference to the statute.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to establish a trust, and for other relief in connection therewith. The additional facts, so far as they bear upon the points decided, appear in the opinion of the court.

J. B. Townsend, and McClure & Duinelle, for Appellant.

John Reynolds, M. G. Cobb, C. N. Fox, and Arthur Rodgers, for Respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—Unless his cause of action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff is entitled to a part of the relief prayed in his complaint. By the deeds of Maria Louisa and Juan B. Buelna, plaintiff acquired whatever right or interest they had in the rancho San Gregorio, at the date of said deeds. They never had more than an undivided fifth interest in said rancho, and previously to their conveyance to the plaintiff they had conveyed all their interest in four thousand acres of said rancho to one Hamilton. So that the interest conveyed to the plaintiff is not more than an undivided one fifth of the residue of said rancho. In 1839 said rancho was granted by the Mexican government to Antonio Buelna, who in 1842 made a will by which he devised the entire rancho to his wife Maria Concepcion Valencia, Juan Bautista Buelna, and three others, share and share alike: that is, to each an undivided one fifth. In 1842 said Antonio died, leaving said will and all of said devisees surviving him. In 1846 said Juan Bautista died intestate leaving, him surviving, as his only heirs-at-law, the said Maria Louisa and Juan B. Buelna. After the death of her husband said Maria Concepcion made a conveyance of one league of said rancho to one Castro; and in 1852 said Castro and said Maria Concepcion presented a petition to the board of land commissioners to have the claim of said Castro to one league, and the claim of said Maria Concepcion to the other three leagues, confirmed, and their said respective claims were accordingly confirmed, and patented to them in 1861. That they held the legal title to an undivided interest in said rancho in trust for the said Maria Louisa and Juan B. Buelna is too clear to admit of any doubt.

The court found that "the defendants, and those from and under whom they hold and claim the possession, have been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the premises described in the complaint, holding separately, as stated in their several answers, claiming to own the same and to have the whole title thereto for more than five years next before the commencement of this action.

"The defendants, and those from and under whom they respectively hold and claim, more than five years before the commencement of this action, to wit, in the year 1857, being in possession respectively as aforesaid, acquired by purchase all the right, title, and interest of the patentees and all of the legatees under the said will of Antonio Buelna, except said Juan B. Buelna, to their respective portions of said land, and still hold and own the same.

"The plaintiff's cause of action arose and accrued to him more than four years before the commencement of this action; and the defendants and each of them had held all the land described in said complaint, claiming to own the title to the same, and in open and notorious hostility to the plaintiff's claim, and to any trust or equitable interest claimed by him for more than five years before the commencement of this action."

The evidence sustains the finding that the defendants and those under whom they claim were in possession of the premises in 1857, and that while so in possession "they acquired by purchase all the right, title, and interest of the patentees and of all the legatees under the will of Antonio Buelna, except said Juan B. Buelna, to their respective portions of said land, and still hold and own the same."

The court did not find that, prior to the purchase and acquisition of the interests of said patentees and devisees, the defendants, and those under whom they claim, had acquired title to said premises by an adverse possession of five years; and in the absence of such a finding, the finding that the defendants and those under whom they claim were in possession of the premises when they purchased the interests referred to is not of the slightest importance. It does not appear that they had acquired any title to the premises before the date of said purchase, and the defendants occupy no stronger position than they would if they had gone into possession under said purchase, and not otherwise. It would be different if, at the date of said purchase, they had been in the adverse possession of the entire rancho for five years or more. In that event they might have taken deeds from some of the tenants in common without affecting in any way the title acquired by an adverse possession of five years, as against other tenants.

As it is, they are bound to show that their possession since they purchased the interest of some of the tenants in common has been of such a character as to warrant a presumption of ouster of the other tenants, before they can successfully claim that they have acquired title as against the tenants, of whom they have not purchased, by an adverse possession of five years. "There must not only be an exclusive possession, but the possession must be under a claim to title to the whole estate either brought home to the knowledge of the other tenant, or so notorious that his knowledge of such adverse claim can be presumed. And the evidence must be much stronger than would be required to establish a title by possession by a stranger." (Wood on Limitation of Actions, 559.)

The only evidence tending to prove an adverse possession in this case is the testimony of one witness called by the defendants, who on his direct examination testified as follows:—

"I have been acquainted with the persons who have occupied the San Gregorio Ranch and with the extent of their occupation. The earliest period that I knew of its occupation was 1858; it was all occupied about 1858—as early as 1858. Prior to that it was not all occupied. Then, in 1858, it was occupied by parties living on it, fencing it up, and using it for farming and pasturing. The occupation has been continued ever since. I know all the defendants who have answered herein, personally, and the land described in their respective answers. This land has come down to them from those persons who were in occupation in 1858. That has been continuous. In 1858 they claimed to own the land occupied and possessed by them respectively. I know the tract occupied by defendant H. W. Seale. That tract was not within the four thousand-acre tract conveyed by Juan and Maria Louisa to Hugh Hamilton."

No other evidence was introduced to prove the character of the defendants' possession, and this evidence, considered in connection with the fact that the defendants were in possession under deeds conveying to them more than four fifths of the rancho, signally fails to establish an adverse possession of five years as against those who were tenants in common of the grantors of the defendants at the time of the execution of said deeds.

As was said in Owen v. Morton, 24 Cal. 373: "This testimony, taken together, falls short of establishing an adverse possession, and furnishes no evidence of an ouster of the plaintiff by the defendants."

The patentees and devisees who conveyed to the defendants did not attempt to convey any other or greater interest than they, said patentees and devisees, had in said rancho. They simply quit-claimed whatever interest they had, and nothing more.

Conceding, therefore, that the court found facts sufficient to establish such an adverse possession by the defendants as would bar the plaintiff's cause of action, it seems to us quite clear that the evidence is insufficient to support such a finding, and for that reason the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, RESPOND-ENT, v. Y. R. DE PELANCONI ET AL., APPELLANTS.

ACTION ON FORFEITED BAIL-BOND. — An action on a forfeited bail-bound may be brought in the name, either of the people or of the county; and the district attorney is authorized to bring the action.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

F. H. Howard, for Appellants.

The action must be brought in the name of the party interested. There is no provision of law authorizing the district attorney to bring such an action. (Code Civ. Proc. § 367; Mendocino Co. v. Lamar, 30 Cal. 628.)

Stephen M. White, District Attorney, for Respondent.

The suit was properly brought. Section 1570 of the Penal Code merely provides for the disposition of funds after collection. The bond runs to this plaintiff. (See § 369, Code Civ. Proc.)

As to the authority of district attorney, see § 4256, sub. 3, Pol. Code.

Actions such as this brought in the name of "The People of the State of California" have frequently passed unchallenged in this court, and the practice thus sanctioned should not be departed from. (See People v. Carpenter, 7 Cal. 402; People v. Smith, 18 Cal. 498; People v. Love, 19 Cal. 677; People v. Penniman, 37 Cal. 271.)

MYRIOK, J.— One Ramirez, being in custody under a bench warrant issued out of a Superior Court, upon an information for the crime of forgery, was ordered to be admitted to bail in the sum of $2,000, and the defendants in this action executed an undertaking in the form prescribed by section 1287, Penal Code. The bond becoming forfeited, this action was brought by the district attorney against the sureties.

The only point presented on this appeal is: The action should have been brought in the name of the county; the county is the only party in interest, as the money recovered must go into the county treasury; the action cannot be sustained in the name of the people, and the district attorney is not authorized to bring the action.

In several cases in this State, the action has been sustained when brought in the name of the people. (People v. Smith, 18 Cal. 498; People v. Love, 19 Cal. 677; People v. Penniman, 37 Cal. 271.) It has also been sustained when brought in the name of the county. (Mendocino County v. Lamar, 30 Cal. 628; City and County of San Francisco v. Randall, 54 Cal. 408.) We see no objection to sustaining the action when brought either in the name of the county or of the people. The section above referred to requires that the amount named shall be payable to the people of the State of California; when recovered, it is to take certain named directions.

The district attorney is authorized to proceed by action. (§ 1306, Pen. Code; § 4256, subd. 3, Pol. Code.)

J. W. ARMSTRONG, PETITIONER, v. THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LAKE COUNTY, RESPONDENT.

CHANGE OF VENUE—RESIDENCE—CONVEYANCE OF WITNESSES.—In an action commenced in Lake County, the defendant demurred to the complaint, and moved to change the place of trial to Sonoma County where he resided. The plaintiff opposed the motion on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. No answer having been filed, held, that the motion could not be resisted on that ground.

10. — ORDER GRANTING MOTION ON PAYMENT OF COSTS.—An order made granting the motion on the payment of costs is a conditional order, and amounts to a denial of the motion if the costs are not paid. It is interlocutory in its nature, and contemplates a further order granting or denying the motion absolutely upon the payment or non-payment of the costs as required. In determining the effect of the order in these respects, the power of the court to impose costs is an immaterial matter.

CERTIORARI to the Superior Court of Lake County to review

an order setting aside a previous order made on a motion to change the place of trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

E. W. Britt, and Woods Crawford, for Petitioner.

R. W. Crump, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—Certiorari. Petitioner prays for the annulment of an order of the Superior Court setting aside an order made in response to an application by defendant in an action, wherein one Estep is plaintiff and the petitioner is defendant, for a change of the place of trial from Lake to Sonoma County.

The motion was made on the ground that the action had been brought in the wrong county, and was supported by the defendant's affidavit that he was, and for many years had been, a resident of Sonoma. The plaintiff resisted the motion, asking that the cause be retained in Lake County, and filed and read an affidavit setting forth facts tending to prove that it would be for the convenience of witnesses to retain the cause. As the motion was made before answer the plaintiff was not authorized to resist it on the ground that it would be more convenient for witnesses to try the action in Lake. (Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72.)

January 29, 1883 — the return day of the motion — the court below ordered: "That the motion to change the place of trial be granted, upon the payment by defendant of all fees accrued in this court to date."

A demurrer to the complaint had been filed by the defendant contemporaneously with his demand for a change of venue, and, on the 12th day of February, 1883, the plaintiff asked the court to set down the demurrer for argument and proceed with the determination thereof, claiming that a reasonable time had elapsed since the making of the order respecting a change of the place of trial, and the defendant had not paid the costs as therein required.

Thereupon it was by the court ordered:—

"Whereas, in this cause, the court, on the 29th day of January, 1883, made an order, on the application of the defendant, that the same be transferred for further proceedings to the Superior Court of the county of Sonoma, upon payment by defendant of all costs accrued and to accrue in this court, and whereas at this date said defendant has not paid said costs, nor offered any excuse for his failure to do so; now, therefore, it is ordered by the court that the order made on the 29th day of January, 1883, be annulled and set aside." And it was then and there further ordered "that the demurrer aforesaid be set for hearing on the 29th day of February, 1883."

It is insisted by the petitioner that the condition in the order of January 29th, as to the payment of costs, was and is void, being a condition which the court had no right to require, and, as a consequence, that the order should be read as if no such condition had been inserted, and was and is an order granting the motion for a change of the place of trial; that the order granting the change necessarily included an adjudication as to the defendant's residence; that the power of the court was exhausted in the premises when it found that the defendant resided in Sonoma and granted the motion, and that, immediately upon the entry of the order, the Superior Court of Lake lost and the Superior Court of Sonoma acquired, jurisdiction of the action.

The intent and meaning of a judicial order are to be derived from its language. Even if the court had no power to insert in the order the condition as to costs, there is no strict analogy between the order and a deed — for example — which may take effect as a conveyance, although it contains a condition, void because against public policy, or for any other reason. An order that a motion be granted, upon the payment of certain costs, is an order denying the motion, unless the costs be paid. We are not authorized to exclude the condition and thus make the order the reverse of, or distinctly different from, what it was evidently intended to be. The order of the 29th of January is not an order absolute, either granting or denying the motion for the change of the place of trial. It provides that the motion shall be granted, if, within a reasonable time, the costs are paid by the defendant; that the motion shall be denied if a reasonable time shall lapse without the payment of the costs by the defendant. It is an order to take effect in the future as an order granting, or as an order denying, the motion, as one of two events shall occur. In determining its meaning it is entirely immaterial whether the court had or had not power to insert the condition, or whether the insertion of the condition was error. In any case the defendant did not get the order which he asked for unconditionally; he did not get it at all, nor did he entitle himself to an order final, based upon the payment of the costs — if such further order was necessary — because he did not pay the costs.

If, in response to the defendant's motion, the court had no jurisdiction to make an order other than an order unconditionally granting or denying the motion, petitioner is not entitled to have annulled the order setting aside the order of the 29th of January. The effect of the order of February 12th would be simply to disencumber the record of the Superior Court of an order it had no jurisdiction to make, and would leave the motion for a change of venue undisposed of. If the order of the 29th of January was one which the Superior Court had power to make, it was not and did not purport to be a final order, taking effect, in the then present, as an order granting or denying the motion, and we know of no reason why the court did not have power to set it aside. Certainly, as the defendant did not pay the costs within a reasonable time, or offer to pay them, he cannot complain of the order setting aside the order of January 29th — whether his failure to pay did or did not of itself operate as an order denying the motion for a change of the place of trial.

But we are of opinion that the order of the 29th of January was, in its nature, interlocutory, and contemplated — in case the defendant should fail to pay the costs — another and subsequent order, based upon a finding that a reasonable time had elapsed without the costs having been paid. We have assumed, as is claimed by petitioner, that the order of the 12th of February is to be treated as an independent order setting aside the previous order. It may be that the proceedings of the day last mentioned read together constitute only a declaration that a reasonable time had passed, and the defendant had not paid the costs, followed by an order setting down the demurrer for argument, the legal effect of which was finally to deny the motion for a change of the place of trial. Upon this last matter we express no opinion. If the order setting the demurrer for argument, following upon an adjudication that a reasonable time had expired without payment of costs by defendant, was an order denying the defendant's motion for a change of venue, the defendant—petitioner—had an appeal from that order.

But treating the action of the court on the 12th of February, which preceded the setting down of the demurrer, as an independent order setting aside the order of the 29th of January, the petitioner cannot have the order of the 12th of February annulled, because up to the last named date, no final order had been made, granting the motion for a change of the place of trial.

It is not necessary to decide whether the Superior Court would have power to set aside a final order changing the place of trial.

The petition and proceedings thereunder are dismissed.

MAGEE, DECEASED, ALBERT E. REMOND, APPELLANT, & PETER CUNNINGHAM ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

SUCCESSION — ILLEGITIMACY — SECTIONS 1886, 1887, AND 1888 OF THE CIVIL CODE CONSTRUED. — Sabra Magee had two legitimate daughters — Eliza and Susan. The descendants of Eliza were all legitimate, but Susan had two illegitimate daughters — Elisabeth and Sues. Elisabeth died after her mother, leaving one legitimate child — Albert. Sues died subsequently intestate and without issue. The descendants of Eliza claim to succeed to the estate of Sues as against Albert. Held, on a construction of sections 1886, 1887, and 1888 of the Civil Code, that Albert is entitled to succeed to the estate as heir of Susan, the mother of Elisabeth and Sues.

MYRICK, J.—The question involved in this appeal concerns the right of succession under the statute of this State, as affected by illegitimacy. Sabra Magee was the common ancestor. She had two legitimate daughters—Eliza and Susan. The descendants of Eliza (all legitimate) are the claimants on one side; they are named Cunningham. Albert E. Remond claims that he, as descendant of Susan, is entitled, on the other side, to the property. His claim is based on the following facts: Susan had two illegitimate daughters—Elizabeth and Suez. Albert E. is the legitimate son of Elizabeth. Susan and Elizabeth died before January 1, 1880. Suez Magee (the intestate, whose property is the subject of consideration) died March 24, 1880; and the question is, will the property left by Suez Magee go to the Cunninghams, as heirs of the intestate, or will it go to the claimant Albert E. Remond?

According to section 1388, Civil Code, if any illegitimate child (not acknowledged or adopted by his father) dies intestate, without lawful issue, his estate goes to his mother, or, in case of her decease, to her heirs at law. Suez Magee was illegitimate; she died intestate; Susan, her mother, had died before her; therefore, upon the death of Suez, the property of the latter was to go to the heirs of the mother, Susan. The next question, then, is who are the heirs of Susan? Section 1387, Civil Code, we think, answers the inquiry. Every illegitimate child is in all cases an heir of his mother, and inherits in the same manner as if born in lawful wedlock. There is no question as to the heirship of Albert E.; he is the legitimate son of his mother, Elizabeth. She (Elizabeth) was the illegitimate daughter of Susan. By section 1387, just referred to, Elizabeth was the heir of her mother, in the same manner as if born in lawful wedlock. If, then, Elizabeth had been born in lawful wedlock, she would unquestionably have been heir of her mother; being born out of wedlock, she is by the statute made heir of her mother in the same manner as if born in wedlock. Being, then, the heir of her mother, and dying leaving issue, the property of Suez goes to such issue; not because the issue is heir of Suez, but is heir of Susan. In this same section there is a proviso regarding the inheritable blood of an illegitimate child, expressed in the following words: "But he does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, either lineal or collateral, unless, before his death, his parents shall have intermarried," etc. This proviso does not apply to the case before us. If Eliza, the other daughter of Sabra, the common ancestor, had died leaving estate, the illegitimate children of Susan (Elizabeth or Suez), or their descendants, could not have represented Susan for the purpose of inheriting from Eliza; Eliza's estate would, rather, have escheated. We think the word "kindred" used in the above-quoted clause relates to the kindred referred to in section 1386, meaning lawful kindred, and is for the purpose of qualifying the general words used in section 1387, and excluding the illegitimate from inheriting, through the mother, the estate of other relatives.

"By the rules of the common law, terms of kindred, when used in a statute, include only those who are legitimate, unless a different intention is clearly manifest." (McCool v. Smith, 1 Black, 459; Hughes v. Decker, 38 Me. 153; Cooley v. Dewey, 4 Pick. 93.) In using the word "kindred," in section 1387, the legislature intended to preclude from the general words preceding it the construction that an illegitimate might by representation inherit from those whom the common law or section 1386 acknowledges as kindred; but did not intend to prevent a legitimate son (Albert E.) from inheriting through his mother (an illegitimate daughter), from her mother, Susan, nor from being her heir. Otherwise, we would have the construction that an illegitimate daughter is an heir of her mother, and as such may take the estate of another illegitimate daughter of the same mother, but that the legitimate child of such illegitimate daughter cannot take.

If Elizabeth had died intestate and without issue, doubtless the estate of Suez would have gone to the Cunninghams, as the heirs of Susan, the mother of Elizabeth and Suez; but as Albert E. is, through his mother, Elizabeth, the heir of Susan, he is entitled to the estate of Suez — not, perhaps, because he is the heir of Suez, but because he is the heir of the mother of Suez, and as such is, under the statute, entitled to take.

We do not think that the provisions of section 1386 have application to illegitimates; but that the rights of such persons are derived from sections 1387 and 1388. Section 1386 provides for the course of succession among legitimates; sections 1387 and 1388 refer to illegitimates, and provide for the course of succession as to them; and each provision is complete, so far as the legislature has seen fit to declare. One system is provided for in the one section; another system is provided for in the others.

The decree is reversed and the cause is remanded with instructions to render a decree in accordance with this opinion.

DOHRMANN ET AL., APPELLANTS.

NEW TRIAL — AUTHENTICATION OF STATEMENT.— A statement on motion for a new trial must be certified by the judge in accordance with section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Without the certificate of the judge, the statement is a nullity, and the omission cannot be supplied after the motion has been disposed of, and an appeal taken.

HEARING IN BANK — COMPUTATION OF TIME.— When a cause has been heard and decided by one of the departments, a hearing in Bank cannot be granted after the expiration of thirty days, although the last day may fall on Sunday.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The statement on the motion for a new trial was agreed to by the counsel for the respective parties, and used on the hearing of the motion, but was not certified by the judge. Pending the appeal, the judge certified the statement nunc pro tunc as of a day anterior to the hearing of the motion, and by order of the court below the statement was refiled nunc pro tunc as of the same day. The counsel for the appellants thereupon moved to amend the transcript in this court by adding thereto a copy of the statement thus certified.

John M. Burnett, and Cope & Boyd, for Appellants, argued in favor of the motion, citing Westcott v. Thompson, 16 N. Y. 613. They also contended that as the statement was agreed to by the parties, and used on the hearing of the motion, the objection for want of a certificate by the judge came too late, and cited Paige v. Fazackerly, 36 Barb. 392.

E. S. Pillsbury, for Respondents, argued against the motion, and claimed that the statement should be disregarded, citing Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 521; Smith v. Davis, 55 Cal. 26; Schreiber v. Whitney, 60 Cal. 431; Code Civ. Proc. § 659, sub. 3.

McKEE, J.—The appeal in hand is from the final judgment in this case, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The notice of intention to move for a new trial designated that the motion would be made “on a statement of the case, and on the papers and records in the cause.”

In the transcript there is a paper marked, “defendant’s proposed statement on motion for a new trial and on appeal,” which appears to have been filed April 10, 1880; but it was not, at any time, signed by the judge of the court, nor certified by him to the effect that it had been settled and allowed as was required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

When notice is given of a motion for a new trial, to be made on a statement of the case, it is the duty of the moving party to propose such a statement, and have it settled, signed, and certified by the judge. The statement must be authenticated in that way before it can be filed with the clerk of the court. (§ 659, supra.) After it has been signed and certified and filed, the motion upon it may then be brought to a hearing by either party; and as the statement used on the hearing, it constitutes part of the record of the case on appeal from the order granting or denying the motion. But the signature and certificate of the judge are indispensable. (Schreiber v. Whitney, 60 Cal. 431; Keller v. Lewis, 56 Cal. 466.) Without them there is no statutory statement on which the motion may be heard.

An unauthenticated paper in the transcript, purporting to be a statement, is no part of the record on appeal, and must be disregarded. Nor can this court return the record of a case to the court below for the purpose of having that court supply, in a document in the transcript, those things which were indispensably necessary to constitute it part of the record in the first instance. The signature and certificate of the judge to a statement on motion for a new trial, after the motion has been heard and determined, and an appeal taken from the order, would not (as MR. JUSTICE MYRICK observed in Keller v. Lewis, supra) aid the appellant, for the Code of Civil Procedure requires that the bill be certified as allowed, "before filing." (§ 650, Code Civ. Proc.) This court cannot make a record or supply the existence of papers which constitute part of a record, on which a court below may act. Nor can we amend a record of a lower court—that must be done in the lower court; and after an appeal has been taken and perfected, that court, losing, as it does, jurisdiction over the case, has no power to make another record by adding to the record already made a new statement on motion for a new trial or on appeal.

In some instances we have sent down the record of a cause to have inserted in it some matter omitted from a bill of exceptions or statement in the transcript; but there is no case in which the practice has been adopted of returning the record of a case for the purpose of supplying a bill of exceptions or statement which did not legally exist.

The motion made to return the record in this case for that purpose must therefore be denied; and as there is no error in the judgment roll, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

McKINSTRY, J., and ROSS, J., concurred.

The counsel for the appellants subsequently filed a petition asking that the judgment of the department be vacated, and that the cause be heard and decided by the court in Bank. On the thirty-first day after the judgment was pronounced—the day previous being Sunday—an order was made granting the petition. The counsel for the respondents thereupon moved the court in Bank to vacate the order, and for a remittitur, on the ground that the judgment had become final before the order was made. The motion was argued orally by the respective counsel.

PER CURIAM.— On the 15th day of December, 1882, Department One of this court affirmed the judgment appealed from herein, and on the 15th day of January, 1883, the court made an order that the case be heard in Bank. The Constitution (§ 2, art. vi.) provides that “where a cause has been allotted to one of the departments (as this cause was), and a judgment pronounced thereon, the order (that the same be heard and decided in Bank) must be made within thirty days after such judgment, . . . and if so made it shall have the effect to vacate and set aside the judgment. . . . If the order be not made within the time above limited the judgment shall be final.” The respondent now moves to have the order of January 15, 1883, vacated, on the ground that it was not made within thirty days after the judgment of the department had been pronounced. As to the fact that the order was not made within the time prescribed, there can be no controversy. But the thirtieth day after the judgment of the department was pronounced fell on Sunday, and the order was made on the following Monday. There is a general provision in the Code that the time in which any act provided by law is to be done is computed by excluding the last day if it be a holiday. (Code Civ. Proc. § 12.) And as Sunday is a holiday, it is contended by appellants’ counsel that the last day upon which an order that this case should be heard in Bank could be made being Sunday it must be excluded; and if excluded, the order made on the following day was made within thirty days after the judgment had been pronounced in the department. Whether, in the absence of other provisions of the Code, and the Constitution relating to this same subject, that would be so, it is not now necessary to decide, because the Constitution declares that this court “shall always be open for the transaction of business,” and the legislature when prescribing on what days courts may be held and judicial business transacted, provides “that the Supreme Court shall always be open for the transaction of business,” and that provision is inserted among the exceptions to the general rule, that no court shall be open or transact any judicial business on Sunday. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 133, 134.) It is therefore quite clear that this court might have been open for the transaction of business on the last of the thirty days within which an order that this case be heard in Bank could be made, and there is no legal reason why it should not have acted on that day, and consequently no reason why the judgment of the department should not have become final at the expiration of that day. The court is not required to take any formal action in regard to a judgment pronounced by a department within thirty days thereafter. The Constitution simply limits the time within which an order that it be heard in Bank may be made. The court may act or not as it chooses within that time, but it cannot, after the expiration of that time, order a cause to be heard in Bank. That the framers of the Constitution did not intend that the law relating to holidays should apply to the Supreme Court is made apparent by a comparison of the clause of the Constitution, which declares that the Supreme Court "shall always be open for the transaction of business," with the provision that the Superior Courts "shall be always open (legal holidays and non-judicial days excepted)." The provision (§ 12, Code Civ. Proc.) of the Code upon which appellant relies does not attempt to define what days shall be non-judicial. But that is done in section 133, and as before stated, the Supreme Court is expressly excepted from its operation.

THE PEOPLE, RESPONDENT, v. SIMON RATEN, APPELLANT.

HOMICIDE — BURDEN OF PROOF — REASONABLE DOUBT. — When the fact of a homicide is shown, then it is incumbent upon the defendant to show by a preponderance of testimony that the killing was justifiable.

IN. — INSTRUCTIONS — DEGREES OF MURDER. — A charge upon the subject of the degrees of murder discussed and held not misleading.

- ID. — ARREST OF FELON BY PRIVATE CITIZEN. — The court charged, in addition to section 837 of the Penal Code, that "the crime of assault with intent to commit murder is a felony. It is the right, and is expected of all good citizens that they aid in the capture or arrest of any person who has committed a felony." The evidence tended to show that the defendant shot at one Erickson, and fled pursued by a crowd of men with a view to capture him. The deceased was one of the crowd, and while in pursuit defendant turned and shot and killed him. Held, that the evidence justified the instruction.
- ID. — SELF-DEFENSE. — Upon the authority of People v. Herbert, 61 Cal. 544, one instruction given in regard to the right of self-defense, held, not erroneous.
- ID. — MALICE. — The defendant claimed that the verdict was against both law and evidence; that to constitute murder of the first degree express malice must be proved alwude — not inferred alone from the act done, or the means used in doing it. Held, that as the question of malice was submitted to the jury under proper directions, the judgment could not be interfered with.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Ellwood Bruner, for Appellant.

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

THORNTON, J.—The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, committed on one James Lansing, and adjudged to suffer the death penalty. He moved for a new trial which was denied. From the order denying his motion for a new trial, and the judgment, he prosecutes this appeal.

Several questions were discussed on the argument arising on the instructions given by the court below, which we are called on to consider and determine.

1. The court directed the jury as follows:—

"Upon a trial for murder the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable, and this he may show by preponderance of evidence merely."

It is urged that this direction is erroneous, because it deprives the defendant of the doctrine of reasonable doubt. We have to say in reply to this that the jury was fully and correctly instructed upon the question of reasonable doubt, and that the instruction above given was approved by this court in Bank in People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387.

2. Our attention is called to the following direction to the jury:—

“If the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer, the killing is murder of the first degree, and no matter how rapidly these acts of the mind may succeed each other, or how quickly they may be followed by the act of killing. But if you find the defendant guilty of murder, and still are not convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that such murder was accomplished or characterized by some one of the circumstances just explained as indicative of murder of the first degree, you can find him guilty of murder of the second degree only.”

Counsel for defendant in regard to this portion of the charge says: “While the jury were instructed as to the requisites of murder of the first degree in the first clause of the above instruction, they were in the second clause instructed, that to reduce the offense to murder of the second degree, two or more of the requisites of murder of the first degree must be wanting”; and then proceeds to argue that the instructions are contradictory, and that they misled the jury to the prejudice of the defendant.

There is some plausibility in the contention of the counsel upon the premises on which he has constructed his argument. But in presenting this question he has omitted from the direction of the court a material portion of it in relation to the very subject-matter of his contention. We quote here the omitted portion, which precedes immediately the portion quoted by him:—

“The chief difference which distinguishes murder of the first degree from murder of the second degree consists in the presence or absence of a wilful, deliberate, and premeditated intent to kill. If you find the defendant guilty of murder the next question to be determined is, was the murder accompanied with a deliberate and clear intent to take life? In order to constitute murder of the first degree the intent to kill must be the result of deliberate premeditation. It must be formed upon a pre-existing reflection, and not upon a sudden heat of passion sufficient to preclude the idea of deliberation. There need be no appreciable space of time between the intention to kill and the act of killing; there may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind."

The court had previously in the charge defined murder in the language of the Code (Penal Code, § 187), and had pointed out the distinction between express and implied malice as given in section 168 of the same Code.

The foregoing explains the language referred to by counsel, and is in accordance with the provisions of the Penal Code (§ 189), indicating the difference between murder of the first and murder of the second degree. Certainly, the only fair mode of arriving at the meaning of a judge's charge on any subject to which it relates, is to consider the whole of it relating to the particular subject on which he is giving directions. This we have done in regard to the charge before us, and, applying this well-known rule of interpretation, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the counsel has gone astray in his contention, and the court has not erred. We see nothing in the charge on the matter discussed at all calculated to mislead or confuse the jury.

3. It is further contended that the court erred in giving the instructions relating to arrest by a private person. As to this matter, the court instructed the jury in the identical words of section 837 of the Penal Code, and added the following: "The crime of assault with intent to commit murder is a felony. It is right and is expected of all good citizens that they aid in the capture or arrest of any person who has committed a felony."

In relation to the above, this point is made, that the court assumed the existence of testimony, and of facts of which there was no proof whatever.

The evidence abundantly justifies the directions, and called for the observations made by the court. The evidence tends to show this: The defendant met, in the street in the city of Sacramento, one Erickson, drew a pistol and shot at him; he then fled, was pursued by a crowd of men with a view to capture him. While the pursuit was going on, the deceased, one James Lansing, joined in it, and, while thus in pursuit of the defendant, defendant turned and shot at Lansing, inflicting a fatal wound, of which, in a few hours afterwards, Lansing died.

Under such circumstances the point contended for by counsel is untenable. We fail to perceive any error in the ruling of the court on this point.

4. The defendant asked an instruction as follows:—

“If a timid, cowardly man, much alarmed, in imminent danger of a violent and instant assault, and cut off from the chances of probable assistance, as the result of fear, kill the man from whom the danger is apprehended, and the jury believe that the defendant was in danger of great bodily harm from the deceased, or thought himself so, then the killing would be in self-defense. And if the defendant thought the deceased intended to commit a battery upon him less violent, to prevent which he killed him, the killing would be manslaughter, and you must so find your verdict.”

The court refused this request, and defendant excepted.

The requested instruction abounds in error. In the first place there is no evidence that the defendant is or was a timid, cowardly man, nor is there any circumstance from which such could be reasonably inferred. Nor do we perceive that there was the least evidence that defendant was in imminent danger of a violent or instant assault by the deceased. There is no evidence whatever that defendant was in the least danger of great bodily harm from Lansing, and nothing tending to show it. Lansing was pursuing the defendant with other persons to arrest him on account of his having shot at Erickson, was unarmed, and while so pursuing him and unarmed received at the hand of the defendant the fatal wound of which he afterward died. There are other considerations which demonstrate that the request was properly refused, but deeming the foregoing sufficient, we forbear to discuss the point further.

5. It is said that the court erred in its direction to the jury in regard to the right of self-defense.

The direction challenged here is substantially the same as that given in People v. Herbert, and approved by this court in Bank, 61 Cal. 544. On the authority of the case last mentioned we must hold the direction without error.

It is further argued that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is said that to constitute murder of the first degree express malice must be proved; that it must be proved aliunde, and that it cannot be inferred or implied alone from the act done, or the means used in doing it. To this we have only to say that the questions as to malice were fairly submitted to the jury, the proper tribunal to pass on them, and that they were submitted with appropriate directions.

We find nothing in the case which calls for any other judgment than that of affirmance.

Judgment and order affirmed.

ELIZABETH THOMAS, APPELLANT, v. THOMAS
DESMOND, SHERIFF, ETC., RESPONDENT.

MARRIED WOMAN — CAPACITY TO SUE. — A married woman cannot sue alone to recover personal property wrongfully taken from her possession, unless the property thus taken is shown to be her separate property.

ID. — SOLE TRADER — SEPARATE PROPERTY OF THE HUSBAND — CREDITORS. — Separate property of the husband, though appropriated and used by the wife in carrying on business as a sole trader, is liable for his debts, and may be seized under process against him in favor of his creditors.

PLEADINGS — COMPLAINT — DEMURRER. — In alleging facts, the ultimate facts should be stated, and where a complaint merely states the evidence from which such facts are deducible, a demurrer lies.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order setting aside a default.

Charles F. Hanlon, for Appellant.

Clitus Barbour, for Respondent.

McKee, J. — Upon a showing made by the defendant, the default entered against him was set aside by the court, with leave to answer. Instead of filing an answer, the defendant demurred and the court sustained the demurrer, with leave to the plaintiff to amend her complaint; but she declined to amend and judgment final was entered against her, and from the judgment and the order setting aside the default the plaintiff appealed.

The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged wrongful seizure of personal property. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff was a married woman and the wife of William A. Thomas; and it may be gathered from the complaint that she had possession of the property, and that the defendant, as the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, took it from her possession by process issued in the suit of Amos Williams against William A. Thomas, her husband, and converted it to his own use. But that statement does not constitute a cause of action in her favor. It is only where property taken from a married woman belongs to her as her separate property that she is considered in law as a femme sole and entitled to sue for its recovery or conversion. And in such a suit, the pleading in the action should disclose the fact that the property was her separate property. That is a fact which must be averred and proved. The complaint does not show, by distinct affirmative averments, that the title to the property was in the plaintiff as her separate property, or that she was possessed of it as of her separate property as a sole trader or otherwise. On the contrary, the complaint does show, by recitals of evidential facts, that the property was the separate property of the husband, but, having become intemperate and dissolute, he had spent all his money and run in debt, and failed to support his wife, and she in consequence of the intemperate and dissolute habits of her husband, acting under the advice of counsel, asserted her claim over all his property, took possession of it and invested it in the business of letting furnished rooms, with or without board, in the city of San Francisco — a business which she was authorized to carry on as a sole trader by a decree of the Superior Court of said city and county rendered December 21, 1880.

These recitals are insufficient as a statement of her right to the property. They are not a statement of the material and ultimate facts — facts as distinguished from argument, from hypothesis, and from evidence — which is required by the Code. (§ 426, Code Civ. Proc., Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 410; Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 27; Grewell v. Walden, 23 Cal. 165; Moore v. Murdock, 26 Cal. 514; Miles v. McDermott, 31 Cal. 271.) The complaint was, therefore, demurrable.

Besides, as the fact appears from the recitals that the property

Belonged to the husband as his separate property, it was subject to his debts, unless his title to it had passed from him to his wife, to the exclusion of his creditors. Of course, the interest of the husband was not divested by the advice of counsel to his wife; nor did she acquire any separate right to it merely by that advice; nor did she acquire title to it by the decree of the Superior Court which authorized her to carry on a specific business in her own name and for her own account.

The statute under which that decree was rendered provided that property derived from the community property or the separate property of the husband not exceeding in value five hundred dollars might be invested in a business carried on by the wife as a sole trader. (§ 1814, Code Civ. Proc.) The statute did not prevent her from obtaining and using the husband's property in the business. But she could only derive title to such property by the mutual consent of herself and husband, and by an act of transfer by the husband to her in the mode prescribed by law. From the recitals of the complaint there was no consent and no transfer; there was, therefore, no divestiture of the legal estate of the husband; the property belonged to him and was subject to attachment or execution against him.

Moreover, the pleader admits that, at the time when the wife took possession of the property and invested it in business on her own account, the husband was in debt. As a debtor he could not voluntarily surrender property to his wife, nor could she voluntarily assume the possession and ownership of it, to the prejudice of his creditors. Such transactions are considered in law fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the husband. (Guttmann v. Scannell, 7 Cal. 455; Hurlburt v. Jones, 25 Cal. 225.)

WILLIAM MCINTYRE, APPELLANT, v. CHARLES TRAUTNER, RESPONDENT.

Mechanic's Lien — Notice — Time of Filing — Nonsuit. — The court below granted a nonsuit on the ground that the notice was not filed in time, and because of a variance between the pleadings and proof. Held, on a review of the facts as alleged and proved, that the nonsuit was improperly granted.

Id. — Sufficiency of Notice. — Certain objections to the sufficiency of the notice examined and overruled.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco refusing a new trial.

Wm. H. H. Hart, for Appellant.

Oscar T. Shuck, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—The appeal is from an order of the Superior Court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to enforce an alleged lien for work done by plaintiff as a plumber, and materials by him furnished and used in a building of defendant. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for nonsuit, or that the action be dismissed, upon the grounds following: "That said lien had not been filed in the time required by law, and that plaintiff's proof directly controverted his allegations in his complaint and in his notice of lien in this: that said complaint and notice of lien set forth and allege that plaintiff was a sub-contractor for the work for which he demands payment in this action, whereas his evidence given on this trial clearly states that he was the sole and original contractor; that as the plaintiff seeks to foreclose a sub-contractor's lien, and as his testimony shows he was an original contractor, there is a fatal variance between the pleadings and his proof." The court below granted defendant's motion, to which ruling plaintiff, appellant here, duly excepted.

1. As appears by plaintiff's testimony — which must be conceded to be true in determining the propriety of the nonsuit — defendant, about the middle of February, objected that "the job was not satisfactory, and that he would not accept," etc. — that "the pipes leaked," and requested plaintiff "to go and put them into proper shape." The leaking was stopped and the work perfected April 25, 1878. The lien was filed May 24, 1878. Defendant cannot be heard to say that the additional work, done at his request to complete the contract, was not a continuation of the previous work, and done under the same contract. The notice of lien was filed in time.

2. The complaint does not set forth that plaintiff was a subcontractor. On the contrary, it sets forth an original contract between plaintiff and defendant. The oral testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to prove an original contract accords with the averments of the complaint.

3. Did the notice of lien filed by plaintiff fail to state any of the material matters required by the Code to be stated in a notice of lien filed by one claiming as an original contractor?

Section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:—

“Every original contractor, within sixty days after the completion of his contract, and every person, saving the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, must within thirty days after the completion of any building, improvement, or structure, or after the completion of the alteration or repair thereof, or the performance of any labor in a mining claim, file for record with the county recorder of the county in which such property, or some part thereof, is situated, a claim containing a statement of his demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials, with a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, and also a description of the property to be charged with the lien, sufficient for identification, which claim must be verified by the oath of himself, or of some other person.”

The notice of claim filed by plaintiff contained a “statement of his demand after deducting all just credits and offsets.” Also the “name of the owner.” Also the name of the person by whom he was employed “and to whom he furnished the materials, with a statement of the terms,” etc., and a description of the property to be charged with the lien.

It contains a statement that defendant agreed to pay the amount to be paid for the work and materials, and that one George Scheibel was the name of the contractor who, “as such contractor and as agent for and on behalf of said Trautner (defendant), entered into a contract with said McIntyre (plaintiff), under and by which" the work was done and materials furnished.

As a matter of strict pleading, a contract made by an agent should, perhaps, be alleged to have been made by the principal. But no such recognition of the maxim, "that which is done by another he himself does," is requisite to the validity of a notice under the mechanics' lien law. As contractor Scheibel had authority to enter into a sub-contract, by virtue of which the sub-contractor might acquire a lien, and as an agent empowered to do so, he was authorized to enter into an original contract for and on behalf of Trautner. Scheibel swore as a witness that defendant requested him to employ plaintiff to do the work for which the latter now claims the lien. Such work and materials constituted no portion of the work and materials to be done and furnished by Scheibel by the terms of his original contract with defendant.

The notice of lien is not vitiated by the words "as a contractor." Those words are surplusage, and do not detract from the effect of the statement that Scheibel, in employing plaintiff, acted as agent for the defendant.

The nonsuit should have been denied.

Order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

MARY JANE MACDOUGALL, APPELLANT, v. CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, RESPONDENT.

NEGLIGENCE — PERSONAL INJURY — INSTRUCTION. — In an action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been received through the negligence of the defendant, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a matter of defense, and it is error to instruct the jury that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the injury occurred without such negligence.

APPEAL — ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION. — An erroneous instruction cannot be disregarded on appeal, unless it appear that no prejudice could have resulted from it.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

At the time of the alleged injury, the plaintiff was a passenger on a railroad owned and operated by the defendant in the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiff was examined as a witness, and testified that she stopped the car in which she was riding for the purpose of getting off, and that while she was in the act of alighting, the car started, and she was thrown to the ground and injured. She also testified that some delay occurred by a woman getting off in front of her at the same time.

Crittenden & Moses, for Appellant.

Gunnison & Booth, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—The case was submitted to the jury, on the part of the plaintiff, upon the plaintiff's testimony and that of a medical gentlemen, who described the injuries she had sustained. The verdict was for the defendant, and, as there was at least a substantial conflict in the evidence introduced by plaintiff and defendant respectively, we cannot say the verdict was not justified by the evidence.

The first two of the points urged by the appellant are:—

1. "The court erred in instructing the jury that the burden of proof of establishing her case is on the plaintiff, and she must show, 'that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant without any contributory negligence upon her part.'"

2. "The court erred in instructing the jury 'that plaintiff, if negligent, could not by her own negligence cast upon the person in charge of defendant's car the necessity of exercising extraordinary care and skill.'"

With respect to these instructions, we may remark, first, the burden of proof was on the defendant to show plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, unless plaintiff had already shown such negligence; and, second, if plaintiff was guilty of no negligence, still defendant was bound to exercise a great degree of care and skill. (Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co. 48 Cal. 426; Nehrbas v. C. P. R. R. Co. 62 Cal. 320.)

The portions of the charge above recited were specifically objected to by plaintiff's counsel as follows: "Another [ground of objection] is that the instruction as to casting upon the driver extraordinary care or vigilance by reason of negligence, if the jury should suppose any such thing on the part of the plaintiff, is likely to mislead the jury in regard to the question of the degree of extraordinary care and diligence required on the part of the defendant in conveying and letting the plaintiff off the car. Another is that the instruction as to the burden of proof being upon the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is required to show that the injury complained of resulted from the negligence of the defendant, without any contributory negligence on her part, is not law, and is ambiguous and calculated to mislead the jury."

The court had charged the jury: "The law imposes upon the defendant the duty of exerting and using the utmost care, foresight, diligence, and skill in the selection and employment of a driver for its car, and in the management, driving, and stopping of said car, and in the taking in and letting out of said car of passengers for hire." And had also read to the jury from section 2100 of the Civil Code: "A carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, and must provide everything necessary for that purpose, and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill."

We would hesitate to order a new trial if the only error complained of were the charge, "plaintiff if negligent could not by her own negligence cast upon the person in charge of defendant's car the necessity of exercising extraordinary care and skill." It is true, it would be difficult to distinguish between "extraordinary" and "utmost" care and skill. It is also true the language employed suggests that if a plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence he cannot recover if a defendant has used a degree of care and skill somewhat less than extraordinary or utmost. But if plaintiff was guilty of negligence, directly contributing to the injury—amounting to want of ordinary care—she ought not to recover. The language of the court, therefore, while it gave a wrong reason for the rule, might perhaps be construed as a statement, that, if guilty of contributory negligence, the jury should find against her. We might perhaps say, in view of the other charges, to the effect that defendant was responsible for any want of the utmost care, that the charge complained of could not have misled the jury.

But, however this may be, the charge, "the burden of proof of establishing her case is on the plaintiff, and she must show that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant, without any contributory negligence on her part," was clearly erroneous. (Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., Nehrbas v. C. P. R. R. Co., supra.) Of course, the circumstances, as related by the plaintiff's witnesses, will often satisfy the court or jury that plaintiff has been guilty of such contributory negligence as will prohibit a recovery. But whether the evidence on the part of a plaintiff establishes contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury, unless it is so clearly established as to justify the court in granting a nonsuit.

In the case before us, it might be argued upon the evidence, that, if the plaintiff—as the only witness—was to be believed, she clearly proved she was guilty of no contributory negligence, and therefore the charge that the burden of proof was upon her to establish the negative, could have done her no harm. But to assume that the case, as made by plaintiff, established she was guilty of no negligence, would be to take the fact in that regard, and so far as her evidence was concerned, from the jury; and would have justified a charge, that, if the jury believed her testimony, they should find her guiltless of contributory negligence. The defendant might well complain of such a charge and insist that her own testimony, bearing upon the question whether she was guilty of the degree of negligence which should prevent a recovery, ought to go to the jury, to be weighed and canvassed by them. An extremely cautious person might have retained her seat, or remained entirely within the car, until the woman who, as she testifies, preceded her, had reached the pavement. Although, if called upon to decide the fact, we might be of opinion that, by doing what she says she did, she was guilty of no negligence, we cannot say that the jury would have found that she proved herself guiltless of negligence. The jury might have found that her evidence showed negligence on the part of defendant, but failed affirmatively to establish an absence of fault on her own part.

It must be admitted that the charge was erroneous, and we cannot declare, as matter of law, that it could not have misled the jury.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

FRANK CURTIS, PETITIONER, v. THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, AND F. W. LAWLOR, JUDGE, RESPONDENTS.

PROHIBITION — APPEAL FROM JUSTICES' COURT. — NEW TRIAL IN SUPERIOR COURT — JURISDICTION. — In an action in the Justices' Court of the city and county of San Francisco, wherein one Wilhelm was plaintiff, and the petitioner herein defendant, a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The defendant had answered denying all the allegations of the complaint, but failed to appear at the trial, whereupon the court gave judgment without the introduction of any evidence. The defendant appealed on questions of law alone, and the Superior Court reversed the judgment, and ordered a new trial in that court. The petitioner asked that the Superior Court and judge thereof be restrained by prohibition from trying the case. Held, that the new trial was properly ordered to take place in the Superior Court, and that the writ be denied.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition.

Carroll Cook, for Petitioner.

William Reade, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—A judgment was rendered in the Justices' Court in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant in an action, wherein one A. Wilhelm was plaintiff, and this petitioner defendant, from which the defendant appealed "on questions of law." The judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered in the Superior Court. Petitioner prays the Superior Court, and judge thereof may be restrained by prohibition from trying the case.

The demand of petitioner herein is not sustained by Rickey v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 661; nor by Sanborn v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 425. In the first of the cases it was said that on an appeal by defendant from a judgment taken against him by default in the Justices' Court, the Superior Court acquired no jurisdiction to allow the defendant to file an answer and to retry the case. Rickey v. Superior Court is not like the case now before us. The return shows that in Wilhelm v. Curtis (the petitioner), the defendant answered in the Justices' Court, and the statement provided for in section 975 of the Code of Civil Procedure was filed the appeal being "on questions of law alone."

In the action considered in Sanborn v. Superior Court, the appeal from the Justices' Court was by the petitioner for the writ of prohibition. It was said by this court that the party thus invoking by his own act the jurisdiction of the Superior Court, ought not to receive the benefit of the writ to which he was entitled only on the theory that the Superior Court had no jurisdiction to proceed.

In the case brought before us in S. P. R. B. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 471, the justice had not acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, but, nevertheless, without any general appearance on the part of the defendant the justice rendered a judgment against the plaintiff, from which the plaintiff appealed. It was held the Superior Court had no power on such appeal to order the defendant to file an answer, etc., because by plaintiff's appeal the Superior Court only acquired jurisdiction to affirm or reverse the justice's judgment.

In the case we are now considering, an issue of fact was joined in the Justices' Court. If the statement prepared by the defendant therein showed that the justice erred in giving judgment for the plaintiff, without sufficient or any evidence, this was error for which the Superior Court was justified in reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial. When the defendant fails to appear at the trial the justice "may proceed" with the trial at the request of the plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 884); but the justice ought not without evidence to render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, if the answer denies the averments of the complaint. Such a judgment is erroneous. It may have been based upon an erroneous notion that, by failing to appear at the trial the defendant admitted the averments of the complaint. But it must be treated simply as a judgment without evidence to sustain it.

The Superior Court properly ordered the new trial to take place in the Superior Court. (People v. Freelon, 8 Cal. 517.)

Writ denied and proceedings dismissed.

JEREMIAH CALLAHAN ET AL., APPELLANTS, v.
CATHERINE HICKEY, ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

PRACTICE — OVERRULING DEMURRER FOR WANT OF APPEARANCE — NOTICE MUST BE GIVEN. — Under rule 16 of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, when a demurrer to the complaint has been overruled for want of an appearance, notice of the ruling of the court must be given to the demurring party before the entry of a judgment.

APPEAL from an order vacating and setting aside a judgment.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Carroll Cook, for Appellants.

The court had no power or jurisdiction to render the said order, for the proceeding had been ended, judgment rendered, and the execution returned satisfied at the time of its rendition, and the court exercising a limited and special jurisdiction in a summary proceeding under the statute could assume no powers not delegated to it by such statute. (Chap. 4, part 3, tit. 3, Code Civ. Proc.; O'Connor v. Blake, 29 Cal. 316; Winter v. Fitzpatrick, 35 Cal. 273; § 1169, Code Civ. Proc.)

If rule 16 could be construed so as to make the proceeding appear irregular, then the rule itself under such a construction would be void, as in conflict with the statute. (Code Civ. Proc. § 1169; People v. McClellan, 31 Cal. 101.)

R. Percy Wright, for Respondents.

We are unable to see how a rule of court giving five days' time to answer after the overruling of a demurrer can possibly be in conflict with section 1169 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section applies only where the defendant does not appear and defend. In such case it is proper, as well in summary proceedings as in an action on contract, "to enter default and render judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as prayed in the complaint."

The defendants had appeared and demurred, and on the overruling of the demurrer they had, by virtue of the statute and the rule of court combined, a right to answer within five days after service of notice of the ruling of the court.

It is because the judgment was entered contrary to the rule of court, and the defendants were thereby deprived of any opportunity to answer, that the court ordered the judgment to be set aside.

PER CURIAM.—In the absence of defendant's counsel the court overruled a demurrer which had been interposed by the defendant to the plaintiff's complaint, without giving time to the defendant to answer. But there was a rule of the court which provided as follows: "Rule 16. When a demurrer to any pleading is sustained or overruled the adverse party shall have five days within which to amend or answer after receiving notice of the ruling of the court. When a demurrer to the complaint has been overruled for want of an appearance of the party demurring, or where, in the opinion of the court, the demurrer was frivolous or interposed for delay, leave will not be given to the party to answer such complaint, except upon an affidavit of merits, within five days, or such further time as may be allowed by the court or judge thereof."

Instead of giving the notice required by the rule, the plaintiff, immediately after the overruling of the demurrer, took judgment against the defendant, and had the same entered against him. The taking and entry of the judgment were in violation of the rule of the court, and the judgment was irregular, and being irregular, upon the showing made by the defendant, the court properly set it aside and allowed the defendant to answer the complaint.

S. DRISCOLL, RESPONDENT, v. THOMAS B. HOWARD, APPELLANT.

STREET ASSESSMENT — FORECLOSURE OF LIEN. — Where an action to enforce the lien of a street assessment is against two or more owners, no decree can be entered after a dismissal as to one of the defendants. All the owners must be before the court.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Jarboe & Harrison, for Appellants.

A decree cannot be rendered in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, unless all of the parties interested in the lot are before the court. (People v. Doe, 48 Cal. 560; Hancock v. Bowman, 49 Cal. 413; Clark v. Porter, 53 Cal. 409; Diggins v. Reay, 54 Cal. 525; Harney v. Applegate, 57 Cal. 205.)

O. H. Parker, for Respondents.

The plaintiff complied with the doctrine laid down in People v. Doe. There is no question of pleading in this case.

In Hancock v. Bowman, the plaintiff took judgment against a defendant not served or dismissed. This is not that case.

In Clark v. Porter, a defendant was dismissed against the objection of a co-defendant, and the latter was not allowed to plead the necessity of a joinder of said defendant as one of the owners. This is not that case.

Here the appellant, for aught that appears of record, had the opportunity to set up the non-joinder of the wife.

Harney v. Applegate has no application to this case. No similar question arises here.

In Diggins v. Reay the case shows that no disposition was made as to one defendant.

That is not this case; as here, the wife of appellant was dismissed, which fact is shown in the judgment, p. 7 of the transcript.

Nothing in the record appearing to the contrary, the presumption is, that the dismissal was proper.

By the COURT.—The action was brought to enforce the alleged lien of a street assessment. The action was brought against Thomas B. Howard and Mary T. B. Howard as defendants. The complaint avers "that said defendants are the owners in fee of said described land, and in possession of and claiming to own the same, and exercising acts of ownership over the same. That the legal title of said land appears by deeds recorded in the recorder's office of said city and county to be in defendants." The action was dismissed by plaintiff as to defendant Mary T. B. Howard. Upon the default of the defendant Thomas B. Howard, judgment was rendered against him and for a sale of the premises. From such judgment the defendant, Thomas B., appeals.

The original complaint was not amended. From the judgment roll it appears that the land being owned in fee by Thomas B. and Mary T. B. Howard, a decree for the sale of the premises was entered against the sole defendant Thomas B. Howard. But a decree cannot be entered in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, unless all the owners of the lot are before the court. (People v. Doe, 48 Cal. 560; Hancock v. Bowman, 49 Cal. 413; Clark v. Porter, 53 Cal. 409; Diggins v. Reay, 54 Cal. 525; Harney v. Applegate, 57 Cal. 205.)

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

PATRICK CARROLL ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v.
EDWARD ELLIS, APPELLANT.

HOMESTEAD — DESTRUCTION OF RIGHT BY CONVEYANCE OF AN UNDIVIDED INTEREST. — In 1865, the defendant and his wife, who had filed a declaration of homestead upon certain premises, conveyed to third persons an undivided one half thereof. Held, that as at that time, a homestead right could not attach to lands held in common, or by joint tenancy, the homestead right became thereby destroyed.

ID. — Such right is destroyed notwithstanding the undivided moiety was, at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, reconveyed to the husband. There was a period of time, however short, during which the title to the undivided one half was vested in the third persons.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

In 1864, the defendant Edward Ellis and his wife filed a declaration of homestead upon the premises in controversy. In 1865, they executed a deed of conveyance of the undivided one half of said premises, in conjunction with other property, to

Thomas B. Howard and W. H. Ladd, and Howard and Ladd, at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, reconveyed to defendant Edward Ellis the same undivided one half. This last named conveyance was the only consideration for the first. There was no change of possession. In 1875, the defendant Edward Ellis executed and delivered a mortgage upon the premises to secure a note payable to the plaintiffs. The note was not paid at maturity, and this action was brought to foreclose the mortgage.

E. A. & G. E. Lawrence, for Appellants.

The lower court held that by virtue of the conveyance, the homestead right was abandoned. This is assigned for error. The case of Kellersberger v. Kopp, 6 Cal. 563, does not sustain the ruling of the court. There the occupant of the homestead only owned the undivided one half of the premises. Here defendants never parted with the title or possession, and were always owners of the whole. The homestead was not lost by a simple exchange of deeds. (Eby v. Foster, 61 Cal. 282.)

Frank & Carson, and J. D. Sullivan, for Respondents.

As a husband and wife may, by joining in a conveyance, destroy a homestead right already acquired by selling the whole, so they may equally destroy it by selling or conveying a part of it, if it be done in the shape of an undivided moiety, so as to turn the estate into a tenancy in common; and when it has been thus destroyed no question of homestead can be raised against a bona fide creditor. (Kellersberger v. Kopp, 6 Cal. 563; Bishop v. Hubbard, 23 Cal. 517; Elias v. Verdugo, 27 Cal. 425; Seaton v. Son, 32 Cal. 481.)

Such a conveyance clearly invalidates the homestead. (Ashley v. Olmstead, 54 Cal. 616; Grogan v. Thrift, 58 Cal. 378.)

A homestead cannot be carved out of land held in joint tenancy or by tenancy in common. (Elias v. Verdugo, 27 Cal. 418; Wolf v. Fleischacker, 5 Cal. 244; Reynolds v. Pixley, 6 Cal. 165; Giblin v. Jordan, 6 Cal. 416; Seaton v. Son, 32 Cal. 481.)

PER CURIAM.—When the several transactions between these parties occurred a homestead right could not attach upon lands held in common, or by joint tenancy. (Kellersberger v. Kopp, 6 Cal. 563; Bishop v. Hubbard, 23 Cal. 517; Elias v. Verdugo, 27 Cal. 418.)

And in Kellersberger v. Kopp, 6 Cal. 565, it was held: "As husband and wife may, by joining in a conveyance, destroy a homestead right already acquired, so they may equally destroy it by selling and conveying a part of it, if it be done in the shape of an undivided moiety, so as to turn the estate into a tenancy in common; and when it has been thus destroyed, no question of homestead can be raised against a creditor."

The court below found, that, ten years prior to the execution by the husband of the mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this action, "the defendant, Edward Ellis, and his said wife, Kate Ellis, made and executed a deed of conveyance to the undivided one half of said premises, . . . to Thomas B. Howard and William H. Ladd."

It is urged by appellant that the homestead right was not destroyed by such conveyance, because the court also found "and the said Thomas B. Howard and William H. Ladd at the same time, and as part of the same transaction, executed to the defendant Edward Ellis, a conveyance of the same undivided half of said premises."

There can be no doubt, however, there was a period of time, however short, during which the title to the undivided one half was vested in Howard and Ladd.

Judgment and order affirmed.

C. A. KENNEY ET AL., APPELLANTS, v. DANIEL KELLEHER ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

PRACTICE — RENEWAL OF MOTIONS. — Leave to renew a motion may be given after the original motion is denied, and the granting or refusal of leave is within the legal discretion of the court, and will not be interfered with except in case of abuse; and it is not an abuse to grant leave upon the same facts more fully stated.

Id. — LEAVE TO RENEW MAY BE GRANTED AT CHAMBERS. — The judge may at chambers grant leave to renew the motion.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco vacating and setting aside a default and judgment.

Judgment by default was entered against the defendant Catherine Kelleher, and she moved the court to set aside the default and judgment, which motion the court denied. Subsequently she renewed the motion, and the following order was written upon the notice of motion: "Good cause being shown therefor, on motion of Sullivan and Severance, attorneys for defendant Mrs. C. Kelleher, it is ordered that the time of service be shortened, and that the motion therein specified be heard at the time and place therein named, April 27th, 1880.

"M. A. EDMONDS, Judge."

This order was made at chambers. The court granted the motion and set aside the default and judgment with leave to answer, and the plaintiff appealed from the order.

Pillsbury & Titus, for Appellants.

The decision of the first motion became the law of the case on all points involved therein. The only legal remedy for the losing party was an application to renew upon the ground of facts discovered after the determination of the first motion, or an appeal. (Lang v. Specht, 7 Pac. C. L. J. 236.)

A motion cannot be renewed without leave of the court. (Ford v. Doyle, 44 Cal. 635; Bowers v. Cherokee Bob, 46 Cal. 279; Reed v. Allison, 54 Cal. 490; Mitchell v. Allen, 12 Wend. 290; Dwight v. St. John, 25 N. Y. 203; Pierce v. Kneeland, 9 Wis. (s. p.), 33, 34; Ray v. Connor, 3 Ed. Ch. 478; Dodd v. Astor, 2 Barb. Ch. 396; Bellinger v. Martindale, 8 How. Pr. 113; Re Brockway, 14 The Reporter, 454.)

Leave to renew could only be granted by the court, and not by the judge at chambers. (Dollfus v. Frosch, 5 Hill, 493, 495.)

Leave will not be given to renew a motion to enable a party to insist on facts known to him, but not relied on at the first hearing. It must be upon newly discovered facts. (Pattison v. Bacon, 21 How. Pr. 478; Lovell v. Martin, 21 How. Pr. 238; Schlemmer v. Myerstein, 19 How. Pr. 412.)

Philip G. Galpin, W. S. McPheeters, and John Coffey, for Respondents.

Applications to open defaults are addressed to the legal discretion of the court, and unless there is a plain case of an abuse of this discretion, the Supreme Court will not interfere. (Coleman v. Rankin, 37 Cal. 247; Watson v. S. F. and H. B. R. R. Co. 41 Cal. 17; Santa Barbara L. S. Co. v. Thompson, 46 Cal. 63.)

PER CURIAM. — Leave to renew a motion may be given after the original motion is denied, and when given may be acted upon. In this case there must necessarily have been an application to the court for leave to renew the motion, and the application must have been granted. This is evident from the fact that the court entertained the motion for an order to show cause, and afterward, when the principal motion came on to be heard, entertained and granted it against the objections of the opposite party. (Bowers v. Cherokee Bob, 46 Cal. 286.)

It is insisted that leave to renew can only be granted by the court, and not by a judge in chambers. But a judge of the Superior Court may, at chambers, grant all orders which are usually granted upon ex parte application. (Code Civ. Proc. § 166.) Orders to show cause are made ex parte. The final order was made by the court. It was said in Ford v. Doyle, 44 Cal. 635, that the doctrine of res adjudicata, in its strict sense, does not apply to motions made in the course of practice, and the court may, upon a proper showing, allow a renewal of a motion once decided. It is added that this leave will rarely be granted unless it appears that a new state of facts has arisen since the former hearing, or that the then existing facts were not presented by reason of surprise or excusable neglect.

But this is not a determination that leave may never be granted upon the same facts more fully stated. The granting or refusing of leave to renew the motion is within the legal discretion of the court, which we ought not to interfere with except in case of abuse.

No point is made by appellants as to the sufficiency of the affidavit of the defendant as an "affidavit of merits."

Upon the affidavits and proffered answer of the applicant we cannot say the court below erred in granting the motion to set aside the default judgment.

The portions of the testimony objected to were not entirely irrelevant.

Order appealed from affirmed.

TRADE MARK — BUSINESS SIGNS. — The object of a trade-mark is to indicate by its own meaning, or by association, the origin or ownership of the article to which it is applied. PER CURIAM. — The action is to recover damages for a violation of the plaintiff's alleged trade-mark, and to restrain the use of it by the defendant in the future. The sufficiency of the complaint is the question for consideration. According to its averments the plaintiff is engaged in conducting a saloon business in the city and county of San Francisco, particularly for the sale of a certain kind of beer known as Philadelphia Beer; and what he seeks to protect as a trade-mark, and which is used by him as a sign over the doors of his place of business, and as a label for the beer bottled by him, consists of a row of beer barrels so painted upon the sign and printed upon the labels as to show the top-head and outline of each barrel, with the letters "P. B." indicating and standing for Philadelphia Beer, stamped or printed upon the head of each barrel, together with the words "Depot of the Celebrated" over, and the words "Philadelphia Lager Beer" below the row of barrels. The act of the defendant complained of is the erection by him over his place of business of a sign similar to that of the plaintiff, the chief difference being the insertion of the letters "F. B.," indicating and standing for "Fredericksburger Beer," in lieu of the letters "P. B.," and the insertion of the word "Fredericksburger" where the word "Philadelphia" appears on the sign and label of the plaintiff.

The object of a trade-mark is to indicate by its own meaning, or by association, the origin or ownership of the article to which it is applied. Section 991 of our Civil Code provides:—

"One who produces or deals in a particular thing, or conducts a particular business, may appropriate to his exclusive use, as a trade-mark, any form, symbol, or name, which has not been so appropriated by another, to designate the origin or ownership thereof, but he cannot exclusively appropriate any designation, or part of a designation, which relates only to the name, quality, or the description of the thing or business, or the place where the thing is produced, or the business is carried on." And by section 3196 of the Political Code it is declared:—

"The phrase 'trade-mark' as used in this chapter includes every description of word, letter, device, emblem, stamp, imprint, brand, printed ticket, label, or wrapper, usually affixed by any mechanic, manufacturer, druggist, merchant, or tradesman, to denote any goods to be imported, manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, other than any name, word, or expression generally denoting any goods to be of some particular class or description."

We do not perceive that either the letters or words upon the plaintiff's sign or label, nor the device as a whole, in any manner indicated origin or ownership. A sign placed over a man's place of business with a row of beer barrels painted on it would indicate that he sold beer; the letters "P. B." stamped on the head of the barrels, and the words "Depot of the Celebrated" placed above, and the words "Philadelphia Beer" placed below the row of barrels, would indicate that he sold Philadelphia Beer. It does not appear that the plaintiff is the manufacturer of the Philadelphia Beer nor the sole agent for its sale. For aught that appears any one else has as much right to sell Philadelphia Beer as the plaintiff. In our opinion the sign and label of the plaintiff relates only to the description of the beverage dealt in by him, and therefore cannot be protected as a trade-mark.

Judgment affirmed.

J. S. DYER, APPELLANT, v. R. J. HARRISON ET AL.,
RESPONDENTS.

STREET ASSESSMENT. — The board of supervisors of San Francisco ordered that the roadway and sidewalks of Greenwich Street from Laguna to Fillmore Street — a distance of three blocks — be macadamized, and that redwood curbs be furnished and laid thereon. In making the assessment, the superintendent of streets separated the roadway and curbing from the sidewalks, and as to the latter, three lots chargeable with their proportion of the cost of the work were omitted from the assessment. Held (1), that the assessment, even if properly made in other respects, was invalid as to the sidewalks by reason of the omission of these lots; (2) that in estimating the cost of the work, and distributing the same over the lots liable therefor, the roadway and curbing could be separated from the sidewalks, and that the entire assessment was void:

(3) that if a separate assessment were required for each kind of work, the assessment here could not be sustained, because the cost of the curbing and the expense of macadamizing the roadway are united.

10. — NUMBERING THE LOTS AND SHOWING THEIR FRONTAGE. — The assessment was also held to be invalid as to one of the lots, for the reason that the provisions of the statute requiring each lot or portion of lot to be numbered, and the frontage shown were not complied with. The lot was numbered, but portions thereof assessed for work done on the street crossings were not numbered either in the assessment or on the diagram, nor did the diagram show the number of feet frontage of the portions so assessed.

APPEAL from an order of the late District Court of the Third Judicial District in and for the city and county of San Francisco refusing a new trial.

Action on a street assessment. No work was done on the sidewalks in front of the lots omitted from the assessment. The additional facts sufficiently appear in the head notes and opinion of the court.

J. C. Bates and J. M. Wood, for Appellant.

Cope & Boyd, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—Three of the lots on Greenwich Street, liable to assessment for the construction of sidewalks on Greenwich, between Laguna and Fillmore Streets, are omitted from the assessment. The property liable to assessment for sidewalks also constituted the district subject to assessment for the curbing and macadamizing the roadway. If the property fronting on Greenwich constituted two separate and conterminous assessment districts, one to be assessed for sidewalks and the other to be assessed for the roadway and curbing, then the whole assessment for sidewalks is void, because certain lots included within the assessment district for sidewalks were omitted. (People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15.)

It is urged, by respondent, that the assessment applicable to the defined district is an entirety, and that the whole assessment is void because of the omission of the three lots; that the only assessment which the superintendent was authorized to make was a distribution, proportionate to frontage (upon all the lots opposite to the work done), of the gross sum to be paid the contractor, with incidental expenses. It is admitted that for the "work done on main street crossings" separate assessment districts are provided. The statute declares, "The expenses of such work shall be assessed upon the four quarter blocks adjoining and cornering on the crossings." (Stats. 1871-72, p. 810, sub. 3.) But as to work done on the street improved, except at the crossings, it is provided (Stats. 1871-72, p. 809, sub. 1), the expenses "incurred for any work authorized by section 3 (of the act) shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting on the work, . . . each lot or portion of lot being separately assessed, in proportion to its frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work."

If it be admitted that the resolutions of intention and ordering the work, and the award, authorized the superintendent to agree in one contract for macadamizing the roadway, constructing sidewalks and curbs, it would seem the more reasonable construction of the statute that the assessment should be distributed with reference to the gross sum to be paid under the contract. Section 8 of the act means this, or it means that there shall be a separate assessment for each kind of work mentioned in section 3. If it means a separate assessment for each kind of work done under a single contract, the assessment herein is invalid, because it adds the price of the curbing to the expenses of macadamizing the roadway, and distributes the aggregate amount upon the lots fronting on the street.

If the statute requires the "total expense" incurred for macadamizing the street, macadamizing the sidewalks and erecting curbs to be apportioned in a single assessment (and this we think the true interpretation), the assessment which attempts to divide these charges is invalid.

The ninth section of the Act of 1872 (Stats. 1871-72, p. 813) requires the superintendent to make "an assessment to cover the sum due for the work done and performed under the contract . . . in conformity to the provisions of this act, and according to the character of the work done," etc. When the work done, of one or more kinds, is a charge upon the same property — or same assessment district — the act can be complied with only by distributing the total expense. Each and every portion of the work is ratably a charge upon the lots included within the district. All the work done under the contract—the work done as a whole—is the benefit conferred upon the property within the district, in return for which the property within the district is assessed.

The assessment on lot 15 for the crossing is void, because it does not conform to section 9 of the act. The section requires an assessment to designate “the number of each lot or portion of lot assessed,” and that the accompanying diagram shall exhibit the relative location of such lot, or portion of lot, to the work done, “numbered to correspond with the numbers in the assessment, and showing the number of feet frontage assessed for said work,” etc.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Petition for a rehearing denied.

FRANCIS M. MATTHEW AND NANCY MATTHEW,
RESPONDENTS, v. THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAIL-ROAD CO., APPELLANT.

DAMAGES — PERSONAL INJURIES TO WIFE — EXTENT OF RECOVERY IN ACTION BY HUSBAND AND WIFE. — In an action for damages for personal injuries to the wife, the husband must be made a party plaintiff, but the recovery cannot extend to any matters for which the husband must sue alone, as loss of service and the like.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Glassel, Smith & Patton, for Appellant.

Brunson & Wells, and Eb. Williams, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—Action for damages. The complaint charges that on the 11th of March, 1880, the plaintiff, Nancy Matthew, was a passenger in a passenger coach in one of the defendant's trains of cars en route from Sacramento to Los Angeles, and that while at a station on the line of the road she was, by the negligent starting of the train, violently thrown to the floor of the car, thereby receiving great and permanent injuries. The plaintiffs are the said Nancy Matthew, and her husband, Francis M. Matthew.

The ground of the action is the wife's personal injuries. The cause of action is hers. The husband was joined as a plaintiff because the common-law rule requiring that he do so is yet in force. But the husband could not himself recover for the personal injuries sustained by the wife. He might, however, recover such damages as he has suffered in consequence of such injuries. Under this head fall the loss of the wife's services to the husband, and such expenses as he may have been put to by reason of the injuries. Such consequential damage constitute the husband's cause of action, and in a suit to recover it the wife could not join.

These views will be found supported by the following authorities: Sheldon v. Steamship Uncle Sam, 18 Cal. 526; 1 Chitty's Pl. 73; Bliss on Code Plead. § 27; Pomeroy's Civil Rem. § 191; Fuller et ux. v. Naugatuck R. R. Co. 21 Conn. 571. It results, necessarily, that in the joint action of husband and wife for the personal suffering of or injury to the wife, the recovery cannot extend to any matter for which the husband must sue alone; and it was expressly so decided in the case of Sheldon v. Steamship Uncle Sam, 18 Cal. supra, whence it follows that the court below erred in instructing the jury in the case at bar that, in awarding damages to the plaintiffs they should take into consideration the loss of the services of the wife to the husband, and the value of such services.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

C. D. HAVEN, APPELLANT, v. F. M. HAWS,
RESPONDENT.

EVIDENCE — DECISION OF UNITED STATES LAND DEPARTMENT. — The finding of any fact involved in a contest before the land department of the United States is conclusive upon the courts of this State in an action to hold the successful party as a trustee for the other, or to deprive him of the benefit of his success in the department, except, perhaps, in cases of fraud.

ID. — CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE — ADVERSE POSSESSION. — In an action of ejectment, brought by one holding a certificate of purchase from the United States, against one in adverse possession, the effect of the certificate as evidence being statutory, the inquiry as to adverse possession to overcome it is one which has no relation to any judgment or action of any of the officers of the land department, by virtue of which the certificate was issued. Adverse possession is a fact to be determined by the State courts.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Bernardino County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was ejectment. The plaintiff held a certificate of purchase issued by the United States, and which grew out of a controversy before the land department, entitled John D. Osborne v. Cyrus D. Haven & F. M. Haws, involving the west half of a quarter section of government lands. The plaintiff and defendant had filed their declaratory statements to pre-empt the lands, and Osborne, holding a soldier's certificate, had located it upon the same lands. The contest thus begun resulted in a decision of the secretary of the interior awarding the land to the plaintiff Haven.

The defendant answering averred that he was, at the time plaintiff filed his declaratory statement, and since 1873 had been, in the adverse possession of the land in controversy, and by way of cross-complaint set up all the proceedings and findings of the land department in the contest between Osborne and the plaintiff and defendant, and prayed that the plaintiff be declared a trustee for him, and that all the rights secured by the certificate of purchase be conveyed to him. The plaintiff demurred to the cross-complaint, the demurrer was sustained, and the case went to trial upon the answer. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the decision of the secretary of the interior, by virtue of which the certificate was issued. The court refused to admit it, and found that the defendant was, at the time the plaintiff filed his declaratory statement to pre-empt the land, and at the commencement of this action, and has been continuously since 1873, in the adverse possession thereof, and gave judgment for the defendant.

C. W. C. Rowell, for Appellant, cited Dilla v. Bohall, 53 Cal. 709; Powers v. Leith, 53 Cal. 711.

Satterwhite & Curtis, for Respondent, cited Conlan v. Quinby, 51 Cal. 412; Hutton v. Frisbie, 37 Cal. 475; Page v. Fowler, 28 Cal. 605.

PER CURIAM.—Section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a certificate of purchase of any land issued in pursuance of any law of the United States is "primary" evidence that the holder thereof is the owner of the land described therein; but the evidence may be overcome by proof that at the time of filing the pre-emption claim on which such certificate may have issued, the land was in the adverse possession of the adverse party.

The adverse possession of defendant was a question of fact to be passed upon by the court that tried this action.

In case of contest between opposing claimants to a portion of the public lands in the land department of the United States, the finding of any fact involved in such contest is conclusive upon the courts of the State, in an action or proceeding brought here to hold the successful party in the contest as trustee for the other, or to deprive him of the benefit of his success in the department; except, perhaps, in certain cases where the officers of the land department have been imposed upon by false testimony or fraud.

But the certificate of purchase is evidence, prima facie, of title, only because the section of the Code makes it such evidence, and the same section provides that the evidence of the certificate may be overcome by proof of adverse possession, etc.

This leaves the inquiry as to adverse possession to overcome the effect of the certificate an independent inquiry, which has no relation to any action or judgment of the secretary of the interior or other officer of the United States. It is the fact of the adverse possession which is to be ascertained by the State court. The finding of the land officers may have led up to the issuance of the certificate, but the effect of the certificate, as evidence in our courts, depends entirely upon our own legislation.

The court below properly refused to admit in evidence the decision of the secretary of the interior in the contest between plaintiff and Osborne, as conclusive or any evidence upon the question of the adverse possession of the defendant herein.

Judgment affirmed.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF HENRY C. HUDSON, DECEASED.

ADMINISTRATION — DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION — JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURTS — JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURTS AS SUCCESSORS. — Letters testamentary were issued in New Jersey and in this State. The administration in this State being completed, and the court finding that there were funds enough in the hands of the executor in New Jersey to satisfy the legacies to persons outside of this State, distributed the estate and discharged the executor. After six years the legatees in New Jersey filed a petition in the Superior Court, as successor of the Probate Court, alleging the inadequacy of the funds in the hands of the New Jersey executor to pay their legacies, and praying that the decree be set aside on account of false representations made to the court by the resident executor. Held, (1), that such decree is not void for want of jurisdiction; (2), that the Probate Courts had no jurisdiction to entertain a petition by a legatee to set aside a decree of distribution, after the time specified in section 478 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for fraud or imposition by false representations to the court; nor has the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts, as succeeding to the powers of the Probate Courts, been enlarged in this regard. Courts of equity can afford the proper relief.

APPEAL from an order and judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco sustaining the demurrer to and dismissing the petition to set aside the decree of distribution.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Hammond & Wright, for Appellants.

The decree of distribution is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and is void on its face. The California court of probate could have no jurisdiction to determine that there were assets enough in New Jersey to pay the legacies there. (Story's Conflict of Laws, 422, 424, 429, 513, 586; Jackson v. Johnson, 34 Ga. 511; Fay v. Haven, 3 Met. 109-114; Sparks v. White, 7 Humph. 86; Vermilya v. Beatty, 6 Barb. 429; Story's Eq. Pl. 179; Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 175.)

The power of courts of probate to set aside their decrees for fraud in a suit by citation is in other States as unquestioned as that of the court of chancery to set aside any common-law judgment for fraud. (Gary on Probate of Wills, 608; Waters v. Stickney, 12 Allen, 11; Sever v. Russell, 4 Cush. 518-519; Jennison v. Hapgood, 7 Pick. 7; Paine v. Stone, 10 Pick. 76; Gould v. Gould, 3 Story, 519; Morgan v. Dodge, 44 N. H. 255.)

A. N. Drown, for Respondent, argued that the decree is final and that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the petition or the parties. (Citing Estate of Garraud, 36 Cal. 279, 280; Ex parte Smith, 53 Cal. 204; Wheeler v. Bolton, 54 Cal. 302; Reynolds v. Brumagim, 54 Cal. 254; § 1908, Code Civ. Proc.; § 1686, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Dall, Myrick's Prob. Rep. 159.)

That a bill in equity is the only proper remedy. (Chester v. Miller, 13 Cal. 560.) That the decree is not void, but at most merely erroneous, and could have been corrected only by appeal. (Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 175.)

MYRICK, J.—Henry C. Hudson, a resident of New Jersey, died in that State December 6, 1871; his will was admitted to probate, in that State, December 28, 1871, and on the 28th of April, 1872, an exemplified copy was admitted to probate in this State. William H. Brokaw received letters testamentary in New Jersey, and C. C. Burr in this State. The will bequeathed to the present petitioners, residing in New Jersey, $4,700, to persons residing in San Francisco, $4,100, and to other persons, $5,300. The remainder, if any, after the payment of debts and legacies, was to go to the widow of deceased. In January, 1874, the administration in this State being completed, the Probate Court, after finding that the estate here in the hands of the executor was equivalent in value to $13,914.08, after paying all debts and the legacies to persons residing in California, and was community property, and that there was then in the hands of the executor in New Jersey abundant property to satisfy the legacies to persons residing out of California, and all debts to persons residing out of this State, and the expenses of administration, distributed the residue in this State to the widow of deceased, Mary Hudson; and on the production of her receipt the executor here was discharged. In 1880, more than six years after the distribution and discharge, the petitioners presented their petition, asking that the decree of distribution and the discharge be set aside, and that a sufficient sum of the California assets be turned over to the New Jersey executor to pay the balances of the legacies now left unpaid. The petition avers that ten per cent of the legacies have been paid out of the New Jersey assets. It appears by the petition that on a settlement of the accounts of the New Jersey executor there remained in his hands $5,441.63.

The petitioners aver that certain of them, acting for themselves and others, addressed letters to Burr, before and after his application for distribution, regarding the progress of his administration, and received information except as to the proceedings for distribution. It thus appears that they had actual knowledge of the administration here, and could before distribution have made such application as would have been necessary to protect their rights. It appears that they relied upon Burr, and they complain that he misled them.

The petition was demurred to (after due service upon them of citation) by the said Mary Hudson and C. C. Burr, upon the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction of either of them, or of the subject-matter of the petition; all other grounds of objection were waived.

We are of opinion that the demurrer was well taken, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the petition. By section 1667 of the Code of Civil Procedure the Probate Court was authorized, on proceedings for distribution, in case it was necessary, to order the money here to be remitted to the New Jersey executor to pay legacies there. The fact that such action could be had in case it was necessary implies, of course, the right to hear and determine as to the necessity; and we must presume that the court heard proof that the New Jersey assets were ample to pay all there. Therefore, the decree is not void on its face. Section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure makes the decree of the Probate Court on distribution conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal. Under the late Constitution, the Probate Courts were to have such jurisdiction as should be prescribed by law. There is no provision of the statute which gave to the Probate Court jurisdiction to entertain, after a decree of distribution and discharge (and after the time specified in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure), a petition to set aside the decree for fraud, or because the court had been imposed upon by false testimony. The jurisdiction of the Superior Courts, as succeeding to the powers of the Probate Courts, is not enlarged in this regard. In such cases, courts of equity have jurisdiction to afford proper relief; and if it be true that, by means of false testimony, the Probate Court was imposed upon, and induced to make a decree which it would not otherwise have made, doubtless a court of equity can charge the distributees as trustees.

It is proper to remark that we are not passing upon the power of the Probate Courts, or of the Superior Courts as successors, to entertain applications to afford relief pending the administration. We are passing upon the statute making the decree of distribution final.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF THOMAS
BEECH, DECEASED.

ADMINISTRATION — APPLICATION FOR LETTERS. — Two applications were made for letters of administration, one by the public administrator, and the other by a person who based his claim upon the written request of a son of the deceased residing in Great Britain. The court below decided in favor of the public administrator on the ground that no effect could be given to the request of the son by reason of his non-residence. Held, on a construction of certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure that the decision was correct.

STATUTE — CONFLICTING PROVISIONS — REPEAL BY IMPLICATION. — The provisions of section 1869 of the Code of Civil Procedure excluding non-residents is not repealed by section 1879 of the same Code. There is no express repeal, and no such conflict as to work a repeal by implication.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco denying the application and petition of Thomas Menzies for letters of administration, and granting the same to the public administrator.

The decedent died in England, being at that time a resident of that country. He was never a resident of California, but left an estate here consisting of ten thousand dollars, deposited in the Security Savings Bank of San Francisco. The heirs of the decedent were Walter H. Beech, his son, and Mary L. F. Beech and Mrs. Bell, his daughters, all residents of the kingdom of Great Britain. There were no heirs or relatives residing in California. The decedent left a will which was admitted to probate in said kingdom, and the said Walter H. Beech was a devisee and legatee, and was named as an executor and trustee thereof. Walter H. Beech was never a resident of California. A copy of the will and probate were filed in the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco. Walter H. Beech made a written request asking the appointment of Thomas Menzies, the petitioner, as administrator with the will annexed, and that letters of administration be issued to him.

B. A. Reynolds, public administrator, also petitioned for letters of administration.

The court granted letters to the public administrator, and Menzies appealed.

Sydney V. Smith & Son, for Appellant, argued that he was entitled to letters under section 1379 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1880, and contended that the right of nomination conferred by that section is not lost by non-residence. That section 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure is but a limitation upon the right of a non-resident to serve as administrator, citing Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 215; Lucas v. Todd, 28 Cal. 186.

John A. Wright, for the public administrator, cited in opposition to the appellant, Estate of Kelly, 57 Cal. 81; Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 215; Estate of Morgan, 53 Cal. 243.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—Section 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that “no person is competent or entitled to serve as administrator who is . . . not a bona fide resident of this State.” Section 1379 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that “administration may be granted to one or more competent persons, although not entitled to the same, at the written request of the person entitled, filed in the court. When the person entitled is a non-resident of the State, affidavits or depositions, taken ex parte before any officer authorized by the laws of this State to take acknowledgments and administer oaths out of this State, may be received as primary evidence of the identity of the party, if free from suspicion, and the fact is established to the satisfaction of the court.”

Were it not for the last clause of this section it probably would not be claimed that the court erred in refusing to appoint the appellant, whose sole right to administration is based upon the request of a non-resident, who, if a bona fide resident of this State, would himself be entitled to administration. And unless the clause of section 1369 above quoted is repealed by the last clause of section 1379, the request to have the appellant appointed was not made by a person who was himself either competent or entitled to serve as administrator.

There is no express repeal of the earlier statute, and a repeal by implication is not favored; on the contrary, courts are bound to uphold the prior, if the two acts may well subsist together. (Dr. Foster's Case, 7 Rep. 87; Bowen v. Lease, 5 Hill, 221; Canal Co. v. R. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 1; Street v. Commonwealth, 6 Watts & S. 209; Commonwealth v. Easton Bank, 10 Barr. 322; Brown v. County Commissioners, 21 Pa. St. 37; Williams v. Potter, 2 Barb. 316; Commonwealth v. Herrick, 6 Cush. 465.)

If the latter part of this statute be repugnant to the former part the latter part must stand, and so far as it is repugnant, be a repeal of the former, because it was last agreed to by the makers of the statute. (Attorney-General v. Governor & Co. of Chelsea Water Works, Fitzg. 195; Dwarries on Statutes, 515, 534.)

The question to be determined here is, whether the two clauses of the Code above quoted are repugnant or irreconcilably inconsistent. The former positively declares that no person is competent or entitled to serve as administrator who is not a bona fide resident of the State. The latter does not expressly declare that any person who is not a bona fide resident of the State shall be competent or entitled to so serve. It says, "When the person so entitled is a non-resident" his identity may be proven in a certain way. But "the person so entitled" never can be a non-resident so long as the clause which we have quoted from section 1369 stands unrepealed. So the legislature appears to have provided for a contingency which cannot arise under the law as it now stands, and until that contingency does arise the latter clause of section 1379 must remain practically inoperative.

Order appealed from affirmed.

RESPONDENT.

PUBLIC STREET — CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD THEREON — INJUNCTION. — The owner of land bordering on a public street, but not including any portion of the street, cannot enjoin the obstruction of the street by a railroad, unless the injury to him will be different in character, and not merely greater in degree than that which the general public will suffer.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Alameda.

The action was brought to enjoin the defendant from constructing and operating a steam railroad on Webster Street in the city of Oakland. The city council had passed an ordinance granting to the defendant the right to construct and maintain the road, but the validity of this ordinance was assailed on various grounds. The injunction was denied, and a judgment rendered dismissing the action.

W. W. Foote, Vrooman & Davis, and J. C. Martin, for Appellant.

Plaintiff has a right to maintain the action. (Ford v. C. & N. R. R. Co. 14 Wis. 669; Williams v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 16 N. Y. 37; Wager v. Troy Union R. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 529; Im-lay v. Co. 40 Cal. 406; Schulte v. N. P. T. Co. 50 Cal. 594.)

Greathouse & Blanding, for Respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—It appears by the statement of facts, upon which this case by stipulation of the parties was submitted to the court below, that the easterly line of the street in which the plaintiff seeks to have the defendant enjoined from constructing and operating a railroad, constitutes the western line of plaintiff's land, and "that the laying down of railroad tracks by defendant, and the operation of a railroad along said street, would impede and obstruct the use thereof as a public street to the same extent as other steam railroads laid down and operated in any street in a city, and to that extent does impede the free access, ingress, and egress to and from plaintiff's property and across said street, and that his property will be damaged thereby to the same extent as property would be damaged on any other street by the construction and operating thereon of a steam railroad."

The plaintiff's land "run up to the eastern line, and not to the middle of the street." (Severy v. O. P. R. R. Co. 51 Cal. 195.)

In Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403, it was held that a private party is not entitled to an injunction to prevent the obstruction of a public highway, unless the injury which he will suffer thereby is shown to be different in character, and not merely greater in degree than that which the general public will suffer. And the court says that that rule is without exception. That case was approved and followed in the recent case of Payne v. McKinley, 54 Cal. 532.

In the case now before us it does not appear that the injury which the plaintiff will sustain, if said railroad be constructed and operated in said street, will be different from, or even greater than that which the public at large will suffer if said railroad be constructed and operated in said street; and, upon the authority of the cases above cited, the judgment must be affirmed.

Upon the other questions arising in this case we express no opinion.

ET AL, APPELLANTS.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — REPEAL OF STATUTE. — The provisions of the Civil Code in relation to assignments for the benefit of creditors are not repealed by the insolvent law of 1880.

Id. — INVENTORY OF INDEBTEDNESS. — A mistake in computation, or an unintentional error, whereby the indebtedness to some of the creditors is represented in the inventory as larger than the amounts actually owing, is not enough to vitiate the assignment.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The assignment in question was made by Joseph F. Vorbe to the plaintiff in trust for the creditors of Vorbe. One of the principal objections to the assignment arose on an indebtedness of three thousand five hundred dollars appearing in the inventory as due to Madam M. Grandvoinet. This was originally a bona fide indebtedness, but prior to the assignment, the parties entered into an agreement by which the indebtedness was changed to an annuity for life. The court below found that the error in regard to the indebtedness as stated in the inventory was accidental, and without any fraudulent intent.

The action was brought to determine the rights of the plaintiff under the assignment, and to enjoin a sale of the assigned property under a judgment recovered by the defendant Fisch against Vorbe subsequent to the assignment. The court held that the assignment was valid, and vested in the plaintiff the title to the property for the benefit of the creditors. A judgment was rendered in his favor as demanded in the complaint.

Stephen G. Nye, and York & Whitworth, for Appellants.

Edward J. Pringle, for Respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—In Dresbach v. His Creditors, 63 Cal. 187, it was held that the Code which provides for “assignments for the benefit of creditors” (Civ. Code, tit. 3, part 2, div. 4), was not repealed by the insolvent law of 1880, which contains a provision that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with it are repealed.

Conceding that the assignor in some instances inventoried his indebtedness to some of the creditors, for whose benefit said assignment was made, too high, we think, in the absence of any evidence that it was designedly done, the assignment should not be held void for that reason. A mere mistake of computation ought not to vitiate such an assignment, and we are not prepared to say from an inspection of the record that there is anything more than that apparent in this case. The court below found that there was not, and we must presume that the evidence justified that finding unless the contrary appears.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MARY KANE, RESPONDENT, v. THOMAS DESMOND, SHERIFF, ETC., APPELLANT.

GIFT — HUSBAND AND WIFE. — A verbal gift of personal property — a piano — by a husband to his wife, is valid as between the parties, the piano being delivered to and continuously used by the wife as her property. Such a gift would be void as to existing creditors of the husband, but in the absence of evidence that the husband was indebted at the time, there is no presumption of its invalidity as to subsequent creditors.

SEIZURE UNDER EXECUTION — JUSTIFICATION OF THE OFFICER. — Where property of the wife is seized under an execution against the husband, the officer is not in a position to justify the seizure, unless, in addition to the execution, he also produces the judgment on which it was issued.

JUDGMENT — JUSTICE OF THE PEACE. — In order to support a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, whose jurisdiction is special and limited, the jurisdictional facts must be shown. There is no presumption in favor of the jurisdiction. An entry in the docket of the justice to the effect that the summons was returned served, does not show such a service as the law required to give jurisdiction of the person.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The defendant was sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and the action was brought to recover the property or its value. The additional facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

H. C. Firebaugh, for Appellant.

H. G. Sieberst, for Respondent.

McKEE, J. — The defendant seized the piano in controversy in this case from the possession of the plaintiff, by an execution, issued in favor of A. L. Day v. Thomas Kane, and sold it at execution sale as the property of Kane to satisfy the execution. Thomas Kane was the husband of the plaintiff. On the trial of the case the court found the plaintiff was, at the time of the seizure and sale, the sole and exclusive owner of the property in her own right, and entitled to its possession, and that her husband had no right or title to it. The seizure of the property was, therefore, wrongful (Wellman v. English, 38 Cal. 583; Lewis v. Johns, 34 Cal. 629; Van Pelt v. Littler, 14 Cal. 194), and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

BUT the finding is attacked as against the law and the evidence, in this, that the evidence showed the plaintiff's claim of title to the property was founded on a gift from her husband, which was void as to his creditors. But it does not appear that the husband was indebted to any one at the time of the gift, except to the person from whom he had rented the piano under an agreement to purchase it on the instalment plan. Being free from debt the husband had the right to transfer his interest in the property to his wife by gift, and the wife, under the law, had the capacity to take and hold it in her own name and right. (Dow v. Gould & Curry S. M. Co. 31 Cal. 629; Woods v. Whitney, 42 Cal. 358; Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 259; Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 440.) The gift was complete; for the evidence tended to show that immediately after the husband had rented the piano under the agreement to purchase, he delivered it to his wife as a gift, and she accepted it, and used it continuously as her separate property until the time of the seizure. Now this transfer by gift was valid and effectual between herself and her husband and all the world, except existing creditors and bona fide subsequent purchasers without notice. There was no proof that Day—the execution creditor—was a creditor of the husband at the time of the gift, and there is no presumption that the gift was void as to him as a subsequent creditor. (Wells v. Stout, 9 Cal. 480; Hussey v. Castle, 41 Cal. 239.)

Presumptively, therefore, the gift was valid as between the parties; and, being valid, it vested in the plaintiff, as of her own right, whatever interest her husband had in the property. It was, therefore, her separate property; and the transaction by which she acquired it cannot be attacked as fraudulent and void as to subsequent creditors, except by such a creditor or an officer representing him. Here, however, the suit is not against one who claims to be a creditor; it is against the officer who levied the execution. But an officer, who seizes the separate property of the wife by an execution against her husband, is not the representative of the execution creditor, for the purpose of attacking a legal transfer to the wife, unless he produces the judgment upon which the execution was issued. It is well settled that, where an officer is sued for seizing or selling the property of one under an execution against another, he must, in order to show that the transfer of the property by the execution debtor was fraudulent and void as to the execution creditor, prove not only the issuing of the execution, the levy, and that he was a creditor, but also the rendition of a judgment upon his debt, and that the execution was issued upon the judgment. (Bickerstaff v. Doub, 19 Cal. 109; 2 Hilliard on Torts, 544; Ames v. Sturtevant, 2 Allen, 583; Martin v. Padger, 5 Burr. 2633; Lake v. Billers, 1 Raym. Ld. 733.)

It was admitted that the defendant seized the property under color of the execution in his hands. The execution itself showed that it was issued by a justice of the peace of the city and county of San Francisco; but there was no proof that it had been issued on a judgment rendered by him or any other justice. The docket of the justice was given in evidence, but that contained only the following recitals: "No. 2241. A. L. Day v. John Kane, Leman, Justice; suit for $296.81 goods sold. The date of the case, September 16, 1880. September 17th, return served summons; 23d, case called, plaintiff appearing by H. C. Firebaugh and the defendant failing to answer, the plaintiff has default and judgment entered against defendant, $296.81, and $6.50 costs. Signed Walter M. Leman, Justice of the Peace. Dated 23d September, 1880. October 11th, execution issued at request of plaintiff's attorney, returnable in 60 days." These recitals do not show that the justice acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. According to the act concerning the Justices' Court of the city and county of San Francisco, approved April 3, 1876 (Statutes 1875-76, page 855), the summons issued from a Justices' Court had to be served and returned as provided in title v., part ii., of the Code of Civil Procedure; and until served according to the provisions of section 410 of that title the court was not deemed to have acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. There was no appearance by the defendant; the judgment purports to have been rendered by default; and the mere recital in the docket, viz.: "September 17th—Return served summons," affords no proof of the jurisdictional facts necessary to support the judgment—it is of no weight as proof of the proper service of the summons. "The jurisdiction of Justices' Courts being special and limited, the law presumes nothing in favor of their jurisdiction, and a party, who asserts a right under a judgment rendered in such court, must show affirmatively every fact necessary to confer such jurisdiction." (Rowley v. Howard, 23 Cal. 401; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 296; Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321.)

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, RESPONDENT, v. THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, APPELLANT.

TAXATION — ASSESSMENT OF STEAMERS OF RAILROAD CORPORATION. — The steamers used by the Central Pacific Railroad Company in transporting its freight cars across the bay of San Francisco, are not included in the property defined by the tenth section of article 13 of the State Constitution — the franchise, roadway, road-bed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operated in more than one county in the State — and should be assessed by the local assessors, not by the State board of equalization.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

McAllister & Bergin, for Appellant.

Walter H. Levy, for Respondent.

THORNTON, J.—The decision in this case is as follows:—

"First That the assessments mentioned in the complaint in said action were made in due form, and at the proper time, by the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco; and all the forms of law in relation to the assessment of property for taxation in said county have been complied with on the part of said assessor.

"Second—That the defendant is a corporation existing under the laws of the United States, and of this State, and as such is now, and for many years last past has been, the owner of a line of railroad known as the Central Pacific Railroad, extending from a point in the city of San Francisco, in the State of California, to Ogden, in the Territory of Utah; that the length of said road in the city and county of San Francisco is four miles from a point within said city to the eastern shore of the southern arm of the bay of San Francisco; that from said point on the eastern shore of the bay of San Francisco, to a point on the western shore of said bay, where the railway of defendant again commences, is about twelve miles; that across said bay no line of railroad has been constructed; and freight and passengers carried upon said road are taken across said bay upon steam ferry-boats; that, for more than four years last past, the defendant has owned and possessed the two steamers, to wit, the Thoroughfare and Transit, mentioned in plaintiff's complaint; that said steamers now are, and ever have been, respectively, of the burden of one thousand five hundred and sixty-six and one thousand and twelve tons, and are vessels entitled to be and are, and for more than four years last past have been, enrolled and registered in the port and harbor of San Francisco; that upon the decks of said vessels are laid railroad tracks, and the said vessels now are, and for more than four years last past have been, exclusively used for the purpose of transporting the cars of the defendant, and used in operating the said railroad across said bay of San Francisco, from the road of defendant on the eastern shore to the same upon the western shore and for no other purpose.

"And as a conclusion of law, from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant herein for the sum of $1,039.70 and costs.

"And judgment therefor is hereby rendered and directed to be entered."

The sole question presented for decision herein is whether the steamers Thoroughfare and Transit mentioned in the above findings are to be assessed by the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco or by the State board of equalization.

The property to be assessed by the board is defined in the 10th section of article ix. of the Constitution of 1879. It is the franchise, roadway, road-bed, rails, and rolling stock of all railroads operated in more than one county in the State.

All property, other than the above mentioned is to be assessed by the local assessors. Are the steamers above named embraced within the category of property named in the section above referred to? The relation of such steamers to the Central Pacific Railroad Company is set forth in the findings. They are certainly not the franchise of the defendant corporation. They may constitute an element to be taken into the computation to arrive at the value of the franchise of such corporation, but they are not such franchise. It is equally as clear that they are not rails or rolling stock. These words are to be construed according to their ordinary and popular meaning, and we do not think that it would be contended that rails or rolling stock in their ordinary and popular signification include the steamers above mentioned. Are they then embraced within the words roadway or road-bed, in the ordinary and popular acceptance of such words, as applied to railroads? These two words as applied to common roads, ordinarily mean the same thing, but as applied to railroads their meaning is not the same. The road-bed, referred to in section 10, in our judgment, is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests. Such is the definition given by both Worcester and Webster, and we think it correct. The roadway has a more extended signification as applied to railroads. In addition to the part denominated road-bed, the roadway includes whatever space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its road-bed and lay its track. Such space is defined in subdivision 4 of the 17th section and the 20th section of the act "to provide for the incorporation of railroad companies, etc., approved May 20, 1861." (Stats. 1861, p. 607; S. F. & N. P. R. R. Co. v. State Board, 60 Cal. 12.)

With these views of the signification of the words roadway and road-bed, we do not think they include the steamers above named, and therefore, we are of opinion that the assessment of the steamers above mentioned pertained to the local assessor. and was properly made by the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, Re-SPONDENT, v. J. D. FRY, APPELLANT.

TAXATION — STOCKS. — Shares of stock in a corporation, the tangible property of which is situated in another State, and subject to taxation under the laws thereof, such shares being owned by a resident of this State, are taxable here without regard to the taxes thus imposed upon the corporate property. Section 3640 of the Political Code has reference to corporations whose property is situated in this State. The inhibition against double taxation only applies to such taxation by the same State or government.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

W. H. Sears, for Appellant.

Louis H. Sharp, for Respondent.

THORNTON, J.—Action to recover taxes. The assessment, on which this action was brought, was for "mining stocks" (the property was so described in the assessment book or roll), for the fiscal year 1876-77. The case was heard below, and is argued here on the following facts agreed on:—

"That at the time this action was commenced there existed on the assessment roll of personal property for the fiscal year 1876-77, of the city and county of San Francisco, unpaid taxes amounting to one thousand and sixty-two dollars, and accruing interest; that the same have not been paid, and that judgment therefor is claimed against said defendant, and that the following exhibit 'A' relating thereto is a complete and accurate copy of the said assessment roll.

"That the assessment, from which the aforesaid taxes had accrued, had been levied for the said fiscal year on 'mining stocks of certain mining companies incorporated under the laws of, and having their principal offices in, the State of California.

"That the taxes sued upon in this action were assessed and levied upon mining stocks of certain mining corporations, whose entire tangible property was situated in the State of Nevada, and was taxed under the laws of that State, and were wholly paid by the companies for that year."

Exhibit A referred to above shows an assessment of property described as "mining stocks" and valued at fifty thousand dollars.

It is contended that, as the tangible property belonging to the corporations in which the defendant owned shares was situate in and taxed in the State of Nevada, and the taxes paid there by the corporations, it could not be subject to taxation here.

1. It is said that such shares were not subject to taxation in this State, in virtue of the provisions of section 3640 of the Political Code. This section only applies to corporations whose property is situate in this State. The legislature could pass no laws which would operate in the State of Nevada, and it could not be held as law that the legislature of California was engaging in its appropriate work of legislation with regard to property situate in another State.

The presumption relied on in Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, cannot be relied on here. If any of the property, including the franchise of the corporations referred to, had been assessed in this State, it was readily susceptible of proof. It does not appear in the case by any finding or admission that such was the case, and it would be an unheard of proceeding to reverse the judgment of the court below on a disputable presumption, imported into the case in this court, with nothing in the record to justify it. Every intendment must be made to sustain the correctness of the action of the court a qua. Error cannot be presumed. It must be shown by the record, and pointed out by him who avers that it exists.

2. It is further urged that to tax the shares in this State, when the property of the corporations is taxed in the State of Nevada, would be double taxation. But the inhibition of double taxation only applies to such taxation made by the same State or government. There is a double taxation or "duplicate taxtion," as it is styled by Judge Cooley, which is wholly inadmissible under any constitution requiring equality and uniformity in taxation. "By duplicate taxation in this sense," says the learned author above named, "is understood the requirement that one person or any one subject of taxation shall directly contribute twice to the same burden, while other subjects of taxation belonging to the same class are required to contribute but once." (Cooley on Taxation, p. 164.)

It will be seen that, in this State, the shares of the corporation alone are taxed. Its property is not here assessed. Conceding that taxation of the shares and property of a corporation by the State of California would be double taxation, there is here no taxation of that kind.

Very similar to this case is that of Dwight v. Mayor etc. of Boston, 12 Allen, 316. A statute of the State of Massachusetts required that, in assessing the stockholders for their shares in any manufacturing corporation, "there shall first be deducted from the value thereof the value of the machinery and real estate belonging to such corporation." Dwight, a citizen of Boston, had been assessed upon shares of stock owned by him in a manufacturing corporation, established in the State of Maine, without any deduction. He asked for the deduction prescribed by the statute above mentioned from the value of his shares in the Maine corporation, and it was contended that Dwight would be doubly taxed without such deduction. The court refused it, holding that such shares, if owned by a citizen of Massachusetts, were taxable therein at their full value, without the deduction asked; that the statute referred to did not relate to corporations existing in other States. The court said: "The clause in this section of the statute requiring a deduction of the value of machinery and real estate is not to be taken as a general provision, regulating the taxation of all shares in manufacturing corporations wherever the corporations may be situated, but as directly connected with the previous clause, requiring the assessment of the machinery and real estate in the towns where the machinery is situated and employed. That provision can only be applicable to manufacturing corporations established within this commonwealth, as it is only in relation to such corporations that our legislature could so require. As to them, having provided for taxation of a certain part of the capital in the towns in which they were situated, the statute requires a deduction of a like amount from the value of the shares, in order to avoid double taxation in this commonwealth of property wholly taxable here. But our whole system of taxation, as established and practiced, is to disregard the liability of shares in foreign corporations to taxation in the States where they are situated. Thus shares in foreign railroad corporations held by citizens of this State are fully taxed here, and no deduction is made for any taxation to which the corporations are subject in the States where they are situated. So it is in regard to shares held by our citizens in banks, insurance companies, and other moneyed corporations situated in other States. Such shares, when held by our citizens, are here treated as so much personal estate, following the person of the owner, and taxable at their full value in this commonwealth, regardless of what may be the foreign law as to taxation of the capital or any part of it elsewhere." (See State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 323, 324; 18 Am. L. Reg. for 1879, N. S., and cases there cited.)

The above quoted remarks are true of the system of taxation established in this State. Our system of revenue laws is entirely independent of the laws of any other State.

E. W. DEAN, PETITIONER, v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF SANTA BARBARA,
RESPONDENT.

PROBATE PROCEEDINGS — DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION — DISCHARGE OF EXECUTORS.

— A decree of the Probate Court distributing the estate of a deceased person, and also settling the accounts of the executors, and discharging them from further liability, is not void on its face in respect to such discharge, upon the ground that it was premature, and to that extent in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, there being nothing in the decree to show that any part of the estate still remained in the hands of the executors.

1D. — FRAUD — SETTING ASIDE THE DECREE. — After the lapse of six months from the rendition of the decree, it cannot be set aside for fraud on a mere petition under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, even if the provisions of that section are applicable to decrees of the Probate Court. The only remedy is in equity, and a suit must be brought in the manner prescribed by the Code for the commencement of civil actions.

CERTIORARI to the Superior Court of the county of Santa Barbara, to review an order setting aside a decree of the Probate Court in the matter of the estate of H. W. Dean, deceased.

This proceeding was instituted by one of the executors of the last will and testament of the deceased. The order in question was made on a petition filed by the residuary legatee more than four years after the decree was rendered. The additional facts, so far as they bear upon the questions decided, are stated in the opinion of the court.

R. B. Canfield, for Petitioner.

W. C. Stratton, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— On the 13th July, 1876, the petitioner filed his final account and petition for distribution of the estate of H. W. Dean, deceased, of which he was executor; and on the 25th of the same month the Probate Court rendered a decree discharging the executors, releasing their bond and decreeing that the remainder of the estate “be and is hereby wholly set over and distributed to Mrs. H. W. Dean,” etc. The petition of the executor stated “that the real estate and personal property described in the inventory remains on hand,” and, “said estate is now ready for distribution.” The decree allowing the final account and distributing the estate, after reciting that the account “contains a just and full account of all the moneys received and disbursed by said executor from the date of his appointment as such to the said 25th day of July, A. D. 1876,” the day when the decree was entered; “that all necessary vouchers were produced and duly filed herein; that the total amount received by such executor as such is $232.95, and the full amount expended $157.75, leaving a balance of $75.25 in gold coin”; and after other recitals with respect to the payment of debts and of a certain specific legacy, and as to the assumption by the residuary legatee of the payment of executor’s fees, and the consent of the executor to release the estate therefrom, and as to the payment of all other expenses of administration, proceeds: "and it further appearing that the aforesaid final account embraces all the moneys received and paid out by the co-executor Sylvester Trule, and that he has ceased to act as such executor; and further, that said estate is now ready for final distribution, and that said account is entitled to be allowed, and the court having duly considered all the matters aforesaid: It is ordered and declared that the said final account of E. W. Dean, co-executor, etc., be and the same hereby is, in all respects, as the same was rendered and presented for settlement, approved, allowed, and settled, and that both of said executors, E. W. Dean and Sylvester Trule, be and are hereby finally and fully discharged from the further execution of their trust, and their bond fully exonerated, and that the remainder of said estate be and is hereby wholly set over and distributed to said residuary legatee, Mrs. H. W. Dean, otherwise Nellie T. Dean."

Section 1697 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "When the estate has been fully administered, and it is shown by the executor or administrator, by the production of satisfactory vouchers, that he has paid all sums of money due from him, and delivered up, under the order of the court, all the property of the estate to the parties entitled, and performed all the acts lawfully required of him, the court must make a judgment or decree discharging him from all liability to be incurred thereafter."

Until the entry of a judgment or decree discharging the executor, the trust still continues in contemplation of law, and such executor remains clothed with the duty and authority of his office. (McOrea v. Haraszthy, 51 Cal. 151; Dohs v. Dohs, 60 Cal. 255.)

It may be admitted, for the purposes of this decision merely, that if it appeared from the decree that it had not been shown to the Probate Court "by satisfactory vouchers" that the executor "had paid all sums due from him," or had not been shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that he had delivered up all property of the estate to the persons entitled, etc., the decree in so far as it attempts to "discharge" the executors would be void, because in excess of the jurisdiction; and, being void, that the court, of its own motion, or on motion of any party in interest, would be authorized to set aside or strike from its records such invalid portion of the decree.

But, inasmuch as the statute does not require that the judgment or decree shall contain copies of the vouchers mentioned in section 1697, or recite the evidence which shall satisfy the court that the executor has delivered all the property of the estate, the judgment discharging the executor, upon any construction of the section of the Code, is not void on its face unless it affirmatively appears therefrom that it was shown to the court that the executor had not complied with the prerequisites to the judgment.

It may be said that every portion of the decree before us which took effect at all, took effect at the same moment of time, and therefore it appears that the order discharging the executors was premature; that we cannot divide the decree and hold that, perhaps, the account was approved, the order of distribution made, the distribution made in fact, and afterwards satisfactory vouchers and evidence were produced by the executor, and then an order made discharging him.

But the section of the Code does not provide that the discharge can only be made after the decree of distribution, but after the estate has been fully administered. It may be admitted there must be an order of distribution to support the judgment of discharge, but may not the two take effect contemporaneously? In anticipation of the approval of his account, and of a decree of distribution, the executor may have paid the $75.25 to the residuary legatee, or arranged with her for its application upon the executor's fees which she was to pay. As to the real estate, if she was already in actual possession of it, it was only necessary to show that fact to the court. The decree does not recite in terms that the $75.25 is "in the hands" of the executor, but that, deducting from the moneys received by the executors the amount of the sums by him paid out, there remains a balance of $75.25. Nor do we attach so much consequence as does respondent to the words in the decree, "it further appearing . . . that said estate is now ready for final distribution." It would be equally ready for the decree of distribution — for the action of the court, which would give legal effect to the distribution — whether the property had or had not previously been actually delivered by the executor to the parties who should be determined by such decree to be entitled to it. It may be that it was made to appear to the Probate Court that the money had been paid or the property in fact distributed, in the manner in which the decree provided that it should be distributed. If so, there is no reason why the decree of distribution and discharge should not take effect contemporaneously. We cannot say that the judgment itself shows that the portion of it discharging the executor is void.

Due notice was given of the hearing of the application of the executor for a settlement of his final account and for a distribution of the estate. The notice recites, that, the executor "having filed in this court his final account and petition for distribution of the estate of said deceased," the hearing of the same had been fixed by the court for a certain day and place, and proceeds: "All persons interested in said estate are notified then and there to appear and show cause, if any they have, why the said account should not be allowed and petition granted." This certainly notified all persons interested that the account to be acted upon was the "final account" of the executor.

From the judgment or order, as a judgment or order settling the final account of the executor and directing distribution of the estate, an appeal lay to this court.

The petition to set aside the judgment or order was filed in the Superior, as successor of the Probate, Court, several years after the same was entered, long after the period had elapsed within which the appeal could have been taken, and long after the expiration of the six months mentioned in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The prayer that the judgment or order be set aside and annulled is based upon allegations in the petition of false representations and of fraudulent practices, on the part of the executor, by which the court was induced to approve the account and decree distribution.

If section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure was applicable to judgments rendered by the late Probate Court, and a judgment induced by the fraudulent practices alleged in the petition is one which may be relieved against, as one taken against the residuary legatee through her "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," the application to the successor of the court which had rendered the judgment came too late — more than six months of time having expired, it was too late to ask relief on motion. If section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to judgments or proceedings of the late Probate Court the judgment or order became final in that court, subject only to appeal, when it was entered.

If the judgment or order was obtained by the employment of frauds or artifices such as would justify a court of equity in annulling it (upon which it is unnecessary to express an opinion), the remedy of the party aggrieved was by independent action in equity, and the issuing and service of summons thereon. The matter had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the Superior Court as a court of probate.

The order on the 5th day of September, 1881, vacating and setting aside the judgment or order of the 25th day of July, 1876, approving and settling the final account of the executor, and distributing the remainder of the estate and discharging the executors is hereby annulled.

ORDER REFUSING TO STRIKE OUT PARTS OF A PLEADING — HOW REVIEWED. —

Such an order may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, but the motion and order must be incorporated in a statement or bill of exceptions.

APPEAL from a judgment of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District, and from an order dismissing a motion for a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

W. H. Allen, for Appellant.

G. F. & W. H. Sharp, and E. G. Knapp, for Respondents.

This court will not review the order of the court below dismissing and denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial in the absence of a statement settled by the judge. (Hoadley v. Crow, 22 Cal. 265; Wetherbee v. Carroll, 33 Cal. 549, 555.)

The order denying plaintiff's motion to strike out portions of the answer will not be reviewed without a bill of exceptions. (40 Cal. 236; 41 Cal. 437; 43 Cal. 180; 31 Cal. 238; 28 Cal. 295.)

McKEE, J.—Judgment was given and entered for the defendants in this case on November 14, 1879. Within ten days after the entry of the same the plaintiff gave notice of his intention to move for a new trial upon the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and errors of law occurring at the trial. The notice designated that the motion would be heard on "a proposed statement to be served with the notice." It appears that a statement was settled December 31, 1879; but the plaintiff, claiming that the settlement had not been made according to law, gave notice of a motion based on an affidavit, for a resettlement of the statement. That motion was heard and denied. Meanwhile the defendants gave notice of a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's motion for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the court had settled the statement and ordered it to be engrossed by the plaintiff, as the moving party, and that he had wilfully disobeyed the order. This motion was heard and granted; and from the order of dismissal and the judgment the plaintiff appeals.

In the transcript there is no bill of exceptions, no statement on appeal, and no papers identifiable as the papers used on the hearing of the motion to dismiss. That being the condition of the record, the validity and regularity of the order of dismissal is not reviewable on appeal. The presumption is that the order was properly made, and in the absence of a bill of exceptions or statement on appeal making the motion and order part of the record of the case, that presumption is conclusive. (Nash v. Harris, 57 Cal. 242.)

On the appeal from the judgment the errors assigned are: "That the court denied a motion made by the plaintiff to strike out parts of the defendants' answer, and also overruled a de-murrer to the answer." But the motion and order denying the motion are no part of the judgment roll, and, as the appellant has not made them part of the record by bill of exceptions or statement on appeal, the ruling of the court is not reviewable on an appeal on the judgment roll. (Abbott v. Douglass, 28 Cal. 295; Douglas v. Dakin, 46 Cal. 49.)

The demurrer and order thereon are parts of the judgment roll; but we see no prejudicial error in overruling the demurrer. The several defenses as pleaded were sufficient to sustain the judgment.

APPELLANT.

CRIMINAL LAW — EVIDENCE — PREPONDERANCE — REASONABLE DOUBT. — The truth or falsity of the testimony of a witness, on which depends in part the defendant's guilt, is to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances bearing upon the question, and a fact tending to prove the one or the other need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt; a preponderance of evidence is sufficient.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Butte County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

Reardan & Freer, for Appellant.

PER CURIAM.—A conviction of perjury. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The perjury was alleged to have been committed on the trial of one Taylor for the crime of arson.

The bill of exceptions sets forth that at the trial of this information Taylor, being on the stand as a witness, was shown certain letters which tended, in some degree, to show that the testimony of the present defendant, at the trial of Taylor on the charge of arson (and which is charged in the information to have been false and perjured) was true; that the witness Taylor denied having written the same. That the present defendant then called an expert, who gave testimony tending to prove that the letters were written by Taylor.

The court charged the jury: "The question whether Taylor is the author of these letters is a question of fact, to be determined by you from the evidence in the case bearing upon that question; and in order to find that Taylor is the author of these letters you must be entirely satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, from the testimony adduced before you in this case."

Taylor, as a witness, on the trial of the alleged perjury, had also testified that "he had nothing to do and had no connection with setting fire to any barn in connection with defendant herein, or any other person." The false testimony alleged in the information to have been given by the present defendant, was to the effect that he and Taylor and a third person together committed the arson. The bill of exceptions before us recites that the letters referred to tended to show that the defendant here testified truly at the arson trial; they therefore tended to prove that Taylor testified falsely at the trial for perjury, and were material evidence.

The court, therefore, charged, in effect, that a fact material to his defense must be proved by defendant "beyond reasonable doubt."

Taylor was not the defendant on trial for perjury. He was a witness, and the truth or falsity of his testimony, upon which depended in part the defendant's guilt of perjury, was to be determined by the jury from all circumstances bearing upon that question. A fact tending to prove that he testified falsely on the trial of this case, and that the present defendant testified truly at the former trial, needed to be proved only by a preponderance of evidence.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

THE PEOPLE, RESPONDENT, v. EZRA THOMAS,
APPELLANT.

CRIMINAL LAW — ATTEMPT TO SUBORN PERJURY — INFORMATION. — "Attempting to suborn perjury" is not the generic name of any class of offenses, and where an information charges such an offense in those terms, without anything more, except that the defendant endeavored to procure another person to swear falsely and commit perjury in a specified suit, it is insufficient.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Shasta County, and from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment.

The information is as follows:— Ezra Thomas is accused by the district attorney for the county of Shasta, State of California, by this information, of the crime of attempting to suborn perjury committed as follows: The said Ezra Thomas, on or about the 21st day of October, 1882, at and in the county of Shasta, and State of California, and prior to the filing of this information, then and there being, then and there did wilfully, deliberately, and feloniously attempt and endeavor to procure another person, to wit, one Lee Thomas, to swear and testify falsely, and commit the crime of perjury in a certain law suit then and there pending in a Justices' Court of township No. 5, in and for said county of Shasta, and before one James P. Smith, a justice of the peace, wherein said Ezra Thomas was plaintiff, and John J. Kern et al. were defendants, all of which is contrary, etc.

Hart & White, for Appellant, cited Penal Code, § 951; People v. St. Clair, 55 Cal. 524; 1 Wharton Cr. Law (7th ed.), 374; 2 Wharton Cr. Law (7th ed.), 2705; State v. Loftin, 2 Dev. & B. 31; Penal Code, §§ 966, 118; Archibald Cr. Pr. & Pl. 592; 2 Wharton Cr. Law (7th ed.), 2233-2265.

Attorney-General, for Respondent, cited 39 Cal. 690; 5 Met. 241.

PER CURIAM.—The demurrer to the information should have been sustained. The information neither gives the legal appellation of any crime, nor states facts necessarily constituting a crime. "Attempting to suborn perjury" is not the generic name of any class of offenses. There is nothing stated to indicate that the act of defendant would have resulted in a subornation of a witness if it had not been frustrated by extraneous circumstances (1 Wharton's Cr. L. 181); or that the testimony which defendant tried to have given was material to the issue; or that he did not believe it to be true, or, indeed, what was the testimony he asked any person to give.

Judgment and order reversed with direction to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the information.

MARY ANN WOLFORD AND ELLEN WOLFORD,
RESPONDENTS, v. THE LYON GRAVEL GOLD MIN-ING COMPANY, APPELLANT.

DAMAGES — NEW TRIAL. — In an action for negligence resulting in the death of a human being — nothing appearing to justify merely nominal damages — a verdict assessing the damages at one dollar may be set aside as inadequate, and a new trial granted.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of El Dorado County granting a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

G. G. Blanchard, and Charles F. Irwin, for Appellant.

The court will not impute to the jury improper motives merely from the smallness of their verdict. (12 Pick. 547.)

There should have been a statement containing the evidence before the court could determine that the jury had acted improperly. (2 Bay, 446; 7 Ga. 200.)

Dibble & Kitts, M. P. Bennett, and G. J. Carpenter, for Respondents.

There was no necessity for a statement. (Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 111; Lewis v. Kelton, 58 Cal. 303.)

Having determined the liability of the defendant, the jury disregarded the instructions and evidence in relation to the damages, and the court properly set aside the verdict. (Sweeney v. C. P. R. R. Co. 57 Cal. 15; Emerson v. County of Santa Clara, 40 Cal. 544; Mariani v. Dougherty, 46 Cal. 26.)

MYRIOK, J.—The question involved in this case is of easy solution. The action was brought to recover damages for negligence on the part of defendant, by which, it is alleged, the husband of the plaintiff Ellen lost his life. It was admitted by the pleadings that the deceased had during their married life supported himself and his wife comfortably, solely by his labor, that by his death she was deprived of that support, and that he was sober and industrious. It was in evidence that the deceased was twenty-five years of age, with an expectation of thirty-six years longer, was careful and prudent, had been foreman in mines, and that the average pay of foreman was about one hundred dollars per month. No evidence on the issue of damages was offered by the defendant. The issues in the case involved the question of negligence on the part of the defendant, and of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased.

The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff of one dollar. This verdict was set aside and a new trial granted. Upon what theory of facts this verdict was arrived at, or upon what theory of law it can be sustained, we cannot perceive. Its only possible excuse is the statement of the court, in reply to inquiry by the jury, that if the jury agreed upon a verdict for plaintiffs they could assess the damages at any sum between one cent and fifty thousand dollars. If the defendant was not responsible for the death of the deceased, the verdict should have been in its favor; if it was responsible (and the jury by the verdict said it was), it being admitted that the wife was by the death of her husband deprived of maintenance by him, to say that such deprivation is compensated by a verdict of one dollar is grossly absurd. The statute is, that the jury shall, in such case, render a verdict for such sum as, under all the circumstances, shall be just. (Civ. Code, § 377; Beeson v. Green Mountain G. M. Co. 57 Cal. 20; Cook v. Clay Street Hill R. R. Co. 60 Cal. 604.) The plaintiffs are entitled to have the case tried before a jury having a proper conception of what is just; either to render a verdict for the defendant, or, if the evidence shall justify, in favor of plaintiffs, with damages in a sum reasonably adequate to the case as presented to them. The rendition of the verdict in this case was trifling with the forms of law. (Hall v. Bark Emily Banning, 33 Cal. 522.)

The order is affirmed.

THORNTON, J., and SHARPSTEIN, J., concurred; the latter on the authority of Hall v. Bark Emily Banning, cited in the opinion.

THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
APPELLANT, v. SOPHIA G. TALBOT, EXRX., ETC. ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

VESSELS — TAXATION. — A vessel registered out of the State, and never here except transiently in the course of her voyages for the purpose of receiving and discharging cargo, is not subject to assessment for taxes within the State. In such a case it makes no difference that the vessel is owned in part by residents of the State.

ASSESSMENT — NOT A JUDICIAL ACT. — The assessor does not act judicially in making an assessment for taxes.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE SHARPSTEIN.

John P. Bell, and Louis Sharp, for Appellant.

The acts of the assessor in making an assessment are judicial. (Cooley on Taxation, 288, 550–552; Burroughs on Taxation, §§ 202, 238, 242.)

Vessels are assessable and taxable where owned, and not where registered. The situs or home port for the purpose of taxation is where the vessel is owned. (U. S. Rev. Stats. § 4141; Jennings v. Griffith, Ryan & M. 42; Thomas v. The Steamboat Kosciusko, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 44; Abbott on Shipping, 39–115; 3 Kent's Com. 144; Hill v. Golden Gate, Newb.

Adm. 308; St. Louis v. Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 423; In re Mary Bell, 1 Sawy. 135; The Albany, 4 Dill. 439; The Plymouth Rock, 13 Blatchf. 505.)

McAllister & Bergin, for Respondent.

Property transiently in the State is not subject to State taxation. (Mayor v. Baldwin, 57 Ala. 69; People v. Niles, 35 Cal. 287; City of Oakland v. Whipple, 39 Cal. 115; Hays v. P. M. S. S. Co. 17 How. 596; St. Louis v. Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 423; People v. Home Ins. Co. 29 Cal. 542.)

The home port of vessels determines the locality of their taxation, and the court found that the vessel never was in California, save transiently. (Hays v. P. M. S. S. Co. 17 How. 596; People v. Com. of Taxes, 58 N. Y. 246; Burroughs on Taxation, § 46.)

In answer to appellant's point that the acts of the assessor in making the assessment are judicial and his decision final unless reviewed in the manner provided by statute, respondent's counsel cited Middletown v. Low, 30 Cal. 607; Low v. Austin, 13 Wall. 34; P. M. S. S. Co. v. Bd. of Sup. 50 Cal. 282.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—This action was brought to recover taxes assessed and levied upon the Bark Buena Vista for the fiscal year 1875-76.

The findings are in substance: 1. That at the time of said levy and assessment, and for a long time prior thereto, said vessel was registered at Port Townsend in Washington Territory, where the ship's husband resided, and that said vessel has been taxed in said Territory during all the times mentioned in the complaint herein. 2. That said vessel sailed out of said Port Townsend to various ports and countries in the regular course of commerce, transporting lumber and other freight, and was in the State of California only transiently in the course of its voyages, and only remained therein long enough to take in and discharge cargo, and was never permanently or at all in said State otherwise than as above stated.

It further appears by stipulation of counsel of the respective parties that said vessel was owned in the proportions of nine tenths by Pope & Talbot, who resided in San Francisco, and one tenth by one Walker, a resident of Washington Territory, who as the managing owner registered said vessel at said Port Townsend. It was admitted at the trial that said vessel had never been registered at San Francisco. Upon these facts the question whether said vessel was assessable at San Francisco for city and county and State taxes, must be determined.

According to the Code, vessels which are by law required to be registered must be assessed only in the county or city and county where registered. (Pol. Code, § 3644.) And vessels registered "out of and plying in whole or in part in the waters of this State, the owners of which reside in this State, must be assessed in this State." (Pol. Code, § 3645.)

There are two conditions which must exist concurrently before a vessel registered out of this State is required by said Code to be assessed in this State: (1) she must ply in whole or in part in the waters of this State; (2) her owners must reside in this State. "Plying," when used in connection that it is here, is a nautical phrase, which is defined by Webster as follows: "To make regular trips; as a vessel plies between the two places." It might well be urged that a vessel making regular trips between any port in California and some port outside of California, was "plying in part in the waters of this State." But can that be properly said of a vessel which sails out of a port outside of this State "to various ports and countries in the regular course of commerce, transporting lumber and other freight," and touching at the port of San Francisco transiently in the course of her voyages, and "only long enough to take in and discharge cargo?"

"Plying" implies regularity, and is not the term used to express the character of the irregular and transient visitations of a ship to a port in the course of her voyage to various ports. In that case a vessel is said to touch at each of the ports which she visits. A vessel plies between two places—she may touch at many. But even if "plying in whole or in part in the waters of this State," a vessel registered out of it is not, by the Code, required to be assessed and taxed in it, unless her owners reside here. Two of her owners do. Another, the managing owner, or the ship's husband, resides in Washington Territory, within the district in which the custom house at which she is registered is situated, and in which she is taxed and her taxes paid by her owners. A part of her owners, not all of them, reside here. To say that her owners reside here is no more correct than it would be to say that her owner resides in Washington Territory. She is partly owned here, and partly there; and the law does not in terms authorize the assessment here of a vessel registered and partly owned elsewhere.

There is no provision for the assessment of the interest owned here. Nothing less than the entire vessel is assessable, if she be assessable at all. And the assessor seems to have taken this view of it, for he assessed the vessel and not any interest in it less than the whole.

The Code does not in terms as we construe it require that a vessel, registered and owned as this one is found to be, and touching at a port in this State for the purpose of taking in and discharging cargo only, shall be assessed in this State.

And it only remains to be determined whether the Constitution of the State requires that said vessel should be assessed in this State. The constitutional requirement is that "all property in the State, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value." As is well understood, this does not mean that all property which may chance to be temporarily in the State, must be taxed. It means "in the State" in the sense of having its situs here. There is at all times "property in this State" of great value which is being transported through it, from one foreign state to another, which no one would claim could be taxed here. Nor will it be claimed that vessels wholly owned and registered elsewhere, and merely touching at a port in this State for the sole purpose of taking in and discharging cargo, could be taxed here.

In Hays v. The P. M. S. S. Co. 17 How. 596, the ships which it was attempted to assess in this State, were engaged in the business of transporting passengers between New York and San Francisco and each of said ships frequently remained in this State ten or twelve days continuously. The court said: "We are satisfied that the State of California had no jurisdiction over these vessels for the purpose of taxation; they were not properly abiding within its limits, so as to become incorporated with the other personal property of the State; they were but temporarily, engaged in lawful trade and commerce, with their situs at the home port, where the vessels belonged, and where the owners were liable to be taxed for the capital invested, and where the taxes had been paid."

In that case the owners all resided in New York, where the ships were registered. But that is an immaterial circumstance, because the right to assess and tax property in this State does not depend on the residence of the owner. It depends wholly upon the situs of the property. And property which has its situs outside of the jurisdiction of this State cannot be assessed and taxed here, although the owner may reside here.

In this case, as was said by Mr. Justice Campbell in his concurring opinion in Hays v. P. M. S. S. Co. supra, "The material fact is that the vessel was in transitu, having no situs in California, nor permanent connection with its internal commerce."

It has too often been held that the acts of an assessor in making an assessment are not judicial, to require any consideration of that point at this time.

Judgment and order affirmed.

McKINSTRY, J., concurred.

ROSS, J.— I concur for the reasons first and last stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE SHARPSTEIN.

MYRICK, McKEE, and THORNTON, JJ.— We concur in the judgment. The vessel was not plying in whole or in part in the waters of this State. If the vessel had been so plying doubtless the interest of Pope & Talbot therein could have been assessed; but the facts as agreed upon do not place the vessel or the interest of Pope & Talbot within section 3645, Political Code.

Rehearing denied.

A. H. CHAPMAN ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. GEORGE STONEMAN, GOVERNOR, ETC., RESPONDENT.

PROHIBITION — POWER OF THE GOVERNOR TO INVESTIGATE THE CONDUCT OF PRISON DIRECTORS. — Under section one of article ten of the Constitution of the State, the governor has authority and jurisdiction to make an investigation into the conduct of the State board of prison directors with a view of removing them from office, and prohibition will not lie to arrest such an investigation.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition. The attorney-general on behalf of the people, filed with the governor specific charges of misconduct and neglect of duty on the part of the petitioners, composing the State board of prison directors, and asked their removal from office. The governor was proceeding to hear and determine the matter by a course of procedure similar to that provided for the trial of causes before the courts, and, after demurring to the charges on the ground of want of jurisdiction, the petitioners applied for a writ prohibiting the governor from proceeding further with the investigation.

C. B. Darwin, Wm. H. Sears, and A. L. Hart, for Petitioners.

Attorney-General Marshall, and George Flourney, for Respondent.

MYRICK, J.— This is an application for a writ prohibiting the governor of the State from proceeding with an investigation under the last clause of section 1, article x., of the Constitution.

We are of opinion that under the clause referred to the governor has authority and jurisdiction to proceed with the investigation sought to be arrested.

Application denied.

THORNTON, J., ROSS, J., and MCKINSTRY, J., concurred.

SHARPSTEIN, J.— I do not think that the proceedings which it is sought to have arrested are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of the governor, and I therefore concur in the denial of the writ of prohibition.

EX PARTE BAYARD V. RAYE.

CRIMINAL LAW — HABEAS CORPUS — SENTENCE — ENTRY OF JUDGMENT. — The petitioner was convicted in the Police Court of the city of Sacramento of the offense of "attempted extortion." He was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for six months, and an entry was at once made in the minute or memorandum book kept by the clerk of the court, which showed the offense of which he was convicted, and the sentence of the court. The formal judgment was not entered on the judgment docket for more than twenty days thereafter. Held, on habeas corpus, that the defendant was not entitled to be discharged.

APPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Hall & Alexander, for Petitioner.

McKEE, J.—From the return to the writ in this case, it appears that the prisoner was arrested, tried, and convicted in the Police Court of the city of Sacramento for the offense of "attempted extortion." Section 524 of the Penal Code declares that "every person who unsuccessfully attempts, by means of any verbal threat, such as is specified in section 519, to extort money or other property from another, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The offense with which the defendant in the case was charged was therefore one known to the law; it was a misdemeanor; and the court, having acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, had jurisdiction of the case. So that the only question with which we have to deal is, whether, in the proceeding which resulted in the conviction and sentence of the defendant, the court kept within its jurisdiction.

Substantially the forms of law were complied with. The record shows that the defendant was properly charged with the commission of a public offense, that upon conviction the court, pursuant to section 1449 of the Penal Code, fixed February 6, 1883, as the time for pronouncing judgment, that on that day the defendant, being present with his attorney, moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, both of which were denied, and that the court "sentenced him to imprisonment for six months in the county jail."

The sentence was immediately entered in the minute or memorandum book, kept by the clerk of the court, from which a more formal judgment was afterward entered on the docket of the court. It is true the formal judgment was not entered on the judgment docket until the 26th of February, 1883, more than twenty days after the trial and conviction. But as the sentence which was entered on the minutes of the court on February 6, 1883, showed the offense of which the defendant had been convicted and the penalty imposed, it was, as a judgment, legally sufficient. It was not necessary that the entry of it on the minutes should recite the facts contained in the other papers constituting the record in the action. (In re Ring, 28 Cal. 248; Ex parte Murray, 43 Cal. 455; People v. Forbes, 22 Cal. 135.) It was sufficient that that was done subsequently, in the performance of the clerical duty of entering the judgment upon the docket. At any rate, the judgment pronounced on the 6th of February was not void. It showed that the defendant had been tried and convicted of an offense known to the law; namely, attempted extortion; and that the sentence passed on him was one which the court had jurisdiction to pronounce. (Ex parte Gibson, 31 Cal. 620.) And assuming that the judgment may have been voidable for want of adherence to some prescribed form of proceeding in the case, yet that was a matter reviewable only by appeal. Although erroneous, imprisonment under it would not be unlawful. It is only where the proceedings of an inferior court are void, either for want of jurisdiction or other cause, that imprisonment under a judgment rendered in them becomes unlawful and entitles a prisoner to be discharged on habeas corpus.

Writ dismissed and prisoner remanded.

THORNTON, J., and MYRICK, J., concurred.

ROSS, J.—I concur in the judgment. The entry made in the minutes of the Police Court on the 6th of February showed the offense of which the petitioner was convicted and the sentence of the court; and that was sufficient to constitute a valid judgment.

JOHN B. BOYD, RESPONDENT, v. O. M. SLAYBACK
ET AL., APPELLANTS.

EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTION — DEED. — No legal presumption of the delivery of a deed arises from the signing and acknowledgment. The party claiming under it must prove its delivery.

APPEAL. — The manner of this appeal disapproved.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Diego County.

The action was brought against Robert Taggart, a minor, and against O. M. Slayback, as administrator of the estate of Mary B. Taggart, and as guardian of Robert Taggart, to quiet title to certain lands alleged to have been sold to the plaintiff by Mary B. Taggart. The plaintiff alleged that some time subsequent to the execution and delivery of the deeds to him, by which the lands were conveyed, they were left at the residence of Mrs. Taggart in a tin box, and that after her death it was discovered that the deeds had been abstracted. The defendant denied the execution and delivery. The deeds were not recorded.

The other facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Chase, Arnold & Hunsacker, and Graves & Chapman, for Appellants.

Brunson & Wells, M. A. Luce, and Will M. Smith, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — We cannot approve of the manner of this appeal. It is from a judgment of the 29th of June, 1882, and the notice of appeal is dated the twenty-eighth of June, 1882. To the proposed bill of exceptions, signed by attorneys for defendants, is subjoined: "Plaintiff also asks that the foregoing amendments be considered and allowed by the court." (Signed by plaintiff's attorneys.) Immediately below the signatures of plaintiff's attorneys follows a certificate of the judge as follows: "The foregoing amendments are allowed, and the proposed statement of defendants, as so amended, is hereby settled as correct." Respondent has not objected, however, that the statement, as amended, does not appear to have been engrossed, nor that the "amendments" proposed and allowed have not been brought here.

We may add, there is nothing in the record, except her own admission, to show that O. M. Slayback was the guardian of the infant defendant, and nothing to show that the infant was ever served with summons.

The judgment must be reversed for error in the charge to the jury. The court below charged: "A grant, duly executed, is presumed to have been delivered; therefore, if you find from the evidence that Mrs. Taggart actually signed and acknowledged the deeds in question, the law will presume that they were duly delivered, and in order to defeat this presumption, the party disputing the delivery must show, by preponderance of proof, that there was no delivery."

This was error. A deed takes effect only from the time of its delivery. Without delivery of a deed it is void. No title will pass without delivery. (23 Cal. 528; 30 Cal. 208; 32 Cal. 610.) It is for the party claiming under a deed to prove its delivery. Sometimes slight evidence will be sufficient to support a finding of delivery, but no legal presumption of delivery arises from the mere fact that the instrument is "signed." The acknowledgment only proves that it was signed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

CHARLES H. MERRILL, APPELLANT, v. ISAAH HURLBURT, RESPONDENT.

FRAUDULENT TRANSFER — VOID AS AGAINST ASSIGNEE IN INSOLVENCY. — A transfer of personal property without an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession is void as against an assignee in insolvency of the vendor.

ID. — DELIVERY AND CONTINUED CHANGE OF POSSESSION. — The property purchased consisted of loose hay stored in a barn owned by the vendor. The plaintiff examined the hay at the time of the sale, and there was a verbal delivery. A keeper was left in charge of the hay. A portion of it was subsequently removed, but the part in controversy remained in the barn until it was attached by a creditor of the vendor. The period between the sale and attachment was about three months. The barn continued in the possession and under the control of the vendor. The court below found that there was not an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession. Held, that the finding was justified by the evidence.

PRACTICE ON APPEAL—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT—DE MINIMIS.—The evidence showed that the value of the property replevied did not exceed three hundred and sixty dollars, but the court found the value to be three hundred and seventy-five dollars. Held, that the judgment cannot be modified here so as to conform to the evidence, for it would then have no finding to support it; and further, that considering the amount involved the judgment ought not to be affirmed upon the maxim de minimis, etc.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Colusa, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action is replevin. The property in suit, alleged to be twenty-five tons of hay, more or less, was attached by a creditor of N. S. Merrill, brother of the plaintiff, but subsequently delivered by the sheriff to the defendant Hurlburt as assignee in insolvency of N. S. Merrill. The plaintiff claimed the property by virtue of a sale to him prior to Merrill's insolvency. The sale was attacked on the ground that there had been no delivery of the property with a continued change of possession. The plaintiff's testimony, the only evidence respecting the delivery and continued change of possession, showed that he had bought and paid for the property, and carried a portion of it away, but left the remainder in the vendor's barn, where it remained until it was attached. The hay was loose, in one body, in the barn. The plaintiff placed a man in charge of the property, but the barn continued in the possession and under the control of Merrill the vendor.

John T. Harrington, for Appellant, contended (1) that the finding of the court that there was not an immediate delivery, and actual and continued change of possession was not sustained by the evidence. That the rule, as established by the adjudicated cases, requires no more than that the purchaser must have that possession which places him in that relation to the property which owners usually have to the like kind of property. (Citing Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 472; Lay v. Neville, 25 Cal. 546; Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 507; Cartwright v. Phoenix, 7 Cal. 281; Toquini v. Kyle, The Reporter, vol. 15, p. 20.) (2) That the sale being valid between the parties, it is valid as against the defendant—the assignee in insolvency of the vendor (Citing Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731; Donaldson v. Farwell, 98 U. S. 631; Dugan v. Nichols, 125 Mass. 43.) (3) That the finding that the value of the property is three hundred and seventy-five dollars is not supported by the evidence.

H. M. Albery, for Respondent, argued (1), That the evidence sustaining the finding as to the delivery and change of possession, and cited Lawrence v. Burnham, 4 Nev. 361; Allen v. Massey, 17 Wall. 351; Hesthal v. Myles, 53 Cal. 623; Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 403; Gray v. Corey, 48 Cal. 208; Regli v. McClure, 47 Cal. 612; Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 467; Weil v. Paul, 22 Cal. 494; Malone v. Plato, 22 Cal. 104; Engles v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 321; Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503; Bacon v. Scannell, 9 Cal. 272; Civil Code, § 3440. (2), That the assignee in insolvency comes within the class of persons as against whom such sales are void as defined by § 3440 of the Civil Code. Citing in support of the principle, Allen v. Massey, 1 Dill. 40; Kane v. Rice, 10 Bank. Reg. 469; Cragin v. Carmichael, 2 Dill. 519; In re Wynne, 4 Bank. Reg. 23; Bradshaw v. Klein, 1 Bank. Reg. 542; In re Metzger, 2 Bank. Reg. 355; Boone v. Hall, 7 Bush, 66; Pratt v. Curtis, 6 Bank. Reg. 139; Edmonston v. Hyde, 7 Bank. Reg. 1; In re Perrin, 7 Bank. Reg. 283; and (3), that notwithstanding the evidence does not show that the value of the property is beyond three hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty cents, the judgment should be modified and affirmed.

PER CURIAM.—Section 3440 of the Civil Code reads:—

“Every transfer of personal property, other than a thing in action, or a ship or cargo at sea, or in a foreign port, and every lien thereon, other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, and a contract of bottomry or respondentia, is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors, and against any persons on whom his estate devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself, and against purchasers or encumbrancers in good faith subsequent to the transfer."

The assignee in insolvency of the vendor was "a successor in interest" of his creditors, and also one "on whom his estate devolved in trust for the benefit of others than himself."

There was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court that there was not an immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession of the property.

But the finding that the value of the property described in the complaint is three hundred and seventy-five dollars is not sustained by the evidence. It is admitted by respondent that the undisputed evidence proved there were from twenty-three to twenty-four tons of hay, of the value of fifteen dollars a ton. If the judgment was, in case a return of the property could not be had, that defendant should have judgment for a greater sum than the court found the value to be, we could modify the judgment here, so as to make it accord with the findings. But the judgment must be based upon the findings, and we cannot change the judgment in such manner as that it shall not be supported by the findings. Considering the amount involved in the action we cannot say we ought to affirm the judgment upon the maxim de minimis, etc.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAM H. HOLMES, APPELLANT, v. J. S. McCLEARY, DEFENDANT.

APPEALABLE ORDER.—An order denying a motion to vacate an order denying a previous motion, and for a new trial as to the latter motion, is not an appealable order.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of San Diego County denying a motion for an order on the sheriff directing the application of the proceeds of a sale of attached property, and from an order refusing a new trial of such motion.

On September 13th the sheriff attached the property of the defendant McCleary, in an action against him by one Valentine. The following day he levied another attachment on the same property, in an action by the appellant, "subject to a prior levy in favor of Valentine." The property was subsequently sold, and the proceeds being insufficient to pay more than Valentine's claim, the appellant moved the court to direct the sheriff to apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of his claim, on the ground that the attachment was void. The court denied the motion, and the appellant moved for a new trial, which was refused.

John R. Jones, for Appellant.

M. A. Luce, for Sheriff.

PER CURIAM.—The notice of appeal is as follows:—

"You will please take notice that the plaintiff in the above entitled action hereby appeals to the Supreme Court of the State from the judgment or order denying plaintiff's motion for an order on Joseph Coyne, sheriff, directing him to apply the proceeds of the property herein attached by him to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment and costs therein, and entered in the said Superior Court, on the 30th day of October, 1882, in favor of said Joseph Coyne, sheriff, and against said plaintiff, and from the whole thereof. And also from the order denying said plaintiff's motion for a new trial, made and entered in the minutes of said court the 27th day of November, 1882."

The order of the 27th of November was not appealable, and the "statement" on motion for new trial cannot be considered here.

There remains only the notice of motion for, and the order of, October 30th, from which no error appears.

Order affirmed.

E. E. FREEMAN, APPELLANT, v. J. O. STEPHENSON,
RESPONDENT.

FINDING—SPECIAL ISSUES.—In an equity case where the court has submitted special issues to a jury, and finds upon the same issues differently from the jury, the finding of the court determines the fact.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to enjoin the defendant from draining his lands in such a manner as to discharge the water on the lands of plaintiff, and for damages caused plaintiff thereby. Specific issues were submitted to a jury and findings were made by them. The court found differently upon the same issues.

The answers to the questions asked Moore and Ricketts tended to show that the acts complained of by the plaintiff produced benefits rather than injuries.

A. C. Freeman, and G. E. Bates, for Appellant.

A. P. Catlin, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—There was no error in overruling the objections to the questions put to the witnesses Moore and Ricketts. Both questions had a bearing upon the matter of damages.

In an equity case, where the court has taken the advice of a jury as to specific issues, and then, as here, finds on the same issues differently from the jury, the finding of the court determines the fact.

The findings show that by reason of drains on his own land, connecting natural depressions, the water which naturally runs from defendant's to plaintiff's land was somewhat increased in quantity, and flowed with a somewhat accelerated current, but that such drains did not cause any greater quantity of water to stand or remain on plaintiff's land than would have stood or remained had such drains not existed, and that the same had not caused any damage to plaintiff.

Judgment and order affirmed.

HENRY WATKINS, APPELLANT, v. E. DEGENER ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

VENUE — RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANT. — Where the action is not one of those mentioned in sections 392, 393 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the defendant resides without the county where it has been commenced, it is the right of the defendant to have the place of trial changed, if at the time he appears and answers or demurs, he files an affidavit of merits and demands in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county.

ID. — AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS. — The affidavit read, "I have fully and fairly stated the case in this action to my attorney and counsel," etc. Held, sufficient.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of Santa Barbara County changing the place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco.

Plaintiff, as a broker, brought this action to recover an unpaid balance of the purchase money advanced by him to purchase wheat for the defendants, and for his broker's fees.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, and at the same time filed an affidavit of merits and a written demand for a change of venue, and moved the court to transfer the cause to the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The affidavit of merits showed that the defendant making the affidavit resided in the city and county of San Francisco, and the other in Marin County; that they were partners doing business in the city and county of San Francisco; that he had "fully and fairly stated the case in this action to his attorney and counsel," and that after such statement was advised by said counsel and verily believed that the defendants and each of them had a good and substantial defense to the action upon the merits.

A. A. Oglesby, for Appellant.

William J. Graves, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — When the action is not one of those mentioned in sections 392, 393 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the defendant resides without the county where it has been commenced, it is the right of the defendant, upon satisfying the court of his residence, to have the place of trial changed, if, at the time he appears and answers, or demurs, he files an affidavit of merits and demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county. (Code Civ. Proc. § 396.)

The affidavit of merits was sufficient.

Order affirmed.

F. E. J. CANNEY, APPELLANT, v. THE SOUTH PACIFIC COAST RAILROAD COMPANY, RESPONDENT.

CONTRACT — ACTION FOR SERVICES TO THIRD PERSONS — NOVATION. — The plaintiff, a physician, was, at the request of persons wounded by a railroad accident, attending them when the president of the railroad company told the wounded persons to employ whatever physician they chose, and that the company would pay the bills. This was not told them in the presence of the plaintiff, but was subsequently communicated to him. The plaintiff testified that he attended the wounded until their recovery in pursuance of the original calling, and admitted that no new promise about the services had been made to him. Held, in an action against the railroad company for the services performed, that no liability attached to it.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

J. A. Barham, for Appellant, Garber, Thornton & Bishop, of counsel, cited King v. Edminson, 88 Ill. 257; Civil Code, § 2794; Luce v. Zeile, 53 Cal. 54; Chase v. Day, 17 Johns. 113; Trenor v. C. P. R. R. Co. 50 Cal. 222.

McClure & Dwinelle, for Respondent.

McKEE, J.— The action in this case was brought to recover the balance of an alleged indebtedness for services rendered by the plaintiff as a physician and surgeon, at the alleged special instance and request of the defendant. Part of the services, included in the statement of the cause of action, were rendered at the instance and request of the defendant and were paid. The contention is as to the services which were rendered to a number of persons who had been injured, on the 23d of May, 1880, by a railroad accident on the line of the defendant's road in the county of Santa Cruz. It is for these that the plaintiff seeks to make the defendant liable.

But at the trial, the plaintiff was sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and he testified as follows: "On the morning of the 24th of May, 1880, I was called by the wife of one of the persons injured to treat her husband, and on that day I was called by eleven of said injured parties to treat them. I attended upon them, in pursuance of my original calling, from that time until they were all recovered. My services were reasonably worth eleven thousand dollars." According to that testimony the services were rendered by the plaintiff upon an employment between him and the persons injured. That contract fixed the rights and liabilities of the parties to it. The persons, for whose benefit and at whose instance and request the services were rendered, were bound to pay for them. No other or different contract could be implied. Of course, the parties to the contract might have wholly freed themselves from their rights and liabilities under it by a discharge of the contract. A contract may be discharged or put an end to at any time, by mutual consent, or by an alteration in its terms which, in effect, substitutes for it a new arrangement between the parties themselves or between one of them and a third party. (§ 1531, Civ. Code.) And it is claimed that, while the plaintiff was engaged in performing the services under his original employment, the defendant informed the plaintiff that the injured were allowed to select any physician they saw proper, and defendant would be responsible for the indebtedness.

Yet, as a witness, the plaintiff admitted that no new promise about the services had been made to him. The only thing upon which he relies is, that the president of the railroad company "said to the injured parties," after they had employed the plaintiff, "that they should employ whatever physician they saw proper and the defendant would pay the bills." But that was not said to the plaintiff, nor was he present when it was said. It appears that the parties to whom it was said communicated it to the plaintiff; but neither the promise to them, nor the communication of that promise to the plaintiff constituted a contract between the defendant and the plaintiff either as accessory, or by way of novation, to his original employment which he was engaged in performing. The plaintiff had no communication from or with the defendant upon the subject; there was therefore no mutuality or consent between them, and in law, however it might be in morals, no liability attached to the defendant for the services of the plaintiff to the persons who employed him.

It is not necessary to decide whether the promise made by the president of the company to the wounded constituted a contract between them, collectively or individually, and the company, which might be enforced for the benefit of the plaintiff. No such claim seems to have been made or transferred by any of them to the plaintiff, nor is the plaintiff's cause of action founded upon such a claim. Trenor v. C. P. R. R. Company, 50 Cal. 222, is not applicable to the case in hand. That, it is true, was also a case for the services of a physician and surgeon rendered to persons wounded by a railroad accident; but there was, in the case, some evidence tending to show that the services were rendered at the instance and request of the defendant, and the case was decided upon a conflict of evidence. But in the case in hand there was no conflict of evidence. The plaintiff in his testimony and on the trial, admitted, and his witnesses proved, that the services were rendered in pursuance of his original employment by those who were wounded and not otherwise. There was, therefore, no contract, express or implied, between the plaintiff and the defendant in relation to the services which are the subject of the suit, and as there is no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

D. P. CUMMINGS, RESPONDENT, v. THOMAS B.
HOWARD, APPELLANT.

FINDINGS — PRESUMPTION. — In the absence of written findings, the judgment being in favor of the plaintiff, all the facts alleged in the complaint will be presumed to have been found by the court below.

PLEADING — COMPLAINT. — An averment that the defendant promised and agreed to pay the plaintiff seven hundred and fifty dollars, if he, the plaintiff, succeeded in defeating two certain actions designated in the complaint, is, unless demurred to, good as an averment that he promised to pay when the plaintiff succeeded.

DEMAND — INTEREST. — When money becomes due under a contract on the happening of a particular event, no special demand is necessary before the commencement of a suit. In such a case, interest is recoverable from the time the money becomes due. The contract being silent on the subject, the rate of interest is governed by the statute, and if the rate is subsequently increased by a change in the statute, such increased rate may be recovered from the time of the change. Past as well as future debts are equally subject to the power of the legislature to impose interest.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The action was brought to recover a sum of money with interest alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff as a balance unpaid on a certain contract stated in the complaint. When the money became due, the rate of interest was seven per cent per annum, but the statute was afterwards changed, and the rate increased to ten per cent per annum. The court allowed seven per cent until the change in the statute, and ten per cent thereafter. The additional facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Jarboe & Harrison, for Appellant.

Wheaton & Scrivner, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM. — To sustain the judgment — there being no written findings — all the facts alleged in the complaint will be presumed to have been found by the Superior Court. It is alleged plaintiff made a deed of conveyance of the lands described, to defendant; that when the conveyance was made "doubts existed as to the entire validity of the title, on account" of the pendency of two actions against the property; that the defendant agreed to pay the balance of the purchase money if plaintiff succeeded in defeating the two actions, and in making a clear title; that plaintiff succeeded in defeating both said actions, recovering final judgment in one July 28, 1873, and the other March 22, 1875. The averment that "the defendant paid a small amount of money down, and further promised and agreed in writing to pay seven hundred and fifty dollars, if he, plaintiff, succeeded in defeating" the two actions, is, in the absence of demurrer, good as an averment that defendant promised to pay the seven hundred and fifty dollars when plaintiff succeeded, etc.

The balance became due when final judgment was entered in the one of the two actions last determined. No special demand was necessary prior to the commencement of the present suit.

Plaintiff was entitled to recover interest at the rate of ten per cent per annum during the period of time the statute imposed ten per centum.

The legislature has power to impose on past indebtedness a rate of interest, or (in the absence of a specific contract as to interest) to increase the legal rate. Such a statute operates only on future rights. (Dunne v. Mastick, 50 Cal. 247.) A fresh demand and refusal would be a new assertion of a right, and would impose a new liability. So, in legal effect, is a neglect without a demand. (Bullock v. Boyd, 1 Hoff. Ch. 294.)

Judgment affirmed.

J. M. THOMPSON, APPELLANT, v. GEORGE W. WHITE,
RESPONDENT.

PRACTICE — INTERLOCUTORY DECREES. — There is nothing in the judicial system of this State to prevent the courts from making interlocutory decrees in equity cases, and such decrees are valid and binding until vacated by some appropriate proceeding. They cannot be set aside on the theory that the courts have no power to make them.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

D. L. Smoot, for Appellant.

The court had power to make the interlocutory decree. To burden a court with a case in equity requiring equity procedure, and yet forbid the use of the interlocutory decree, would be something of an anomaly in jurisprudence. In such an emergency the cause of action would continue equitable, but the case would not.

Section 647, Code of Civil Procedure, gives the strongest sanction to the interlocutory determination when it speaks of "the final decision in an action or proceeding," and then of "an interlocutory order or decision finally determining the rights of the parties or some of them."

Interlocutory determinations are authorized by subd. 2 of section 585, Code of Civil Procedure.

Section 639, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes interlocutory decrees or orders directing a referee to hear and decide the whole or any part of the issues or questions of fact involved; ordering an account necessary for the information of the court before judgment, or for carrying a previous judgment or order into effect; and directing the solution of any question of fact outside of the pleadings, which may arise at any stage of the action.

Section 187, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the interlocutory decree wherever it may be required, by declaring that with jurisdiction is conferred all the means necessary to carry it into effect; and "if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by . . . the statute," then "and suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of" the Code. (See also Loring v. Illsley, 1 Cal. 27; Gillman v. Contra Costa, 8 Cal. 52; Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 146; Packard v. Bird, 40 Cal. 380; Harris v. S. F. Sugar Ref. Co. 41 Cal. 393; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180.)

M. A. Wheaton, for Respondent.

We base our defense of the action of the court below in setting aside the interlocutory decree upon the ground that such order was right and necessary.

Ross, J.—This action was brought for the enforcement of an alleged contract for the conveyance of certain interests in certain letters patent, for an accounting in respect to certain matters connected therewith, and to obtain such decree as the equities of the case demand. The cause came on for hearing before the late Nineteenth District Court, and after taking testimony, oral and documentary, that court made certain findings of fact, and thereupon entered an interlocutory decree, to the effect that the defendant convey to the plaintiff the interests in question, upon the performance of certain conditions on the part of the plaintiff, and further directed the commissioner of the court to take testimony and report to the court upon certain other matters of fact. Testimony upon those questions was taken before the commissioner, who subsequently made his report to the Superior Court succeeding the Nineteenth District Court, and by the Superior Court certain exceptions which were taken to the report of the commissioner were overruled and the report confirmed. The judge who at this time presided in the Superior Court was succeeded by another, and before the latter a motion was made for the entry of a final decree in the cause. The learned judge to whom this motion was addressed, denied it, and instead, entered an order purporting to vacate and set aside the interlocutory decree entered by the Nineteenth District Court, the report of the commissioner and its confirmation, and, indeed, all proceedings taken in the cause subsequent to the filing of the defendant's answer, and restoring the action to the calendar for trial. The view taken by the judge below in thus ordering was, that under our system there cannot be, even in an equity case, any such thing as an interlocutory decree, and that therefore the interlocutory decree entered by the Nineteenth District Court was a nullity and all proceedings based thereon void.

In this there was error. It is not necessary to consider whether under the former Constitution, which gives to the District Courts existing under it jurisdiction, and under the present Constitution, which gives to the Superior Courts existing under it jurisdiction, "of cases in equity," it lay in the power of the legislature to deprive such courts of so essential a means for the proper disposition of cases in equity as the interlocutory decree; for it is a mistake to say the legislature has attempted to do anything of the kind. On the contrary, by section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is expressly declared that "when jurisdiction is, by the Constitution or this Code, or by any other statute, conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given, and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or the statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of this Code," the object of which is declared by a preceding section to be the promotion of justice.

We see nothing in conflict with this in the fact that section 577 of the same Code defines a judgment to be "the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding," and that, by section 1003, it is declared that "every direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order." There is no magic in a name. An interlocutory decision of a court of equity, in an equity case, is as efficacious when called an order as when called a judgment or decree. Whether it be called an interlocutory decree or a decretal order, or simply an order, it is in substance the same. Sections 577 and 1003 of our Code were taken substantially from the New York Code of Procedure and the codifiers of that State thus explained their purpose in employing the phraseology they did: "To avoid the confusion incident to the use of the word 'judgment' in two senses, one as interlocutory and the other as final, we have thought it better to use it only in the latter sense, and to designate all other written directions of a court or judge as orders." (Report of Commissioners to legislature, February, 1848, 182.) But, in the purpose thus expressed, no intent is perceived to abolish the power of a court of equity to pronounce, what in equity practice was called, an interlocutory decree or decretal order, but only a provision to the effect that that which finally determined the rights of the parties should be called a judgment, and that every other direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, should be denominated an order. In New York the legislature has returned to the phrase "interlocutory judgment" in place of "order," theretofore used in the Code (Bliss' Annotated Code, § 1200); but even while the designation was different, we think the substance of the thing was all the time the same.

And so here. We find in sections 577 and 1003 no prohibition of such intermediate determinations by the court as the exigencies of the case may demand, and no conflict between them and section 187, which, as has been seen, in terms provides that, in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution or any statute on any court or judicial officer, if the course of procedure be not specifically pointed out by the Code or statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the promotion of justice. Besides, the Code of Procedure makes express recognition of the interlocutory order or decision—section 647 providing, among other things, that “an interlocutory order or decision, finally determining the rights of the parties, or some of them,” shall be deemed to have been excepted to. And in the reports of the State are to be found numerous cases recognizing the power of the court to make such interlocutory determinations. A very late case is that of Hinds v. Gage, 56 Cal. 486; see also Harris v. S. F. Sugar Ref. Co. 41 Cal. 393; Packard v. Bird, 40 Cal. 380; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; McFadden v. McFadden, 44 Cal. 306; Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 635.

The findings and interlocutory determination made by the Nineteenth District Court were therefore not in excess of its power. Whether they were erroneous or not is not now for consideration. Not being nullities, they could only be vacated, if vacated at all, by an appropriate proceeding. “It is thoroughly settled in this State that the mode of reviewing the action of the court upon an issue of fact is the same, whether the case is at law or in equity—there must be a motion for a new trial.” (Harris v. S. F. S. R. Co., supra.) Upon a proper motion of that nature, should the findings of fact be vacated, of course the legal conclusions drawn from them and embodied in the interlocutory decree would fall with them. That decision is also reviewable on appeal from the final judgment when one shall be entered, but there is no warrant for its vacation upon the theory that it was beyond the power of the court to make.

Order reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

JOHN HUNT, JR., EXECUTOR OF THE WILL OF GEORGE F. SHARP, DECEASED, APPELLANT, v. JOSEPH S. FRIEDMAN, RESPONDENT.

RESULTING TRUST. — A resulting trust must grow out of the facts existing at the time of the conveyance, and cannot arise from a mere parol agreement that the purchase shall be for the benefit of another.

DECLARATION OF TRUST. — The plaintiff sought to establish a declaration of trust, and relied upon the following document: "Received, San Francisco, May 27, 1880, of Wm. H. Sharp, Esq., three hundred and sixty-eight and fifty one-hundredth dollars, being his proportion of his tax and outside land assessment, to be paid by me to Alexander Austin, tax collector. The land known as the Fleischaker Tract." This receipt was signed by the defendant. Held, that the document does not on its face manifest or prove a trust, and that the evidence in the case does not show that it was the intention of the parties in executing it to declare one.

McKee, J.—On the 16th of January, 1872, J. S. Friedman, in an action wherein he was plaintiff, and Peter Donahue and others were defendants, recovered judgment for the possession of certain lands and premises in the city and county of San Francisco. The judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State on the 4th day of February, 1875, and ultimately by the Supreme Court of the United States by the dismissal of an appeal taken to that court (92 U. S. 723); after which Friedman was restored to the possession of the lands. On the 5th day of January, 1878, Friedman, in an action wherein he was plaintiff, and Alexander Austin was defendant, also recovered a money judgment, as compensation for some portion of the lands, recovered by the former judgment, which had been taken by the city of San Francisco for a public park, and the amount of the judgment was paid over to him on the 22d of January, 1878.

In the lands and moneys recovered by these judgments, W. H. Sharp claimed to be the equitable owner of an undivided one third interest, which he transferred to George H. Sharp, the testator of the appellant who brought this action to have Friedman declared a trustee of such interest for his benefit, upon the grounds, as urged upon the argument of the case on appeal, that a resulting trust for the benefit of W. H. Sharp arose out of the transaction, between him and Friedman, by which the latter purchased and acquired the title to the lands, and that he afterwards executed a declaration of trust for the benefit of the former.

But the only allegations of trust specified in the complaint are: "That during the several periods of time hereinbefore alleged said defendant Friedman held, and still holds in trust for plaintiff, the legal title for the interest of the plaintiff and his predecessor in the several parcels of land; that on May 27, 1870, defendant Friedman did duly execute and acknowledge in writing that W. H. Sharp was the equitable owner and entitled to an undivided one third part in and to the same." This is but a statement of an express trust. Yet, under these allegations, evidence was given of the purchase by Friedman, and of the arrangement between himself and W. H. Sharp for the prosecution of litigation for recovery of the lands.

The defendant testified that he purchased and acquired title to the lands in his own name for himself alone, that the purchase was not made for the benefit of himself and Sharp, nor did Sharp contribute, or agree to contribute, either money or services for the purchase; that after he had purchased the lands with his own money, and obtained his deed, he consulted with Sharp as to the validity of the title and the prosecution of a suit to recover possession of the lands, and retained Sharp to bring suit for possession, and prosecute it to a successful issue, for which he agreed to give him an undivided one third interest in the recovery. Under that agreement Sharp brought the action, and conducted the litigation in which he recovered a judgment in December, 1869; but that judgment was set aside in March, 1871, and Friedman, having become dissatisfied with Sharp for delay in the prosecution of the suit, employed other attorneys. After that Sharp took no active part in the litigation. The other attorneys prosecuted the suit to final recovery.

Between the testimony of Friedman and that of W. H. Sharp there is a substantial conflict. But the court found that "the plaintiff never did have, by himself or tenants, or those through whom he claims, any possession or occupation of said premises, or any part thereof, as tenant in common or otherwise, and there is no evidence that plaintiff or any person under whom he claims, ever had any interest in said premises, or any part thereof, either legal or equitable.

"4. The defendant Friedman, on the 21st day of January, 1878, received the sum of $48,865.72 for and on account of his interest in the land described in the pleadings herein taken for a public park, but there is no evidence to show that plaintiff ever had any interest in said money or the land so taken for a park, or that the action against Alexander Austin mentioned in the amended complaint, was in any respect for plaintiff's benefit." And we cannot say that the court erred in basing its findings of fact upon the evidence given by the defendant.

Upon that evidence it is clear that the lands were not acquired by the services of plaintiff and the money of the defendant. The latter purchased with his own money, for himself, and not under any agreement with Sharp at the time of purchasing, or taking his deed, and there was no resulting trust in the acquisition of the property for the benefit of Sharp; nor did any arise out of the subsequent arrangement between himself and Sharp as to the prosecution of litigation for the recovery of the land. A resulting trust must grow out of the facts existing at the time of the conveyance, and cannot grow out of a mere parol agreement that the purchase shall be for the benefit of another. (Roberts v. Ware, 40 Cal. 634; Steere v. Steere, 5 Johns. Ch. 1; Robertson v. Robertson, 9 Watts, 32.)

The document relied on as a declaration of trust is as follows:—

"Rec'd, San Francisco, May 27, 1870, of Wm. H. Sharp, Esq., three hundred and sixty-eight 50-100 dollars, being his proportion of his tax and outside land assessment, to be paid by me to Alexander Austin, tax collector. The land known as the Fleischaker Tract. Jos. S. FRIEDMAN."

Admitting that no particular phraseology is necessary for the purpose of raising a trust, yet the intention to declare one must be clear. Now the document merely relates to a tract of land known as the Fleischaker tract, and to the receipt of a sum of money by Friedman from Sharp for the purpose of paying the latter's proportion of the "tax and outside land assessment" upon the tract. It is a coincident circumstance that the lands in controversy were parts of the Fleischaker tract, and that the receiptor had a suit pending for the recovery of these lands, which the person from whom he obtained the money was then prosecuting for their recovery. But at the same time it was admitted that Sharp had other interests in the same general tract. And all the circumstances in connection with the receipt tended to show that the transaction related to Sharp's individual interests in the tract, and not to those claimed and recovered by Friedman in his suit.

Besides, the evidence showed that the original agreement, between Sharp and Friedman, for the prosecution of the suit, had been, before the execution of the receipt, suspended by an agreement to pay Sharp five thousand dollars, instead of an interest in the lands, for his services. And as the services were rendered upon that agreement, it could not be made to serve as the basis for an equitable interest in the lands.

On its face the document itself does not manifest and prove a trust. By it no lands are described, no interest is conveyed, nor does the evidence in the case show that it was the intention of the parties, in executing the document, to recognize on the part of Friedman that Sharp had any interest in the lands which Friedman was attempting to recover.

C. D. HAVEN, RESPONDENT, v. F. M. HAWS, APPELLANT.

PRE-EMPTION SETTLEMENT. — A qualified pre-emptor, intending at the time of settlement to take the whole of a quarter section of land, can initiate a valid claim to the whole, by performing acts of settlement on one half, while the other one half is enclosed and cultivated by another person before and at the time the attempt begins.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Bernardino County.

The action was for the recovery of the possession of the west half of a certain quarter section of land. The plaintiff held a certificate of purchase from the United States which grew out of a contest between one Osborne who held a soldier's certificate and had located the same land, and the plaintiff and the defendant who had each filed a declaratory statement to pre-empt. The Secretary of the Interior decided the contest in favor of the plaintiff herein.

The defendant by way of cross-complaint set up the proceedings, findings, and decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, from which it appears that the defendant, before and at the time the plaintiff made a settlement on the east half of the land and filed his declaratory statement for the whole, was in the actual occupation and possession of the west half, and that the plaintiff had never performed acts of settlement upon the west half; and claimed that the decision was erroneous in law. The plaintiff demurred to the cross-complaint and the demurrer was sustained. The case was then tried and the court found in favor of the defendant on the ground of adverse possession. The defendant appealed to review the order sustaining the demurrer to the cross-complaint.

Satterwhite & Curtis, for Appellant, argued that the Secretary of the Interior erred in matter of law, and that the State courts should review the decision, citing the cases discussed in the opinion.

C. W. C. Rowell, for Respondent, argued that the demurrer was properly sustained; that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon the question presented is final, and the State courts will not review such a decision, citing Dilla v. Bohall, 53 Cal. 709; Powers v. Leith, 53 Cal. 711.

PER CURIAM.—The question involved in this appeal, as stated by appellant's counsel, is as follows:—

“Can a qualified pre-emptor, intending at the time of settlement to take the whole of a quarter section, one hundred and sixty acres, initiate a valid claim to the whole by performing acts of settlement on one eighty, while the other eighty is enclosed and cultivated by another person, before and at the time the attempt begins?”

It is insisted by appellant that the officers of the land department of the United States erred in law, in holding that a qualified pre-emptor could, under the circumstances stated, initiate his claim and acquire title to the eighty acres so in possession of another person.

Appellant relies upon Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 519; Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575; and Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251.

These cases do not sustain his position. In Atherton v. Fowler, it was held: No right of pre-emption can be established by a settlement and improvement upon a tract of public land where the claimant forcibly intruded upon the possession of another. Such intrusion is a trespass and cannot initiate a right of pre-emption. The pre-emption laws cannot be made an apology for trespasses or acts of violence, but in the case before us there was no intrusion upon the actual or constructive possession of the appellant.

In Hosmer v. Wallace the defendant was a purchaser from a Mexican grantee. At the time when the plaintiff settled upon the land it was within the exterior limits of the grant, and was not "public land" within the meaning of the pre-emption laws. In 1862 the plaintiff was evicted by legal process. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the plaintiff acquired no right to pre-empt, by virtue of his occupation, prior to the date last mentioned. After that date it would seem that the plaintiff occupied a subdivision adjoining the exterior line of the Mexican grant and adjoining the tract in possession of the defendant — the purchaser from the Mexican grantee. By the Act of Congress of 1866, the defendant acquired the right to pre-empt the tract he had purchased—a right which he enforced in the land department. The plaintiff, as a pre-emption claimant, had not made entry, paid for the land, and obtained a patent certificate before the passage of the Act of 1866. It was held the plaintiff had acquired no vested right when that act was passed, and that it was competent for Congress, by that act, to give to the defendant the superior right of pre-emption; "to deal with the land as it chose." (Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. 187; The Yosemite Valley Case, 15 Wall. 77.)

Trenouth v. San Francisco, construed the act to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of San Francisco. (14 Stats. 4.)

In Hosmer v. Duggan, 56 Cal. 257, cited by appellant, as in Hosmer v. Wallace, supra, it is said that a possession of lands, without the exterior limits of a Mexican grant, did not create a valid pre-emption right, to lands within the exterior lines of the grant, in the actual possession of another — even though upon a subsequent survey by the government the land should be excluded from the grant. This language is to be interpreted in the light of the circumstances of the cases. In both, the person in possession of the land, within the exterior limits of the Mexican grant, was a beneficiary under the Act of 1866, who had asserted his right of pre-emption under that act, and obtained his patent.

In Davis v. Scott, 56 Cal. 170, also cited by appellant, the defendant invaded the plaintiff's actual possession, ousted and withheld the possession from him. His acts of settlement were within the actual possession of another.

The cases in Lester referred to by appellant do not sustain the view of the law he insists upon. In the case of Flickinger, to which our attention is particularly called (1 Lester L. L. p. 397, No. 446), the Secretary of the Interior held that Flickinger was not entitled to land by him claimed, because it appeared he was not occupying for his own benefit, but as servant of another, and that he had another claim in the "Big Woods" at the time he was occupying the land then in controversy.

MARTIN KELLEY ET AL., APPELLANTS, v. THOMAS
DESMOND, SHERIFF, ETC., RESPONDENT.

EXECUTION — SALE WITHOUT NOTICE — AGGRIEVED PARTY. — A purchaser at an execution sale is not an "aggrieved party" within the meaning of section 693 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes a penalty for selling real property without notice, recoverable by the party aggrieved. (McKEE, J., and MCKINSTRY, J.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. C. Bates, for Appellant.

Clitus Barbour, for Respondent.

McKEE, J. — On the 20th of December, 1879, Margaret Kelley, wife of her co-plaintiff Martin, purchased, at execution sale, a tract of land which had been levied upon by the defendant, as the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, under an execution regularly issued upon a valid judgment rendered November 22, 1879. In the complaint in the action, out of which the case arises, the pleader alleges that the interest of the execution debtor was of great value; that the purchaser paid to the sheriff the amount of her bid as the purchase money of the land; and that, after the payment, she discovered that the sale had been made without giving the notice prescribed by section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But it does not appear that, upon that discovery, she took any steps to set aside the sale, or to have her purchase money returned to her. On the contrary, it does appear that she stood on her rights as a purchaser, and, after the time for redemption had passed, she demanded of the sheriff a deed to the land, but he refused to execute it.

Unquestionably, upon that refusal, she had her remedy. She might have resorted to a writ of mandamus to compel the execution and delivery of a deed, or she might have sued him in damages for a refusal to execute it. But instead of resorting to either of those remedies, the plaintiffs brought this action to recover the penalty prescribed by section 693, Code of Civil Procedure, for selling real property under execution, without notice. That section provides as follows:—

“An officer selling without the notice prescribed by section 692 forfeits five hundred dollars to the party aggrieved, in addition to his actual damages”; and the question arises, whether a purchaser at execution sale, without notice, is the “aggrieved party” within the meaning of the section.

We think he is not. Such a sale is either valid or invalid; it passes the title to the purchaser or it does not. If it be a nullity and passes no title, the purchaser sustains no injury, and no right of action for the forfeiture accrues. Such an action is not maintainable even by a party to the execution, unless he has been deprived of his property by a sale under it without notice (Askew v. Ebberts, 22 Cal. 265); and if he has been deprived of his property by reason of the fact that it has passed from him by the sale to a purchaser at the sale, then the latter is not injured, for he has obtained what he bought.

Now, the real property of an execution debtor, levied on to satisfy the judgment upon which the execution issued, does pass to the purchaser at the sale, whether it was made with or without notice, unless the sale be void for want of authority to make it. If authorized, the purchaser is entitled, after the time for redemption expires, to his deed, and may compel its execution and delivery. The deed is conclusive evidence of the facts of the sale as recited in the deed (Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 287; Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 653; Mayo v. Foley, 40 Cal. 281); and it vests him with the title of the execution debtor. Proof of the execution of a deed, and of the judgment and execution are sufficient for recovery by him in ejectment against the debtor. The purchaser is therefore concerned only with the judgment, execution, and sale, as evidenced by his deed (Cloud v. El Dorado Co. 12 Cal. 133; Blood v. Light, supra); upon them his title depends, and it is not affected or impaired by any irregularities of the officer making the sale. (Reeve v. Kennedy, 43 Cal. 650; Mayo v. Foley, supra.) If notice of the sale has been defectively given, or has not been given at all, it does not prejudice the right which the purchaser has acquired. Questions, therefore, appertaining to the notice, as well as all others which merely relate to irregularities, are between the officer selling and the parties to the execution. (Rorer on Judicial Sales, § 716; Blood v. Light, supra.) They are the only parties aggrieved; and from any injury resulting from such irregularities they are the only parties entitled to the remedy given by section 693, supra. A purchaser to whom the sale passes the legal title of the execution debtor is not an aggrieved party, and is not entitled to sue for the penalty prescribed by the section.

We find nothing in Sexton v. Nevers, 20 Pick. 451, which is in conflict with this conclusion. That was an action on the case by a purchaser at execution sale, who was the plaintiff in execution, against an officer to recover damages for neglect of the officer to comply with the requisitions of the law in selling real property, in consequence of which the plaintiff had been deprived of the property. The acts or omissions of the officer were such as, under the laws of Massachusetts, rendered the sale wholly invalid, and nothing passed to the plaintiff by the officer's deed. Therefore the plaintiff was held entitled to maintain an action against the officer for the neglect of duty by which he had been injured. But the case has no application to the question involved in the case before us.

MARY C. McCLELLAN, APPELLANT, v. JOHN G. DOWNEY, RESPONDENT.

ADMINISTRATION — DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION CONCLUSIVE AS TO SURETY OF ADMINISTRATOR. — Where the decree settling the account of an administrator and making distribution of the estate shows that proof was made to the satisfaction of the court that notice was given as required by the statute, the surety of the administrator, in an action by a distributee to recover the sum distributed to him, cannot be heard to question the validity of the decree.

ID. — COMMUNITY PROPERTY MAY BE DISTRIBUTED BY THE DECREE IN THE HUSBAND'S ESTATE. — The husband died intestate. The property left by him was community property. Pending the administration of his estate, the wife died intestate. Her estate was administered upon and distributed without embracing her interest in the community property, but the decree distributing the husband's estate dealt with the entire community property, and distributed the wife's interest to her heirs. Held, that it was competent for the court to make such a decree, no creditor of hers objecting.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

W. S. Stevens, for Appellant.

Bicknell & White and Graves & Chapman, for Respondent.

MYRICK, J. — This appeal comes before us on the judgment roll, embracing the pleadings, findings, and judgment. The action was brought by plaintiff, a distributee of the estate of her father, W. J. McClellan, against a surety on the bond of the administrator, to recover the amount of money distributed to her by the decree of distribution made of the estate of her said father. The following are sufficient of the facts to explain the case:—

W. J. McClellan died intestate, leaving, him surviving, his wife, Susan A. E. McClellan, and six children, four of whom were the children of his marriage with the said Susan. The property left by him was community property. Susan died subsequent to her husband, intestate, leaving her four children above mentioned her only descendants, and her estate was administered upon and distributed, and the administration closed; but in the decree of distribution of her estate no mention was made of her interest in the estate of her husband. Afterwards, on the 16th of October, 1878, Lindley, the administrator of the estate of W. J. McClellan, presented his final account of his administration, which was filed in the court, and at the same time presented a petition for the distribution of the estate. On the 14th of January, 1879, the Probate Court made a decree, settling the account of the administrator and distributing the estate. This decree recited that the administrator had, on the 16th of October, 1878, rendered and presented for settlement and filed in the court his final account of the administration of the estate, and on the 29th of October, 1878, when the matter came on for hearing, proof was "made to the satisfaction of the court that notice of the settlement of said account and of the time and place of hearing of the same had been duly given by the clerk of this court, as required by law and the order of this court." The decree also recited that on the 16th of October, 1878, the administrator "filed his petition praying for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled, it appearing to the court upon satisfactory proof that notice of the hearing of said petition had been duly given as required by law and the order of this court." The decree, after disallowing some items contained in the account, and charging the administrator with other items, stated the balance in the hands of the administrator, and accordingly settled the account; and then proceeded to distribute the estate, viz., five twenty-fourths to each of the four children of said W. J. and Susan A. E. McClellan, and two twenty-fourths to each of the two children of said W. J. — $934.40 being the amount of money distributed to Mary C., the plaintiff herein, and for the recovery of which amount this action was brought. In making this distribution the decree embraced as well the one half of the community property which went to the surviving widow, Susan, upon the death of her husband, and upon her death to her four children, as the other half of the community property which went to the six children of said W. J. — which accounts for the difference in the proportions as between the two classes of children.

On the trial of this case in the court below, the court found that on the 18th of October, 1878, the Probate Court made an order fixing Tuesday, October 29, 1878, as the day for hearing the account, and directed notice to be given to all persons interested in the estate of the time and place of hearing said final account and petition for distribution, by posting notices in at least three public places in the county for at least ten days before said day; that on the 18th of October, 1878, the clerk posted notices in at least three public places in said county, but notifying all persons interested in the estate to appear on the 28th of October, 1878, and stating in said notice that said 28th of October, 1878, was the day fixed for said hearing; and that no further notice was given. The court concluded that the decree of settlement and distribution was not duly given and made, but on the contrary, that the Probate Court had no jurisdiction over the parties; that as to the interest of the estate of Susan A. E. McClellan, it had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter for the purpose of making distribution thereof to the parties interested as heirs of her estate, and that said decree was wholly void; and thereupon the court rendered judgment for the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed. On this appeal two questions are presented:—

First. Can the defendant in this action, the surety of the administrator, be heard to question the validity of the decree settling the account of his principal, and making distribution? This question is answered by section 1638 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads: "The account must not be allowed by the court until it is first proved that notice has been given as required by this chapter, and the decree must show that such proof was made to the satisfaction of the court, and is conclusive evidence of the fact." The duty was thus cast upon the Probate Court to ascertain if proper notice had been given before allowing the account, and it is directed that the decree shall show that proof thereof was made to the satisfaction of the court, and when so made and so shown, the recital thereof in the decree is made conclusive evidence of the fact, subject, of course, to review on appeal from the decree in a proper manner.

It did not, then, rest with the trial court in this action to hear evidence that the Probate Court had not due and legal proof that proper notice had been given, nor to find contrary to its recital. The decree of the Probate Court on this point was full and ample, as required by the statute, as well as to the settlement of the account as to the distribution, and is conclusive.

It may be remarked that no question is made as to the regularity of the proceedings for the issuance of letters of administration; therefore we may assume that the court had jurisdiction of the estate for purposes of administering upon it. A compliance with the statute in all subsequent proceedings is all that can be required; and many of the cases cited by respondent have no application.

Second. Was it competent for the Probate Court, in the matter of the estate of W. J. McClellan, to make distribution of the share of the community property belonging to the widow, to her heirs, she having died pending the administration of her husband's estate? The objects of administration are, to gather the property left by a decedent, pay the debts and expenses, and distribute the residue "among the persons who by law are entitled thereto." (§ 1665, Code Civ. Proc.) It cannot be said that the widow's share of the community property is for no purpose, the estate of the husband; for certain purposes, payment of debts, expenses of administration, family allowance, it is a portion of the estate, and is not relieved from administration until these objects are accomplished. If therefore the widow die pending administration, no creditor of hers objecting, we see no objection to the distribution of her share of the estate to her heirs, as being the persons entitled thereto. It would, perhaps, be more orderly to have her interest in the estate distributed in terms, in the administration of her estate, to her heirs, and that such heirs go with the decree to have distribution in the husband's estate; or, to have distribution, if personal property, to her administrator for the purposes of administration; but such course would not materially change the relation of the parties here — it appears that her estate was administered upon, and we may presume there are no creditors unpaid, and that the Probate Court had proof that she left no heirs other than those mentioned in the decree. The notice given was notice to all persons to come in and show cause.

On the question of fraud alleged in the answer, the findings are against the defendant. From the views above expressed there would not seem to have been alleged sufficient facts to show fraud.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with instructions to render judgment for plaintiff for $934.40 with interest thereon at the legal rate from January 14th, 1879, to the date of the judgment.

[In Bank. — June 15, 1883.]

THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
APPELLANT, v. SPRING VALLEY WATER WORKS,
RESPONDENT.

TAXATION — ASSESSMENT OF "CAPITAL" AND "CAPITAL STOCK" OF CORPORATION. — Where, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, all the tangible property of a corporation had been assessed, and the taxes paid thereon, and the corporation did not own, or have in its possession, or under its control, any of the shares of its capital stock, the same being owned and held by third persons, it is not liable for taxes assessed upon "capital," or upon "capital stock."

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to recover State and city and county taxes for the fiscal year 1877-78 upon an assessment of "capital" six million dollars; and for the fiscal year 1878-79 upon an assessment of "capital stock" six million dollars.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, sufficiently set forth in the opinion.

John P. Bell, and Louis H. Sharp, for the Appellant, argued that "capital" and "capital stock" meant the property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, of the corporation, and that the admission in the agreed statement of facts that the defendant corporation did not own or have in its possession, or under its control, any of the shares of the capital stock is not an admission that the defendant did not own, possess or control its capital or its capital stock; that the capital or capital stock of a corporation and the shares of capital stock are distinct things. (Citing Burrall v. Bushwick R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 211; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 686; Burroughs on Taxation, 143; Minot v. P. W. & B. R. Co. 5 Corp. Cases (18 Wall. 206), 37; State v. Hood, 15 Rich. 181; People v. Commissioners, etc. 23 N. Y. 192, 219; St. Charles St. R. R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. An. 853, 854; N. O. & C. R. R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 32 La. Haven & Northampton Co.* 42 Conn. 103, 122, 123, 125; New Haven v. City Bank, 31 Conn. 106; State v. Cumberland & Penn. R. R. Co. 40 Md. 51.) And they contended further that the admission in the agreed statement that all the tangible, real, and personal property of every kind held or owned by the defendant was assessed, was not an admission that its intangible property—its franchise—was assessed; that the existence of intangible property is well settled, citing San Jose Gas Light Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594; Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 100.

Fox & Kellogg, and F. G. Newlands, for Respondent, argued that the assessment for "capital" was void, because, (1) it embraced all kinds of property, real and personal, without separately stating or separately valuing them, and (2) because it created and produced double taxation by assessing and taxing under this head all the property that the company possessed, having already once assessed it for the same year in another form and under other headings or titles; and that the assessment of capital stock was void under the rule in the case of People v. National Gold Bank, 51 Cal. 508.

McKINSTREY, J.—By the revenue law of 1861 (Stats. 1861, p. 420), all property was taxable; and by its fifth section the term “personal property” was declared to include “the capital stock of all corporations.” The sixteenth section of the Act of 1861 provided: “The owner or holder of any stock . . . in any incorporated company or association, the entire capital of which is invested in property which is assessed, or the capital of which is assessed, shall not be assessed individually for his stock in such company or association. The thirteenth section required that the assessor should list and assess all property to the person, firm, corporation, association or company “owning or having possession, charge, or control of the same.”

In People v. National Gold Bank, 51 Cal. 509, it had been found by the District Court that the capital stock of the defendant was three hundred thousand dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each; that such shares were owned by persons other than defendant. It was held by the Supreme Court that the defendant could be held liable for the taxes sued for only on the theory that a corporation was liable, under the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1861, for taxes assessed upon its capital stock—that is to say, the “capital stock” regarded as the aggregate of the stock issued by the corporation. That the revenue act referred to did not provide that a corporation should be so liable, or be assessed therefor; but on the contrary, the provisions of the thirteenth section of the act required that the assessor should list and assess all property to the person, firm, corporation, or association “owning or having the possession, charge, or control thereof.” That the provision of the thirteenth (sixteenth) section providing that the owner or holder of any stock in any corporation, the entire capital of which was assessed, or invested in property which was assessed, should not be assessed for his stock, was in effect a provision that when the capital was not so assessed, the stock should be assessed to the owner thereof; that the provision of the thirteenth section, that the president of a corporation should furnish a statement of all the property "owned, claimed by, or in possession or control of the corporation," "tended strongly to show that the corporation should be assessed only for property owned, claimed by, or in possession or control of the corporation"; that the defendant, "not being the owner of the capital stock, the same having been issued to, and being held by other persons," was not liable for the taxes assessed upon the same.

It is urged by appellant that it would only have been necessary to decide that, under the act of Congress, the National Bank was not liable to taxation on its capital stock—citing Bank Tax Cases, 2 Wall. 200—but that this plain and decisive fact was ignored by the counsel who argued the case, and by the court in deciding it. The report of the case shows that counsel did cite the Bank Tax Cases to the point that the legislature had not the power to levy a tax on the capital stock of national banks, not owned by the bank. People v. National Gold Bank was decided upon the letter of the revenue act of the State of 1861. The construction placed upon that act determined the case. The Act of 1861 was relied upon by counsel for the people, and the judgment of the Supreme Court was made to rest, and could properly be made to rest upon its provisions. The decision in People v. National Gold Bank is therefore an authoritative exposition of the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1861.

There were provisions of the Political Code, as the same read in the years 1876, 1877, and 1878, like those in the Revenue Act of 1861, referred to in People v. National Gold Bank.

Section 3628 directed the assessor to assess all property of the persons who "own, claim, have possession or control thereof."

Section 3640 read: "The owner or holder of any stock in any firm or corporation, the entire capital or property whereof is assessed, must not be assessed individually for his stock in such firm or corporation."

Section 3629 required of the assessor that he exact from each person a statement in writing of "all property belonging to, or claimed by, or in the possession of, or under the control or management of any corporation of which such person is president," etc.

It will be observed that the present action is based upon assessments levied before the adoption of the present Constitution.

In People v. National Gold Bank it affirmatively appeared that the shares of the capital stock of the bank were all owned by persons other than the bank. When the present action was here before (54 Cal. 571) it was held that the demurrer to the complaint had been improperly sustained by the Superior Court. The complaint is a special statutory complaint, and, in such case, the rule that averments are to be taken more strongly against the pleader has no application. When the plaintiff adopts the form of the statute he states every fact necessary to a recovery. Hence it was properly said it did not appear but that the defendant did own the capital stock assessed to it. But, by the agreed statement of facts, it now appears that the defendant did not on the first Monday of March, 1877, or on the first Monday of March, 1878, or at any time during the fiscal years 1877-78, 1878-79, own, or have in its possession, or under its control, any of the shares of the capital stock of defendant, but that all the shares of capital stock of said defendant were, on such dates, and throughout such fiscal years, owned and held by persons other than the defendant. And it further appears in the agreed statement, that "all the tangible real and personal property of every kind, held by or belonging to the defendant, in the city and county or elsewhere, was assessed to said defendant" for the fiscal years 1877-78 and 1878-79 for city and county and State purposes, and such assessments were fully paid.

It follows that People v. National Gold Bank, supra, is decisive of this case.

THORNTON, J., concurred in the judgment, and stated the grounds of his concurrence in the following opinion filed July 21, 1883:—

In concurring in the judgment of this court affirming the judgments and orders in the causes above entitled, I said that I would at a future day state the grounds of my concurrence. I now proceed to do so.

The assessments on which these actions were brought were for the fiscal years 1876-77, 1877-78, and 1878-79. The assessment for the first fiscal year just mentioned was upon "capital," eo nomine. That assessment was counted on in the case numbered 8,213. The assessment for the year 1877-78 was also on "capital," and that for the last year mentioned was on "capital stock." These were counted on in the case numbered 8,212.

We find nothing in the assessments or in the cases which favors the idea that these words "capital" and "capital stock" are used in the assessments in other sense than their ordinary and popular one. The words "capital" and "capital stock" have long had a recognized popular meaning. They have been used so long in relation to forms of association for conducting business of various kinds, in connection with the commerce, trade, and manufactures of the world, that it would be surprising if they had not acquired a meaning definite and well understood by all men of ordinary intelligence. And it so happens that this meaning corresponds with the definitions of learned text-writers and jurists, and decided cases. Cases may be found in which capital stock is treated of with a different signification, but this signification is impressed on the words by a statute. The words in these cases have then a peculiar meaning impressed on them by legislative enactment, which the courts administering the laws giving those definitions are bound to regard and cannot depart from, there being no constitutional impediment inhibiting the State, by its legislature, from imposing this definition on the words.

What is this ordinary and popular meaning? In the case of an individual, say a merchant, it is the fund of money or the property on which he does business. In the case of a voluntary association of persons for conducting a business, as, for instance, a partnership, it means the fund of money or property controlled by one or more of the associates employed as a basis of a business, on which and with which the business is to be commenced and carried on. (See Burrill's Dict., word "capital"; Abbott's Law Dict., word "capital"; Webster's Dict., word "capital"; Worcester's Dict., same word; Imperial Dict., words "capital" and "stock") It is called capital from the Latin caput, a head, because it is the chief thing—the head, beginning and basis of an undertaking or enterprise. (See Burrill's Law Dict., word "capital.") Stock has substantially the same meaning. (See the word in the dictionaries above quoted.) Capital and capital stock, in ordinary parlance, when applied to combinations or associations for transacting business, have the same meaning, the former being an abbreviated form of the latter. Such abbreviations have been common through all time. Especially is this the case in our time-saving and labor-saving era. Hence, when one in these days speaks of the capital of a partnership or corporation or joint-stock company, we readily understand him as referring to the capital stock of such associations. (See N. O. C. G. L. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. An. 477.)

The cases in which definitions of these words are given are numerous. In Bailey v. Clark, 21 Wall. 286, the question arose as to the meaning of "capital" in a revenue act of the federal government, and the definition thereof is clearly given by the court, speaking by Field, J. After stating that the term is not used in the act in any technical sense, but in its natural and ordinary signification, the learned justice observes as follows: "When used with respect to the property of a corporation or association, it has a settled meaning; it applies only to the property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business or enterprise for which the corporation or association was formed. . . . And when used with respect to the property of individuals in any particular business, the term has substantially the same import; it then means the property taken from other investments or uses, and set apart for and invested in the special business, and in the increase, proceeds, or earnings of which property, beyond the expenditures incurred in its use, consist of the profits made in the business." (21 Wall. 286; see Railroad Companies v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 707; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 686, and cases cited in this case, where the distinction between capital stock and shares of the capital stock is clearly defined.)

In Burrall v. Bushwick R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 216, substantially the same definition is given. The court there said:

"The capital stock is that money or property which is put into a single corporation by those who, by subscription therefor, become members of the corporate body. (See People v. Home Ins. Co. 29 Cal. 545; Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 308, 309.)

In the second section of the Act of April 14, 1853, entitled, "An act to provide for the formation of corporations for certain purposes" (Stats. 1853, p. 87), the requisites of the certificate of incorporation are prescribed. Among these are the amount of the capital stock of the corporation, and the number of shares of which the stock shall consist. Under this statute the respondent corporation was formed. (See Act of 1858, p. 218; Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 100.) Capital stock is referred to in sections thirteen and fourteen of the Act of 1858 above mentioned. We have an adjudication of its meaning in the thirteenth section in Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 308, according with the definitions above given. There cannot be any doubt as to the meaning of the same expression in the second and fourteenth sections — that they mean the same as in section thirteen. We see no reason why "capital stock" in the assessments in these cases does not have the same significance as in these sections.

Reference might be made to many other cases. A great many will be found collected in Winfield's Adjudged Words and Phrases, under words "capital stock," and "stock," and Lawson's Concordance under words "capital," and "capital stock," and "stock." I have examined many of them, and in none of them have I found the words "capital" and "capital stock," when used in their natural and ordinary signification, having any other meaning than that above designated. I think I can safely say from the examination made that there is no case where any other meaning is attached to the words referred to, where there is nothing in the context showing that they are used with some other meaning, except the case of The People v. The National Gold Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. 51 Cal. 508, referred to in the opinion of my associates. The ruling in the case just cited, holding capital stock to mean shares, is a departure from all the other cases, as there was nothing in the assessment and nothing in the statute (see Act of May 17, 1861, Stats. of 1861, p. 419) qualifying or changing the meaning of the words employed in them respectively. By the terms of the act (see fifth section referred to in the opinion) personal property, when used therein, is to include inter alia "the capital stock of all corporations, companies, associations, firms, or individuals doing business or having an office in the State." Nothing here changes the meaning of capital stock from its natural and ordinary sense. On the contrary, taking it in connection with the words used along with it in the section, it is evident that it is used with that meaning. The words referred to are "companies, associations, firms, or individuals." The capital stock means the same thing here, as regards corporations, that it does when spoken of companies, associations, firms, or individuals. On the rule noscitur a sociis, the signification indicated is the natural and ordinary one.

The thirteenth section of this Act of 1861 is also referred to, in which it is provided that the president, etc., of the corporation shall furnish under oath "a statement of all the real estate and personal property within the county, owned, claimed by or in possession, or under the control of such corporation." It is said there is no provision that he shall furnish a statement of the capital stock of such company. The capital stock of the company is the property of the company. (Burrall v. Bushwick R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 216.) In that case, to the definition of capital stock as a corporate fund above quoted, is added this: "That fund becomes the property of the corporate body." (See Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 686; Barry v. Merchants' Exchange Co. 1 Sand. Ch. 305, 306; Bailey v. Clark, 21 Wall. 286; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11.) In the cases cited from 75 N. Y. and 95 U. S. the well-known difference between the shares of capital stock, and the capital stock is pointed out. The capital stock is as much owned by the corporation as the capital stock of a firm is owned by the firm. The corporation owns the capital in trust for the stockholders; the owners of the shares are cestuis que trust. The president is, by the requirements of the statute, to make a statement of all the property of the corporation. This requisition is made because the property of the corporation may exceed the capital stock, as is clearly shown in Barry v. Merchants' Exchange Co. 1 Sand. Ch. above quoted. (See pp. 306, 307.) See also thirteenth section of Act of 1853, under which the respondent corporation was formed, by which the trustees representing the corporation are forbidden to divide, withdraw, or in any way pay the stockholders or any of them any part of the capital stock of the company. (Stats. 1853, p. 89.)

I see no reason to hold that capital stock either in the Act of 1861 or the assessment in People v. National Bank etc., above cited from 51 Cal., had any other signification than its ordinary one above given. A contrary ruling is opposed to principle and decided cases. Under these circumstances, with high regard for the court making the decision, I do not think the case should be followed.

Indeed, I think the case was practically disregarded in the cases under consideration when they were before this court on demurrer to the complaint. (See San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 54 Cal. 575, and another case with same title, 54 Cal. 603.)

I conclude from the foregoing that the assessment of the capital and capital stock of the corporation embraced all of its property of every kind which could be denominated the corporate fund paid in, or property furnished by the subscribers or stockholders for carrying on the business of the concern. In whatever shape it may exist, this assessment includes it. It makes no difference that the capital-stock fund was originally money. Whatever the money is invested in takes the place of the money, and becomes a part of the capital stock. This is so self-evident that it needs no citation of authority to sustain it, but the cases sustaining it are numerous. (See New Haven v. City Bank, 31 Conn. 109; Bligh v. Brent, 2 Younge & C. 294-5.)

It is admitted in both cases that all the tangible real and personal property of every kind, including money on hand or on deposit, held by or belonging to the defendant in this State, was assessed to defendant for the fiscal years above mentioned, and that the taxes were fully paid. According to the views above expressed, the assessments under consideration include all the property just mentioned, and embrace the capital stock, and may be more than the capital stock. (See Bank Tax Case, 2 Wall. 200; Bank of Commerce v. N. Y. City, 2 Black, 620.)

To allow then a recovery in these cases would be to require the defendant to pay taxes twice on the same property for the same years, which is opposed to all law and should not be permitted.

It has been stated in a former part of this opinion that the words "capital" and "capital stock" have been impressed by legislation with a meaning different from its popular, natural, and ordinary one. Such is the case, in the cases cited by counsel for appellant from the Louisiana and Illinois reports, as an examination of them will show.

The Illinois cases cited are: Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561; Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 610; C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Sides, 88 Ill. 324; Danville Manufacturing Co. v. Parks, 88 Ill. 464; Quincy Bridge Co. v. Adams Co. 88 Ill. 621; O. & M. R. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 448; C. P. & S. W. R. Co. v. Raymond et al. 97 Ill. 212; to which might be added Republic Life Insurance Co. v. Pollak, 75 Ill. 292; Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 556; and Huck v. Chicago & Alton Railroad Co. 86 Ill. 352.

The cases cited from Louisiana are City of New Orleans v. Mechanics' & T. Insurance Co. 30 La. An. Part. 2, 876-8; New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. An. 475; City of New Orleans v. Canal B. Co. 32 La. An. 160, State v. Louisiana Sav. Bk. & S. D. Co. 32 La. An. 1136.

The Illinois cases relate to the system of revenue of the State of Illinois, mainly to the Revenue Act of 1872, and the rules and regulations made by authority of that act, having the force of a statute, and the meaning attributed to the words "capital stock" is that imposed on them by the statute and the rules and regulations. In the case of O. & M. R. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill., above cited, the meaning is stated as follows: "The term 'capital stock' means all the property and rights of the corporation of every kind and nature wherever located." (96 Ill. 448.) This meaning is attributed to "capital stock" in all these cases; a meaning broad enough to include franchise as part of the property of the corporation. Indeed the statute requires the capital stock of all companies and associations to be so valued as to include franchise. (See 3d section of Act of March 30, 1872, the text of which will be found in 92 U. S. 578; see, also, Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co., cited above, where it is distinctly held.) A lucid exposition of the system of taxation under the laws of Illinois will be found in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, drawn up by Justice Miller in State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, approving the early cases in Illinois, among which is mentioned Porter's case, above cited. (92 U. S. 617.) The opinion in this case also shows that the broad meaning attributed to capital stock in the cases above referred to is derived as above stated. In the report of this case will be found the rules and regulations above referred to.

It will be seen, from an examination of the Louisiana cases, that the value of the capital or capital stock is to be ascertained from the market price of the stock or any other manner. This is so declared by statute. (N. O. City Gas L. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. An. 477, where the statute is referred to.) When so ascertained it includes franchise. (See page last cited, Comm. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298-304; Nichols v. New Haven, etc. Co. 42 Conn. 122.) From this value is to be deducted the value of the real and personal estate separately assessed; the remainder is the value of the capital stock to be assessed, and may be designated in the assessment as capital stock. (See case just cited, State v. La. Sav. Bk. and S. D. Co. 32 La. An. 1138; and City of N. O. v. N. O. Canal and Banking Co. 29 La. An. 851.) These cases are interpretations of the revenue laws of Louisiana, and the courts of that State, in administering its laws, have held capital stock to have the signification above indicated.

But it is said capital stock includes franchise, and the cases just above mentioned are cited on behalf of appellant to sustain this position. We have already stated what the meaning of capital stock is when used in its ordinary legal acceptance, and it is so used, we think, in the assessments in these cases, and there is nothing in the statute under which these assessments were made giving any other meaning to these words. The definition given in a previous part of this opinion is sustained by the authorities. The meaning given to capital stock by the courts of Illinois and Louisiana in the cases above cited includes franchises, and such meaning is, as we have shown, derived from the construction of the laws respecting revenue systems of those States. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 150, is a direct authority that the franchise is different property from the capital stock, though they are both the property of the corporation. (See also Bligh v. Brent, 2 Younge & C. 294.)

But it is further argued that the capital stock, or some portion of it, may have been in a franchise, and as the action of the assessor must be held regular and lawful until the contrary is shown, the assessments ought to be sustained on the ground that the assessor assessed such property, and it is not made to appear that the respondent did not own such property when the assessments were made. If the respondent had purchased such a franchise, it can scarcely be conceived as existing unconnected with property, and in assessing such property, the value of the franchise would be taken into account in estimating its value. No allusion is here made to the acquisition of the rights or franchises of one corporation by another. In such a case there is usually a consolidation or amalgamation, another corporation is formed, and the franchise of such new being is to be assessed in the mode most common, by taking the aggregate value of the shares of the capital stock, and deducting from such aggregate the assessed value of the tangible property of the corporation. (As an instance, see the case of consolidation of the two cases referred to in N. O. City Gas Light Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. An. 476, above cited.) So if, in the case of the admitted assessment of the tangible property of the corporation in this case the value of any right in the nature of a franchise entered into such property, it should be presumed that it was taken into account by the assessor in ascertaining the value of such property and was included in the assessments sued on.

If the assessor intended to include the franchise or faculty of being a corporation in the assessments, it was an easy matter to signify such intention by designating it as "franchise" or using some other words which on a fair interpretation would evince such intention, as in N. O. C. G. L. Co. v. Board of Assessors, cited above, where the assessment was of "capital and other values" (31 La. An. 475); and in some such mode the assessment of such franchise should be made.

In coming to the conclusion herein reached, I lay out of view entirely the fact admitted in the cases, that the shares of the capital stock had been sold to other persons, and were not the property of the corporation when the assessments were made. Such matter is entirely immaterial in the view taken in this opinion. I put my concurrence in the judgment of my associates on the distinct ground that to allow a recovery in these cases would be to sanction double taxation; that the capital or capital stock had already been assessed in assessing the tangible property of every kind owned by respondent, upon which last assessments the taxes had been paid.

Rehearing denied.

THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
APPELLANT, v. H. M. CRAMPTON, RESPONDENT.

FINDINGS.— Judgment and order refusing a new trial reversed for want of a finding on one of the issues presented by the pleadings.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Glassell & Smith, for Appellant.

James H. Blanchard, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— In this case an issue was joined to the effect that the premises in controversy were within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant known as the Rancho San Jose. On this issue there was no finding. The court found that the premises were within the exterior limits of a survey of the rancho above mentioned made by Thompson in August, 1868, which survey was set aside; that it was not within the exterior limits of a survey made previously to that of Thompson, which survey was also set aside; that in 1874 a re-survey was made which excluded the land in suit. All of these surveys were made by authority of the United States, and on the survey of 1874 a patent was issued.

It was further found that the premises in controversy were not within the limits of the survey of 1874, or within the patent.

It will be seen from the preceding recapitulation that there was no finding upon the issue above stated.

The cause must therefore go back for a new trial that there may be a finding on the issue mentioned. We find no other error in the record.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

HENRY PIERCE, RESPONDENT, v. J. W. WHITING
ET AL., APPELLANTS.

ATTACHMENT — UNDERTAKING TO RELEASE PROPERTY — RECITALS. — An undertaking was given to obtain the release of personal property from attachment. The undertaking recited the commencement of the attachment suit, and that certain property of the defendant therein had been seized by the sheriff under the attachment. The only property attached was a vessel known as the Startled Fawn, and on the giving of the undertaking the property was released. Held, that the recitals in the undertaking were conclusive as between the parties, and that the sureties were precluded from showing that the property did not belong to the defendant in the attachment suit.

IN. — DEMAND — PLEADING. — The undertaking stipulated that in case of the recovery of a judgment by the plaintiff in the attachment suit, the defendant should surrender the property on demand to be applied in payment of the judgment, or that in default thereof he and his sureties would on demand pay to the plaintiff the value of the property not exceeding a specified sum. The only demand alleged in the complaint was a demand on the principal for the amount of the payment, and for the redelivery of the property. Held, that in order to maintain an action against the sureties on the undertaking, a demand upon them and their principal for the payment of the value of the property was also necessary, and that the complaint was fatally defective in failing to allege such a demand.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

J. C. Bates, for Appellant.

A demand on the sureties was necessary. (Chitty on Pleadings, 15 Am. Ed. vol. 1, p. 331; Morgan v. Menzies, 60 Cal. 341; Williamson v. Blattan, 9 Cal. 500; Bush v. Stevens, 24

Surety may show defendant did not own property. (Bauer v. Antoine, 22 La. An. 145; Smith v. Jewell, 14 Gray, 223; Koeniger v. Creed, 58 Ind. 554.)

George A. Nourse, for Respondent.

The recitals in the undertaking as to the ownership of the property attached concludes the sureties. (Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157; McMillan v. Dana, 18 Cal. 339; Bowers v. Beck, 2 Nev. 150; Drake on Attachment, § 339; Decker v. Judson, 16 N. Y. 439.)

No demand of the sureties was necessary. (Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 266; Ziel v. Dukes, 12 Cal. 479; Wenman v. Mohawlt Ins. Co. 13 Wend. 268; Robinson v. Williams, 8 Met. 451-56; Metrovich v. Jovovich, 58 Cal. 341.)

McKEN, J.—This suit is founded upon an undertaking, given in an attachment suit brought by the plaintiff against Frederick A. Hyde. The undertaking was given for the release from attachment of the yacht Startled Fawn, which had been seized, by the attachment issued in the case, as the property of the said Hyde, to secure payment of any judgment which might be recovered in the action against him. By the undertaking, the defendants promised that in case the plaintiff recovered judgment against Hyde in the action, he would, on demand, redeliver the property so released from the attachment, to the proper officer to be applied to the payment of the judgment; or that, in default thereof, he and the sureties would, on demand, pay to the plaintiff the full value of the property released, not exceeding the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars.

In the attachment suit judgment was recovered against Hyde.

The judgment remained unsatisfied, and an execution was regularly issued upon it and placed in the hands of the proper officer, for collection according to law. The officer, with the execution in hand, demanded of Hyde payment of the judgment and a redelivery of the yacht to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment. But the judgment was not paid, nor was the yacht redelivered, and hence this suit upon the undertaking.

The plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendants appeal; and it is contended, first, that the judgment is erroneous, because the court on the trial of the case excluded evidence, which they offered, to prove that the yacht, when it was attached, was not the property of Hyde.

But their undertaking recites the bringing of the attachment suit; the issuance of the writ of attachment therein against the defendant Hyde, and the attachment of his property, namely, the yacht called the Startled Fawn, and that upon the execution of the undertaking in accordance with the provisions of sections 554 and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the property was released by order of the court from the attachment. These recitals are as between the parties to the undertaking conclusive evidence of the facts recited. (Sub. 2, § 1962, Code Civ. Proc.; Palmer v. Vance, 13 Cal. 558; Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157; Bowers v. Beck, 2 Nev. 150; Drake on Attachment, § 339.) There was, therefore, no error in excluding the evidence.

But it is contended, secondly, that the action itself was not maintainable against the defendants, because the complaint failed to show or aver any demand on them to pay the value of the property released from the attachment.

Demand and refusal by the principal to pay the amount of the judgment, and to redeliver the property released from the attachment, to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment, are averred and found. But the defendants did not bind themselves to pay the judgment, nor are they sued for its non-payment; they are sued for a breach of their obligation to pay the value of the property which their principal refused to deliver. In default of redelivery they were bound to pay the value of the property, but only according to the terms of their contract. By those terms the rights and remedies of the parties are to be determined; for the law binds a party to a contract only according to its terms. Now the terms are that in case of default by their principal to deliver the property, to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment against him, he, and they, as sureties for him, will pay the value of the property on demand. This is not an independent promise to pay an indebtedness of their own, or a certain sum of money to another. If it were, no demand would be necessary as preliminary to payment. The rule is that where a person promises, without qualification, to pay money to another, either generally or on demand, the money becomes due simultaneously with the promise, and in default of payment suit may be maintained against the promisor without a demand in fact. (Quimby v. Lyon, 63 Cal. 394; Thompson v. Ketcham, 8 Johns. 189; Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Peters, 455.) But it is otherwise where the duty to pay does not arise until after demand, or where there is a promise by sureties to pay a collateral sum on demand. In such cases there must be a demand in fact before suit is brought. The rule in those cases is thus stated by Mr. Addison, in his work on Contracts: "Where by the expressed terms of a contract the duty to pay money, or to tender some particular service is not to arise until after demand has been made, there is no cause of action until demand has been made. Thus where a man covenants or agrees to pay the debt of some third party, on demand, or to deliver up a bond to be canceled on request, there the demand or request is a condition precedent to the existence of any cause of action."

The case of Sicklemore v. Thistleton, 6 Maule & S. 9, illustrates the rule as to promise for payment of money to a third person. In that case the plaintiff declared upon a lease in which the defendant had, as surety for the tenant, covenanted "that the tenant should at all times during his term, well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the plaintiff the rents as they became due, according to the terms of the lease, and that in case the tenant should neglect to pay the rent for forty days, defendant shall pay on demand." Speaking of the covenant of the surety, Lord Ellenborough said: "I own that I cannot help thinking this is a qualified covenant, and that the stipulation, that if the lessee shall neglect to pay for forty days, the surety shall pay on demand . . . does, in reasonable construction, pervade and restrain the former covenant. According to the authority of Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 13, covenants ought to be construed with due regard to the intention of the parties, as it is to be collected from the whole context of the instrument, so as to make one entire and consistent construction of the whole. And it appears to me that that would not be a consistent or just construction of this instrument, which would have the effect of making the defendant, who is only a surety, liable in the first instance, without notice, immediately upon the rent becoming due." And Bayley, J., said: "It is not possible that the latter clause, as it regards the surety, is a qualification of the former. Covenants must necessarily be construed all together in order to attain their true meaning. The meaning of these covenants is, that the defendant does not become chargeable eo instanti the rent becomes due, but only after forty days non-payment and after demand made."

It is a well-settled rule of law, says the Supreme Court of Kentucky, that wherever one party is required to do an act upon the demand of another, performance or an offer to perform must be within a reasonable time after demand; that is, "so much time as is necessary to do conveniently what the contract requires to be done." And this of course depends upon the nature of the act to be done, and the relative situation and circumstances of the parties. When the contract is for the payment of money on demand, it has been held that a failure to comply, immediately, with the demand, affords a ground of action. (Blackwell v. Fosters, 1 Met. Ky. 88.) A demand before suit was therefore essential to fix the liability of the defendants upon their undertaking. They promised upon the express condition that demand should be made upon them and their principal for the payment of the value of the property released in case of his failure to redeliver it. The complaint was, therefore, defective in not containing an averment of demand. So in Morgan v. Menzies, 60 Cal. 341, where an action was brought on an attachment bond conditioned for the payment to the defendant, in the attachment suit, in case he recovered judgment, of all costs and damages sustained by reason of the attachment, not exceeding a certain sum of money, this court held that the complaint was insufficient, on the grounds that there were no averments in the complaint that payment had not been made, or that a demand had been made.

Metrovich v. Jovovich, 58 Cal. 341, is not analogous to the case in hand. In that case demand of the property released was made of the defendants, and the principal question involved was, whether the terms of their undertaking were complied with by an offer to return or by a return of a portion of the property attached. Nor does Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 266, conflict with the views herein expressed. That was an action upon an indemnity against loss in a sale of stock, in which the promisor, by an independent agreement, undertook to pay to plaintiff, on demand, any deficiency resulting from a sale of the stock, and the Supreme Court held that as the promisor had notice of the sale and of the deficiency, his promise to pay was absolute and no demand was necessary. His promise was not collateral to a third person. The relation of principal and surety did not exist between the parties to the indemnity. "We cannot," say the court, "see anything in the contract which gives him the rights of a surety. We might inquire whose liability to pay does he guarantee, or for whom is he surety. The contract is solely his own." The difference between that case and the case in hand lies in the fact that in that there was a duty to pay and no actual demand was necessary. The bringing of the suit was sufficient. In this the promise to pay a collateral sum on demand was in the nature of a penalty, and not as a precedent duty, and therefore a demand was necessary before action brought. For the demand is part and parcel of the contract, and must be proved, and no cause of action arises until a demand be made.

If there is any principle of law well settled, it is that the liability of sureties is not to be extended beyond the terms of their contract. To the extent and in the manner and under the circumstances pointed out in their obligation they are bound, and no further; they are entitled to stand on its precise terms. (People v. Buster, 11 Cal. 215; People v. Breyfogle, 17 Cal. 504; Tarpey v. Shillinberger, 10 Cal. 391; Smith v. United States, 2 Wall. 234; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 703.)

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with direction to the court below to sustain the demurrer.

THE PEOPLE, RESPONDENT, v. WONG AH TEAK,
APPELLANT.

CRIMINAL LAW — JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE. — A person who has sought a combat for the purpose of taking advantage of another, may afterwards endeavor to decline any further struggle, and if he really and in good faith does so before killing the person with whom he sought the combat, he may justify the killing on the same grounds as he might if he had not originally sought the combat for such purpose.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

James Maguire, for Appellant.

SHARPSTEIN, J. — The court, in charging the jury as to what would constitute justifiable homicide, said: "Homicide is justifiable when committed in necessary self-defense, but to justify a person in killing another in self-defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing, that in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other is absolutely necessary, and it must appear also that the person killed was the assailant. It must appear also that the deceased person was the assailant, or that the person killing had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given. A bare fear of the commission of any of the offenses or injuries which I have just spoken of as justifying a homicide is not sufficient to justify it, but the circumstances must be sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person, and the person killing must have acted under the influence of such fears alone, without any mixture of malice, and without having sought the combat himself, for the purpose of taking an advantage of the person killed."

If such be the law it follows that one who had sought a combat with another for the purpose of taking an advantage of him, could never be justified in killing the person with whom he sought such combat for such purpose, although he "really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given."

But such is not the law. A person who has sought a combat for the purpose of taking advantage of another, may afterwards endeavor to decline any further struggle, and, if he really and in good faith does so before killing the person with whom he sought such combat for such purpose, he may justify the killing on the same grounds as he might, if he had not originally sought such combat for such purpose. An instruction to the contrary would be erroneous in any case.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for new trial.

THORNTON, J., ROSS, J., and McKINSTRY, J., concurred.

McKEE, J.—I dissent. Conceding that the closing portion of the last instruction to the jury be erroneous, yet I think it is error without injury; because there was nothing in the evidence, as it appears in the record, which tended to prove that the defendant sought a combat with the deceased for the purpose of taking an advantage of him, or that the homicide was committed in a combat between the defendant and the deceased; that portion of the instruction was therefore irrelevant to the evidence in the case. Besides, the instruction itself was qualified by the other parts of the charge of the court, in such a manner that the jury could not have been misled by the objectionable part of the instruction.

MYRICK, J., concurred in the dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE McKEE.

J. B. SOUTHARD, RESPONDENT, v. JOHN McBROWN
ET AL., APPELLANTS.

EXECUTION — LEVY UPON JUDGMENT — PRIOR ASSIGNMENT. — No rights are acquired under an execution sale of a judgment which had been assigned for value prior to the levy, notwithstanding the assignment had not been filed, and no notice of it given to the purchaser.

LXIII. CAL.—35.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco refusing to direct the satisfaction of a judgment.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE MYRIOK.

James A. Waymire, for Appellants.

J. M. Seawell, for Respondent.

MYRIOK, J.—The plaintiff Southard recovered a judgment in a District Court against the defendant, McBrown, for $3,000 damages and $256.50 costs. The plaintiff assigned the judgment for value, and by intermediate assignments Benson became the owner also for value. The assignments, however, were not filed, nor did McBrown have notice thereof. McBrown had a judgment against Southard in another District Court for $22 costs. Upon this latter judgment McBrown obtained a writ of execution, upon which the sheriff assumed to make a levy and sale of the $3,356.50 judgment, upon which sale McBrown was the purchaser for the amount of his judgment against Southard. McBrown then made application to the court in which the judgment against him had been obtained, for an order that satisfaction of that judgment be entered, upon the ground that it had been satisfied in fact by the sale upon execution to him. This application was refused, and from the order of refusal an appeal was taken.

Southard claims that the judgment of $22 against him was void, because the cost bill (the judgment being for costs only) was not filed within five days after the rendition of the judgment. From the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to pass upon this question.

Even if it be granted that a judgment is the subject of sale under execution, and if it be granted that a sale would be good if made for value before notice of assignment, McBrown was not a purchaser for value; he parted with nothing; he, the holder of the $22 judgment, bid in the larger judgment for his judgment. But it was said in Fore v. Manlove, 18 Cal. 437, "If a judgment be the subject of levy and sale, the purchaser would only take as assignee; . . . their (the first assignees) right first accruing by the assignment of the execution debtor, took precedence of the sheriff's assignment subsequently made." The sheriff's certificate was that he had sold "the right, title, and interest of J. B. Southard" in the judgment. Southard then had no interest; he had transferred his interest. The sheriff's sale was but an assignment; and it was said in Mitchell v. Hockett, 25 Cal. 544, that "the rule of caveat emptor—so far as any interest acquired as against third parties is concerned—applies to them in the same manner as in the purchase of any other personal property. If the assignor has no title they will take none, whether they have notice or not." This point disposes of the case, and it is not necessary to consider any other.

The order is affirmed.

McKEE, J., and THORNTON, J., concurred.

ROSS, J.—I concur for the reason that, prior to the time of the levy upon the judgment in favor of Southard, the latter had assigned his judgment for value; and conceding McBROWN to have been a purchaser for value, the rule is, that between two bona fide purchasers of a chose in action not negotiable, the first in time is prior in right. (18 Cal. 438.)

SHARPSTEIN, J., concurred for the reasons stated by ROSS, J.

BENJAMIN SANFORD, RESPONDENT, v. THE CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, APPELLANT.

POLICY OF INSURANCE — FORFEITURE. — A policy of insurance issued to one of its members by a mutual insurance company having authority to levy assessments upon the members for their proportion of the losses and expenses of the company, is not forfeited or suspended by the failure of the insured to pay an assessment thus levied, unless such forfeiture or suspension is provided for as a part of the contract of insurance. If the obligation to pay arises from an independent contract, its violation does not affect the policy.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The case was heard on the judgment roll. A copy of the policy in question was attached to the complaint, and referred to in the findings of the court. By the terms of the policy it was made and accepted subject to the by-laws and regulations of the association then or thereafter existing. Certain by-laws and regulations were set forth in the policy, and the record does not show that any others were ever adopted. The portions of the policy bearing upon the question decided are alluded to in the opinion of the court.

Pillsbury & Titus, and A. W. Thompson, for Appellant, cited Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. v. Rought, 97 Pa. St. 415; Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 10 Ins. Law Jour. 208; Hummel & Co.'s Appeal, 78 Pa. St. 320; Columbia Ins. Co. v. Buckley, 83 Pa. St. 293; Washington Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Rosenberger, 84 Pa. St. 373; Crawford Co. Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Cochran, 88 Pa. St. 230.

W. S. Goodfellow, for Respondent.

The policy provides for cancellation at the discretion of the secretary in case of delinquency on the part of the insured. The non-payment does not of itself work a forfeiture.

In all the cases cited by appellant there was an express condition in the policy rendering it null and void if any assessments remained unpaid for thirty days after notice and demand.

McKEE, J.—The only question in the case is whether the non-payment of an assessment levied against a member of a mutual insurance company for his proportion of losses and expenses incurred by the company, on the plan of insurance upon which the policy was issued, operates to forfeit or suspend the policy.

It is said in Lycoming Fire Insurance Company v. Rought, 97 Pa. St. 415: "If a member of a mutual insurance company is in default in the payment of an assessment on his policy after due notice, according to the by-laws and rules of the company, the protecting power of the policy is suspended until the assessment is paid. No recovery can be had for a loss sustained during the continuance of such default."

But in that case the contract was made with reference to a by-law of the company which provided that whenever an assessment shall have been made upon the premium notes, and the same is not paid within thirty days after having been demanded by the company, . . . the policy of insurance given upon such notes shall be null and void until said assessment shall be paid. The time for payment was, therefore, fixed by the contract, and by notice of the assessment and the demand for payment, and the contract itself provided for a forfeiture or suspension of the policy until payment.

The case in hand differs from that in this: there was no time fixed for the payment of the assessment, either by the by-laws of the company or in the notice of the assessment and demand of payment. The liability of the plaintiff to pay the assessment was therefore the result of an obligation arising from an independent contract, which was enforceable against him according to law, and there was nothing in the terms of the policy which declared a forfeiture or suspension of the policy in case of non-payment. On the contrary, while the policy provided that "all persons insuring shall be ratably assessed, and are bound to pay their proportion of all losses and expenses happening to and accruing in or to said association," it also provided for the cancellation of the policy by the secretary of the company whenever he deemed advisable . . . for non-conformance to the rules and regulations of the association. That discretion was never exercised. There is no claim that the policy was ever cancelled for non-payment of the assessment.

The court found "that no notification or intimation was at any time given by defendant to plaintiff that the assessment was to be paid by or within any particular time; and that the plaintiff has never, at any time, refused to pay it."

It follows that the non-payment of the assessment will not defeat plaintiff's right to recover. The performance or non-performance of an act does not involve a forfeiture of a policy of insurance unless it be so provided by the terms of the policy.

Judgment affirmed.

ADOLPHE BERSON ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. MATTHEW NUNAN, APPELLANT.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE — ATTACHMENT. — Property covered by a chattel mortgage duly executed and recorded cannot be attached without payment of the mortgage debt, or a deposit of the amount with the county clerk or treasurer payable to the order of the mortgagee, as required by section 2969 of the Civil Code.

ID. — CHANGE OF POSSESSION. — The validity of such a mortgage does not depend upon a change in the possession of the property. The title passes to the mortgagee subject to the conditions expressed in the mortgage, and can only be divested by a performance of these conditions. The recording of the mortgage operates as notice to creditors and subsequent purchasers, and is the equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession.

REPLEVIN — FORM OF JUDGMENT. — A judgment in replevin must be in the form prescribed by section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Lloyd & Wood, for Appellant.

The judgment is not in the form prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure, section 667.

There was no actual or continued change of possession upon the sale to plaintiffs. (Civil Code, § 3440; Edwards v. Sonoma Co. Bk. 59 Cal. 149; Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 401; Hesthal v. Myles, 53 Cal. 623.)

Chas. P. Goff, for Respondents.

The mortgage debt should have been paid before the levy. (Civil Code, § 2969.)

The mortgage vested the legal title in the mortgagee. (Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal. 404; Stringer v. Davis, 35 Cal. 25; 2 Hilliard on Mortgages, 2d ed. § 277.)

McKEE, J. — This was an action of replevin brought by the plaintiffs to recover certain household furniture which had been seized by the defendant as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, under an execution issued in favor of C. H. Voight against Maria Trendle. The seizure was made on the 3d of November, 1879. At the time, the furniture was in the actual possession of the execution debtor, who was using it in the business of keeping a boarding and lodging house; but she had purchased the furniture from the plaintiffs and had given her promissory note, secured by a chattel mortgage upon the furniture, for an unpaid balance of the purchase money. The mortgage was verified and acknowledged as required by sections 2956, 2957, Civil Code, and was recorded on the 29th of January, 1878, as required by section 2959, Civil Code.

Subsequently to the recording of the mortgage, namely, in April, 1879, the mortgagor also made a formal bill of sale to the plaintiffs of her interest in the furniture; but by an instrument in writing, executed by the plaintiffs and delivered simultaneously with the execution and delivery of the bill of sale, the plaintiffs acknowledged that the bill of sale was intended as security to them for payment of the rent of the house, in which the execution debtor was carrying on the business of keeping a boarding and lodging house.

These transactions were binding between the parties. The title to the furniture passed to the plaintiffs. Under the chattel mortgage it continued vested in them, until it was reinvested by the performance of the mortgage conditions. (Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal. 404; Hackett v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 85.) But the equitable interest of the mortgagor in the property was subject to the disposal of the mortgagor according to law, or to levy on execution sale according to law. Section 2969, Civil Code, provides as follows: "Before personal property mortgaged can be attached or levied upon, the officer must pay to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, or must deposit the same with the county clerk or treasurer, payable to the order of the mortgagee." By the record of the mortgage the officer had notice of the mortgage debt before making the levy, and after he had levied upon the property, the plaintiffs gave him actual notice of their mortgage claim, and the amount due upon it, and that they also claimed the property by the bill of sale. Yet the defendant neither paid nor deposited the amount of the mortgage debt and interest as required by the Code. The act of the officer in levying upon the property, by the execution in his hands was, therefore, wrongful.

It is contended, however, "that no actual or continued change of possession took place upon the sale from Maria Trendle to plaintiffs."

But a transfer of property by chattel mortgage, executed with the formalities of law and recorded, passes the title, although conditional and defeasible, whether the property be or be not delivered. The rights of the parties to the mortgage are fixed by the Code; they are purely statutory rights, and as the Code declares that such a mortgage is not void as to creditors or subsequent purchasers, for want of an actual and continued change of possession (§ 2957, Civ. Code) the title of the mortgagee is not affected for want of it. (Heyland v. Badger, supra.)

The object to be attained by requiring the recording of mortgages of personal property is the same as that in providing for the registration of mortgages of real estate. The same general principles are alike applicable in each case. The design is to give notice to the public of all existing encumbrances upon real or personal estate by mortgage. (Griffith v. Douglas, 73 Me. 534.)

The recording of the mortgage is therefore made by the Code the equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession, and creditors and subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers are bound by the notice which it imports. By and under it, the mortgagee is, in law, in possession of the chattels, and an officer having an attachment or execution against the mortgagor, is not authorized to levy upon them without first paying the mortgage debt. (§§ 2969, 2970, Civ. Code; Moore v. Murdock, 26 Cal. 515; Swanston v. Sublette, 1 Cal. 124.)

Plaintiffs were therefore entitled to judgment, and upon the admissions made at the trial as to the value of the property, and the waiver by them in open court of findings, judgment was rendered in their favor against the defendant for a return of the property, which, in fact, had already been returned to them, or its value and costs. But the judgment as entered was not in the alternative form required by section 667, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for that reason it must be reversed.

Order denying motion for a new trial affirmed. Judgment reversed and cause remanded with direction to enter judgment in proper form.

R. T. BUELL, APPELLANT, v. HENRY L. DODGE,
RESPONDENT.

CHANGE OF VENUE — AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS. — In the affidavit upon which the defendant moved for an order changing the place of trial, he says that he has fully and fairly stated "the case" in his action to E. S. Pillsbury, one of his counsel, and that after such statement he is advised by his said counsel, and verily believes that he has a good and substantial defense on the merits. Held, sufficient as an affidavit of merits.

APPEAL from an order of the Superior Court of Santa Barbara County changing the place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts appear sufficiently in the opinion of the court.

B. H. Taylor, A. Craig, and W. C. Stratton, for Appellant, cited Nickerson v. California Raisin Co. 61 Cal. 268.

Pillsbury & Titus, and Chas. Fernald, for Respondent, cited Butler v. Mitchell, 17 Wis. 52, 61; Waite's Practice, vol. 3, p. 49; Whittaker's Practice, (3d ed.) vol. 2, p. 336; Rickards v. Swetzer, 3 How. Pr. 412, 414; Jordan v. Garrison, 6 How. Pr. 6, 9.

McKEE, J. — On moving for an order to change the place of trial in this case, defendant filed an affidavit in which he affirmed that he had stated "the case," to his counsel, who advised him that he had a meritorious defense to the same. Objection was made that the affidavit was insufficient as an affidavit of merits, because it did not appear from it that the defendant had stated to his counsel the facts of the case."

In Nickerson v. The California Raisin Company, 61 Cal. 268, the party moved on an affidavit which contained the statement that he had fully and fairly stated his defense in the action. That was held to be insufficient, and we said: An affidavit of merits "must show that the defendant has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to his counsel, before the advice of the latter could amount to a prima facie showing of merits on defendant's behalf." Upon that as the correct rule of law it is contended that the affidavit in this case was insufficient, and that the order changing the place of trial was erroneous.

But a statement of the "case" is the equivalent of the statement of the facts of the case. "Case" is defined to be a question contested before a court of justice in an action or suit at law or in equity. (Bouv. Law Dic. "Case.") The primary meaning of the word, says the Supreme Court of New York, according to lexicographers, is cause. When applied to legal proceedings it imports a state of facts which furnishes occasion for the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of justice. In this, its generic sense, the word includes all cases special or otherwise. (Kundolf v. Thalheimer, 12 N. Y. 596.) When, therefore, the defendant averred in his affidavit that he had made a statement of the case, for the purpose of obtaining the advice of his counsel, the expression necessarily imports that he had made a statement of the facts out of which the case had arisen.

The affidavit was sufficient.

Order affirmed.

JAMES JOHNSTON ET AL., APPELLANTS, v. THE SAN FRANCISCO SAVINGS UNION, RESPONDENT.

FORECLOSURE — COMMUNITY PROPERTY — PARTIES. — The children of a deceased mother are tenants in common of the legal title with their father to the community property, with power in the father to convey or mortgage the whole estate so far as is necessary to provide for the debts of the community; and in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the father subsequent to the death of the mother, they are necessary parties.

Id. — JURISDICTION — INFANTS — SUMMONS. — Where such children are infants and are made parties defendant, they must be served with the summons. Until this is done the court has no jurisdiction of them, and the appointment of a guardian ad litem is void.

IN. — Nor does the court acquire jurisdiction of such infants where, after the trial, they petition to intervene and have a guardian ad litem appointed, and thereafter file an "amended answer" by a guardian appointed upon such petition.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

W. H. Tompkins, and Calhoun Benham, for Appellants.

The decree is void because the plaintiffs were not parties to the foreclosure suit.

1. The complaint did not make them parties by name.
2. They were not made parties by service of process under fictitious names.

3. The answer filed in their names was not an appearance. (7 Leigh, 225; 37 Cal. 348; 6 Cal. 415; 42 Cal. 578; 50 Cal. 588; 50 Cal. 578.)

4. There was no proof of the signatures to the petition for leave to intervene. (Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350; In re McKibbin, 12 Bank. Reg. 101; 9 Cal. 315; 9 Ark. 432; 20 Cal. 687; 9 Cal. 616; 4 Cold. 129; 12 Cal. 490; Shriver's Lessee v. Lyman, 2 How. 43.)

5. The minors never availed themselves of the leave to intervene in the foreclosure suit. No one signed the amended answer on their behalf, and that answer is the only pleading filed in their names after the leave to intervene was granted. (See amended answer, Trans. fol. 275.)

6. That amended answer did not make the minors parties. It was not an appearance for them.

7. The petition for leave to intervene was ultra vires of the minors. (Civ. Code, § 42; 43 Miss. 129, 257; 38 Ill. 150; 2 How. 60.)

8. The record does not show or raise any legal presumption that the guardian ad litem ever had notice of his appointment or ever assented to it.

A. & H. Campbell, and Fox & Kellogg, for Respondent.

The minor plaintiffs, John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston, were properly before the court in San Francisco Savings

Union v. Johnston et al. A guardian may be appointed in any case where the court or judge deems it expedient. (Code Civ. Proc. § 372.)

Both were over the age of fourteen years, and by their application claimed an interest in the action. (Code Civ. Proc. § 373.)

And as intervenors they became plaintiffs, demanding relief against both the original plaintiff and two of the defendants. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 387, 373.)

The title of their plea does not establish its character. Their plea was made and filed "as a ground of affirmative relief," and upon their application, stating "that they desire to intervene therein."

The facts set out will determine its character. (Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 311.)

The intervention and the answer of defendants raised the issue of title, and having raised it, they cannot complain that the court determined it. (Odd Fellows Sav. Bank v. Noonan, 11 Pac. C. L. J. 149.)

Treating the minors as defendants, the guardian ad litem was properly appointed. They were over the age of fourteen years, and the appointment was made on their application. For the purpose of such an application, the service of the summons was not required. (Code Civ. Proc. § 373.)

PER CURIAM.—Plaintiffs herein — who are the appellants — brought the action to quiet their title to an undivided portion of certain lands. The Superior Court entered a decree that the defendant's title be forever quieted as against plaintiffs, and all persons claiming under them, and that each of the plaintiffs, and all persons claiming under them, be barred and foreclosed from ever hereafter asserting any claim, etc. The plaintiffs are the children and heirs at law of James Johnston, senior, and Petra, his wife, both deceased. Petra died April 30, 1861, and James, senior, October 3, 1879. After the death of Petra, James, senior, borrowed certain moneys of the present defendant, to secure the payment of which he executed a mortgage upon the lands described in the complaint, which had been acquired during the existence of the marriage.

In the lifetime of the surviving husband, the present defendant commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage, and for the sale of all the lands to pay the mortgage debt. In that action certain proceedings were had which resulted in a decree directing a sale, upon which an order of sale issued; the lands were sold, and the plaintiff in that action, defendant in this, became the purchaser of the lands and received a deed therefor. When the action to foreclose was brought, and decree entered, two of the present plaintiffs — John F. and Francis T. Johnston — were infants.

The question whether the persons last named are bound by the decree of foreclosure must depend upon the petition filed in the foreclosure suit, purporting to be the petition of John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston for the appointment of their brother, James Johnston, junior, their guardian ad litem; the alleged written consent of the latter; the order of court appointing him guardian, etc.; the stipulation of May 28, 1877, and the amended answer of May 28, 1877. It is manifest that neither any unauthorized appearance by attorneys assuming to appear for the infants, nor any stipulation between the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit and the adult defendants therein, made before a guardian was appointed, could affect the rights of the infants.

On the 17th day of February, 1877, after the action to foreclose the mortgage had been tried, there was filed, in said action, a paper-writing which reads as follows:—

“The petition of John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston respectfully represents:—

“That they are minors and above fourteen years old; that they have an interest in the above entitled action; that they desire to intervene therein; that they respectfully request of the judge of this honorable court that he will appoint their brother, James Johnston, their guardian ad litem in said action to appear and represent their interests therein.

“JOHN FRANCIS JOHNSTON,

“FRANCIS THOMAS JOHNSTON.

“Dated San Mateo, February 16, 1877.”

Accompanying, or indorsed on which, was the following:—
“I hereby consent to act as guardian ad litem for my brothers,

John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston, in the foregoing entitled action.

“JAMES JOHNSTON, JR.

“Dated San Mateo, February 16, 1877.”

May 17, 1877, the district judge made this order:—

“John Francis Johnston and Francis Thomas Johnston, minors over the age of fourteen years, having heretofore, to wit, on February 17, 1877, filed in said action their petition and application for leave to intervene in said action and for an order appointing their brother, James Johnston, junior, their guardian ad litem in said action—to appear and represent them therein; and said James Johnston, junior, having filed in said action his written consent to such appointment: Now, on motion of Sol. A. Sharp, Esq., of counsel for said minors, it is ordered that said John Francis Johnston and Francis Thomas Johnston be and they are hereby allowed to intervene and file their intervention in said action, and said James Johnston, junior, is hereby appointed guardian ad litem in said action for said minors; and it is further ordered that such intervention be filed within five days from the date hereof.

“Dated April 30, 1877.

“(Signed) WM. P. DAINGERFIELD, District Judge.”

[Indorsed.]

“Order allowing J. F. Johnston and F. T. Johnston, minors, to intervene and appointing their guardian ad litem.

“Filed May 17, 1877.”

May 28, 1877, the following stipulation was filed:—

“It is mutually stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to this cause, their counsel and attorneys respectively, as follows:—

“First—That defendants, James Johnston, Jr., John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston (the two last by their guardian), shall file as of this date their amended answer and cross-complaint in this cause. That the verification of said answer and cross-complaint is waived.

“Second—That the defense of the Statute of Limitations in said answer be deemed denied, and that the answer of the plaintiff to the original cross-complaint be and is hereby taken as the answer of the plaintiff to the amended complaint.

"Third — That the answer of Parker Nicholson to the original cross-complaint of James Johnston, Jr., John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston, be taken as his answer to the amended cross-complaint this day filed.

On the same day an "amended answer," purporting to be the amended answer of "James Johnston, Jr., sued herein by the fictitious name of John Doe, John F. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of Richard Roe, and Francis T. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of John White," was filed. This amended answer had been verified by a third "James Johnston," on the 23d of February, 1877, nearly three months before the pretended appointment of a guardian ad litem, the verification stating that "said James Johnston, Jr., and guardian ad litem is absent from the city and county." Further verification was waived by the stipulation.

In Cook v. Norman, 50 Cal. 633, it was held that under the Act of 1850, "concerning husband and wife," it was competent for the surviving husband to convey the estate belonging to the late community, the purpose of such conveyance being to satisfy the debts, with the payment of which the community property was charged; and further, that a purchaser "in good faith" from the surviving husband was not bound to show, to support his title as against the children of the community, that the sale of the premises was, in point of fact, necessary to provide for the payment of the community debts.

Even if it be admitted that the rule which forbids the adjudication in a suit to foreclose a mortgage of a title adverse to that of the mortgagor is not jurisdictional, and that, if the holder of such adverse title has his day in court, and his title is held to be subject to the lien of the mortgage, he cannot afterwards attack the decree collaterally, he is certainly not bound by the decree, unless the court had acquired jurisdiction of his person and title. In the view we take of this case it is not necessary to decide whether the title of the infants was adverse to that of the surviving husband.

Assuming, for the purposes of this case, that, in the suit to foreclose the mortgage made upon the lands of the late community by the surviving husband, the burden was not cast upon the mortgagee of alleging or proving that the money paid was necessary to provide for the payment of community debts, but that it was for the children, by way of defense, to prove that the mortgagees had notice that there were no community debts, or that the debts were of less amount, the present plaintiffs were not only proper but necessary parties to the foreclosure suit. The last clause of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no bearing upon the question. The children of James and Petra Johnston were not holding an unrecorded conveyance from the mortgagor, nor were they persons having a mere lien upon the property mortgaged. On the death of their mother they became owners of one half the community property subject to the community debts, and liable, perhaps, to become subject to the debts by their father substituted for the community debts. If their father had power to mortgage their interest in the lands to raise money to pay off prior debts of the former community, it was upon the theory that the law made him their agent for that purpose. As to the legal title of an undivided moiety of the lands, descent was cast upon them on the death of their mother. The object of the suit was to sell and transfer their title as well as that of their father. They had an interest to protect it; to deny the existence of the mortgage, or to reduce the amount alleged to be secured by it; to prove that there were no community debts, or that they were less than the advance made by the mortgagee, and that the mortgagee had notice of the facts with reference to such indebtedness; that their father had exceeded his limited authority, and that the mortgagee knew it was not a mortgage in "good faith." As they were necessary parties to the foreclosure suit, the decree therein was void with respect to one half the lands mortgaged, unless the court acquired jurisdiction of the infants. They and their father were tenants in common in the legal title, with power in the latter to convey or mortgage the estate of the former, so far as was necessary, to provide for the debts of the community. He mortgaged their interest with his own, if the mortgagee had no notice that the community was not indebted. The mortgage created a lien on the lands of the children, if the necessity existed which authorized him to execute it, or, in any event, if the mortgagee was innocent.

Whether, however, the title of the children was adverse to that of the father, within the meaning of the rule to which we have adverted, or the mortgage is to be treated as executed by the children, in case the mortgagee advanced its money in "good faith," they are not bound by the decree, unless the court had jurisdiction over them and their property.

The action to foreclose the mortgage was entitled, "The San Francisco Savings Union, plaintiff, v. James Johnston (Senior), Parker Nicholson, Michael Kane, John Doe, Richard Roe, John White, John Brown, John Green, John Black, John Blue, and John Yellow, the last eight named of whom are sued by fictitious names for the reason that plaintiff does not know their true names, defendants."

None of the present plaintiffs were made defendants in the foreclosure suit by name, nor was any one of them served with summons therein. The present plaintiff, James Johnston, Jr., was of full age when that suit was brought, voluntarily appeared therein, and it may be admitted is bound by the judgment. But, as we have seen, the others of the present plaintiffs were infants. There appears in the judgment roll in the action to foreclose a writing purporting to be "the joint and several answers" of "James Johnston, Jr., sued herein by the fictitious name of John Doe, John F. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of Richard Roe, and Francis T. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of John White." The writing is signed, "Sol. A. Sharp, Walter Tompkins, attorneys for defendants James Johnston, Jr., et als." It is plain that, as we have said, this paper, filed long before there was any attempt to appoint a guardian, and which does not purport to be by a guardian, gave no jurisdiction of the infants. The amended answer, filed after the attempted appointment of guardian, purporting to be the answer of "James Johnston, Jr., sued herein by the fictitious name of John Doe, John F. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of Richard Roe, and Francis T. Johnston, sued herein by the fictitious name of John White, by their guardian ad litem James Johnston, Jr.," is almost a literal copy of the former answer, with the exception that after the names of the defendants are inserted the words "by their guardian ad litem James Johnston, Jr." The amended answer is what it purports to be, amended answer by persons averring themselves to be defendants, sued by certain fictitious names. The person who assumed thus to amend a former answer, or to answer for infant defendants, was never legally appointed their guardian. If the order appointing him can be construed an attempt to make him guardian ad litem for infant defendants, it was void, simply because the infants had never been served with summons. (Code Civ. Proc. § 373.) The court acquires jurisdiction of the persons of infant defendants so as to authorize the appointment of a guardian ad litem for them only by service of summons upon the infants. Even the stipulation between the attorneys for the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit and the alleged guardian did not provide for the filing by him of a complaint in intervention, but for the filing of "an answer and cross-complaint." True the judge's order of May 17, 1877, made on motion of "Sol. A. Sharp, of counsel for said minors," was to the effect "that the said John F. and Francis T. Johnston be allowed to intervene and file their intervention in said action, and said James Johnston, Jr., is hereby appointed guardian ad litem in said action." Even if the order of the judge be considered an order of the court, and the order permitting intervention after the trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 387) be treated as only erroneous, and not in excess of jurisdiction, and if it be assumed that infants seeking to intervene can be said to be plaintiffs, for whom a guardian can be appointed under the first subdivision of section 373 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no complaint in intervention was in fact filed. The court did not acquire jurisdiction by styling an "amended answer" "a complaint by intervenors." Counsel in the foreclosure suit, discovering after trial of the case that they had failed to make the infants parties, adopted means—the best, perhaps, at their command—to secure a judgment which should conclude the infants. But there are no means of avoiding the provision of the Code which requires service of summons upon infant defendants. If it be true that they were necessary parties to the action, by reason of the law as laid down in Cook v. Norman, supra, they, in their capacity of defendants, could have made the defense set forth in the "amended answer and cross-complaint," had they been brought within the jurisdiction.

But the judgment in the mortgage suit only purports to bar the infants as defendants. The judgment recites—"This cause coming on regularly to be heard . . . upon the pleadings of the respective parties, the minor defendants, John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston, appearing and being represented by James Johnson, Jr., their guardian ad litem, duly appointed, and Sol. A. Sharp, Esq., and Walter Tompkins, Esq., their attorneys," etc. In a subsequent place the present plaintiffs are mentioned as "intervenor," and after providing for a sale of the mortgaged premises, etc., the decree proceeds to order and adjudge: "That the defendants and all persons claiming or to claim from or under them or any of them . . . be forever barred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption and claim of in and to said portion or portions of said mortgaged premises," etc. The infants were not both defendants and intervenors. If they were defendants they were not barred, because they had not been served with summons. If intervenors, the decree does not bar them by its terms. It will not do to say that the mere name given them in different portions of the roll is entirely immaterial. The court was dealing with the rights of infants, over whom it could acquire jurisdiction only after strict compliance with the statute.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

NICHOLA FERREA, RESPONDENT, v. ANTHONY CHABOT ET AL., APPELLANTS.

JUDGMENT — EVIDENCE — DAMAGES. — In an action to recover damages for the breach of an agreement to supply water to irrigate a tract of land owned by the plaintiff, which, together with an adjoining tract purchased by him after the making of the agreement, was demised to a third person under a lease containing a covenant on the part of the plaintiff to supply the same quantity of water to run all the year round for the irrigation of both tracts, a judgment for damages in favor of the tenant against the plaintiff for a breach of the covenant caused by the breach of the agreement, is not admissible in evidence to prove the damages resulting from the breach of the latter, the covenant being different from the agreement as to the quantity of land to be irrigated, and the time during which the water should be supplied. A judgment can only be used as evidence in relation to matters directly determined by it. The provisions of our Code as to the effect of judgments are merely declaratory of the common-law rule on the subject.

PENDENCY OF ACTION — NOTICE. — Verbal notice of an action, the judgment in which may bind the person notified, though not a party to the record, held to be sufficient.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to abate a nuisance as well as for the damages resulting from the breach of the agreement in question, but the judgment rendered was for damages only. The defendant Chabot, who made the agreement with the plaintiff, and acquired thereby certain rights and privileges in consideration of his promise to supply water, subsequently assigned the agreement to his co-defendant, "The Vallejo City Water Company." The evidence shows that both defendants had verbal notice of the action between the plaintiff and his tenant in time to defend the same.

The case was ably argued by the counsel for the respective parties, but the opinion of the court is so full and complete upon the points decided, it is unnecessary to give the arguments of counsel or the authorities cited by them.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, and Rhodes & Barstow, for Appellants.

B. S. Brooks, for Respondent.

MoKee, J.—On the 3d of February, 1870, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the following contract:—

“Whereas, Anthony Chabot is about to construct a reservoir on the Sulphur Spring Creek, about three miles northerly from Vallejo, in Sonoma County, California, and lay down pipes to lead the waters into the city of Vallejo; and, whereas Nicola Ferrea owns a certain piece of land on the said Sulphur Spring Creek, at a point below where said reservoir is about to be constructed by the said Anthony Chabot. Now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth that the said Ferrea, as party of the first part, in consideration of the payment to him of three hundred dollars, and of the performance, by the said Anthony Chabot, the party of the second part, of the conditions and covenants hereinafter named, has agreed to, and doth hereby, give, grant, sell, and convey unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, the right of way to lay pipes from the reservoir aforesaid, of the said party of the second part, in a westerly direction through the northern portion of the land of said party of the first part, as now designated by a stake; and also allow the said party of the second part the privilege of building a dam on the Sulphur Spring Creek, and within the premises of the said party of the second part, and construct a reservoir therein, and gather and preserve all the water coming down said creek, and its tributaries and all other sources, subject, however, to the following agreements and conditions, to be kept and performed by the said party of the second part, and which form part of the consideration herein, to wit:—

“First. In laying down his pipes, the said party of the second part agrees to keep them free from obstructing the cultivation of the soil of said party of the first part.

“Second. The said party of the second part agrees to supply the said party of the first part water for irrigation of his premises, said water to be delivered on the premises of said party of the first part, through a four-inch pipe, and as high on the said premises as it will naturally flow; and also to supply the said party of the first part with the necessary water for family use in his dwelling-house, through a service pipe from the main pipe; and also to supply said party of the first part with the necessary water for stock and family use on the premises now owned by him, and formerly known as the Riordan Ranch, the cost of pipes and the laying of them to be at the cost of said party of the second part."

The "piece of land" owned by Ferrea, on the creek at a point below where the reservoir was about to be constructed, consisted of a tract of land, containing twenty-five acres, which was known as the "Italian Garden." There Ferrea resided, and, at the time of the agreement, the garden constituted the "premises" on which Chabot covenanted to supply Ferrea with water, for family use in his dwelling-house, and for the irrigation of said premises. The agreement was recorded, and thereafter Chabot constructed his reservoir, laid his pipes, and had the work completed and in operation by October 1, 1871.

Adjoining these premises of Ferrea lay a tract of twenty-four acres of land, which Ferrea was not the owner of at the date of the agreement; but after the execution of the agreement — some time in August, 1870 — he purchased that twenty-four-acre tract and added it to the garden tract; and being the owner and in possession of both tracts, containing forty-nine acres, he demised them, on the 17th of October, 1870, to Benedetti Passalacqua, for the term of six years from November, 1870, for a rent reserved of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month; and, by the lease, covenanted to supply the lessee with water, to run the year round, through a four-inch pipe for the irrigation of said forty-nine acres; that in case of a failure of the water to run during any portion of said time he would be responsible for all damages occasioned thereby. Passalacqua entered into possession under the lease, and has since kept and maintained possession; but he refused to pay the rent reserved by the lease, because of a failure to supply the water necessary for the irrigation of the leased premises; and for the damages sustained by him by reason of that failure he brought suit on the 21st of June, 1871, against Ferrea, in which he recovered judgment on the 8th of February, 1875, against Ferrea for seven thousand dollars and costs; and in a subsequent suit in equity between the same parties the damages recovered in that action at law were, by decree of the court in equity, set off against the rent reserved in the lease.

That judgment for seven thousand dollars and costs was offered and admitted in evidence on the trial of this case, over the objections of the defendants; and it appears to have been the only evidence of the damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the breach of the covenants contained in the agreement of the 3d of February, 1870.

The admission of the judgment in evidence against the defendants is one of the assignments of error.

By the Code a judicial record is made conclusive or prima facie as evidence between parties and privies. Section 1908 declares "that every domestic judgment, and final order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties, and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action or proceeding, litigating for the same thing, under the same title and in the same capacity, provided they have notice, actual or constructive, of the pendency of the action or proceeding." And section 1909 declares that all other judicial orders of a court or judge of this State are, in respect to the matter directly determined, prima facie between the same parties and privies. Sections 1910 and 1912 declare that "the parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, and a judgment or other determination could in that case have been made between them alone, though other parties were joined with both or either"; and "whenever, pursuant to the preceding sections, a party is bound by a record, and such party stands in the relation of a surety for another, the latter is also bound from the time that he has notice of the action or proceeding and an opportunity, at the surety's request, to join in the defense." But it is also declared (§ 1911) that "that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto." Whether, therefore, the record admitted in evidence was conclusive, or prima facie only, it was, if admissible at all against the defendants, confined to that which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto. These sections of the Code are merely declaratory of the common-law rule, that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is, as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive between the same parties, upon the same matter directly in question in another court.

Nominally the parties to the two suits were not the same, but it is claimed that in law they were the same, because the parties in this suit, as to the supply of water, which was the subject-matter involved in both suits, stood toward each other in such a relation that it was the duty of the defendants, when Passalacqua sued Ferrea for a breach of his covenant, to have defended the suit, upon receiving notice thereof and having an opportunity to make a defense; and having had notice they were bound by the judgment.

In fact, as found by the court, "the defendants had notice of the suits brought by Passalacqua, and took upon themselves the management, charge, and control of the defense of said suits." But it is contended that the finding is based on evidence of a verbal notice, and that the notice necessary to bind a person by a judgment to which he was not made a party must be in writing. But in Miner v. Clark, 15 Wend. 125, the court say: "The object of the notice is to inform the grantor that a suit has been brought against the grantee. The grantor is supposed to be better able to defend such a suit, and by his covenant he undertakes to warrant and defend the grantee against the claim of all persons. A parol notice gives information to the grantor quite as well as a written one, and as there is no technical rule requiring such a notice to be in writing, no writing is necessary; and if we regard the reason and propriety of the case, we come to the conclusion that the grantor must defend or not at his peril after notice." That case was referred to in Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 226. It is true, in that case there was no notice, written or verbal. But in Sampson v. Ohleyer, 22 Cal. 204, and Wheelock v. Warschauer, 34 Cal. 265, verbal notice, by a tenant to his landlord, of a suit brought for recovery of the land, was held sufficient to bind the latter by any recovery in the suit.

Assuming, then, that such a relation existed between the parties to this suit as bound them by the judgment in that, and that the defendants were concluded from questioning the matter determined therein, the question remains, did the matter determined include the damages sustained by the plaintiff herein by reason of the breach of the covenants for which he has sued the defendants? We think it did not. That judgment was founded on a different contract from the one which was in controversy in this case. In this, the covenant was to supply Ferrea with water, through a service pipe from the main pipe, for family use, and through a four-inch pipe raised as high on the premises known as the "Italian Garden," as the water would naturally flow, for the irrigation of those premises. The covenant was intended for the use and enjoyment of those premises in the manner and for the purpose intended by the parties at the time of the execution of the agreement; it extended only to those premises, and did not include or operate upon the twenty-four acres of land of which Ferrea was not the owner. But the subsequent demise to Passalacqua was of the "Italian Garden," and "the twenty-four acres adjoining and confining with the said garden . . . making in all forty-nine acres of land, with four inches of running water for all year round until the expiration of the lease;" and if the water should fail to run during said period of time or any portion thereof, Ferrea bound himself to be responsible and liable for all damages sustained. And the breach assigned in the Passalacqua suit was that Ferrea had broken his covenant in failing to supply Passalacqua with the stream of water for the purpose of irrigation upon said demised lands during the term for which said lands were demised; and the recovery was for loss sustained on the forty-nine acres.

Assuming, therefore, that the supply of water was the same in both suits, yet the covenants were not the same, and the causes of action were different. In this, the cause of action was to recover damages sustained by reason of the failure to supply water for irrigating twenty-five acres of land. In that, the cause of action was to recover for the loss sustained by reason of the failure to supply the same quantity of water for the irrigation of forty-nine acres; and the recovery was of the damages assessed on that basis. But that did not include, as a distinct fact, the damages sustained on twenty-five acres. The question of the damages done to the "premises" of Ferrea at the date of the covenant to him by Chabot, was not raised, tried, or determined in that action. It was raised, for the first time, in this case. It was, therefore, only an incidental or collateral fact to the Passalacqua case; it was not a fact found or necessary to be found in that case. But the rule is well settled that a judgment is not evidence of any matter incidentally cognizable in the action in which it was rendered, or collateral to it, or inferable from it by argument, or which rests in evidence. When a judgment in one action, says the Supreme Court of the United States, is offered in evidence in a subsequent action between the same parties upon a different demand, it operates as an estoppel only upon the matter actually at issue and determined in the original action. (Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 423.) And in Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, it is said: A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties; but to this operation of the judgment it must appear, either upon the face of the record, or be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large and open to a new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined. To the same effect are Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351; Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal 515; Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 450; Nims v. Vaughn, 40 Mich. 356; Jacobson v. Miller, 41 Mich. 90.

The judgment roll in Passalacqua v. Ferrea was, therefore, inadmissible as evidence to prove the averment of damage; and as there is no evidence in support of the finding that the plaintiff sustained $10,000 damages, by reason of the breach of the covenants of the defendant Chabot, the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

R. E. COLE ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. HENRY D. BACON ET AL., HENRY D. BACON, APPELLANT.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — JOINT AGREEMENT CREATING AN AGENCY.—When several persons enter into a joint agreement appointing an agent to sell property, and some of them refuse to unite in an action against the agent to recover money received by him on a sale of the property pursuant to the agreement, the fact that they have so dealt with the agent as to preclude them from maintaining such an action does not deprive the others of the right to sue for their proportionate share of the money.

GENERAL FINDING — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.—On the trial of this action, special findings were waived, and the court found generally in favor of the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment accordingly. On motion for a new trial, the finding was attacked as being contrary to the evidence in certain particulars, but the evidence was substantially conflicting. Held, that the finding implied the existence of every fact necessary to support the judgment, and that in view of the conflict in the evidence, the finding could not be disturbed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The action was brought to recover of the defendant Bacon certain money alleged to have been received by him in the capacity of agent, and fraudulently appropriated to his own use. It was averred in the complaint that Bacon and eleven other persons had subscribed for the capital stock of a corporation known as the Terminal Railroad Company, each subscribing for one-twelfth of the stock, and being desirous to dispose of the interests thus acquired by them, they agreed between themselves that the same should be sold jointly, and Bacon was appointed by the other subscribers as their agent to carry out the agreement; that he subsequently effected a sale for the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which was paid to him by the purchasers, but instead of accounting for the sum actually received, he falsely represented to the others that the price obtained was only forty-seven thousand seven hundred dollars, and induced them to settle with him on the basis of such representation. This is sufficient to show the nature of the action, and a more particular statement of the facts set forth in the complaint is unnecessary. Seven of the subscribers alleged to have been defrauded refused to join in the action as plaintiffs, and were made defendants, the plaintiffs being two of the subscribers and the personal representatives of two others deceased.

Bacon filed an answer denying the allegations of fraud contained in the complaint, and averring that the transaction with the other subscribers was a purchase by him of their respective interests, and that the sale afterwards made was on his own account.

The other defendants also answered repudiating the alleged fraud in respect to themselves, and sustaining the answer of Bacon as to his position in the premises.

The instrument of the 14th of April, 1871, referred to in the opinion of the court, was a transfer to the purchasers in pursuance of the sale made by Bacon. This instrument did not state the consideration for the sale, and the complaint alleged that the parties who signed it in connection with Bacon did so at his request. Both of the answers, after stating the purchase by Bacon from the other subscribers, averred that no transfer had been made by the latter to the former in pursuance of such purchase, and that the instrument was signed by all the subscribers in order to avoid the necessity of two transfers instead of one.

The additional facts, so far as they are required to explain the decision, appear in the opinion of the court.

Voluminous briefs were filed by the respective counsel, but in view of the grounds of the decision, it would be useless to give the arguments without an analysis of the evidence, which is impracticable.

Wilson & Wilson, and McAllister & Bergin, for Appellant.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, and H. E. Highton, for Respondents.

PER CURIAM.—The instrument of the 14th day of April, 1871, signed by all of the subscribers to the capital stock of the "Terminal Railroad Company," except the defendant Bacon, operated to transfer to Stanford, Huntington and Hopkins all of the stock of such subscribers.

If it be admitted that the relations of the defendant Bacon and the other subscribers are not to be ascertained by reference to the resolutions of the directors of the corporation, but depended upon subsequent contracts between him and the stockholders, the plaintiffs acquired rights against him from their actual contracts with him, as evidenced by the writing and otherwise. If the sale was by each of the plaintiffs to defendant Bacon of his portion of the shares of the stock, and the instrument was executed to Stanford, Huntington and Hopkins, as a matter of convenience, and to avoid the necessity of a transfer first to Bacon and then by him to his vendees, the mere form of the transaction did not change its real character. But the persons who subscribed the instrument of the 14th of April, 1871, had the right to pool their stock, and to dispose of it in the aggregate, and the instrument purports to be a bill of sale or assignment of all their stock, executed by them jointly. That defendant negotiated the sale to Stanford, Huntington and Hopkins, in some capacity, is admitted. There is evidence in the transcript that he acted for them, as their agent or broker, and not for himself. Assuming the testimony of plaintiffs to be true — and in view of the judgment of the court below we must assume their testimony to be true — to the effect that they individually signed the instrument, with the understanding that it should take effect only in case the other subscribers to the stock should sign it, and the others did sign it, the instrument (so far as plaintiffs and Bacon are concerned) constitutes a joint sale to Stanford, Huntington and Hopkins, whatever private arrangements might have been entered into between defendant Bacon and others of the subscribers to the instrument.

As between the plaintiffs and defendant Bacon, the court may have found that the latter was the agent for them, and of the other subscribers, authorized to make joint sale of the stock of the corporation held by them and the other subscribers, and that he did in fact make such sale, because there was evidence tending to prove that he induced plaintiffs to believe such was the actual relation between them. The question is not whether plaintiffs could assert, as against the other subscribers to the instrument, that there was a joint sale, but whether they can assert this against the defendant Bacon. He — assuming plaintiffs' testimony to be true — had no understanding with plaintiffs, severally, that they should sell their stock to him. On the contrary it was distinctly understood that they, with the other parties in interest, should sell all their stock for a named sum to Stanford, Huntington and Hopkins; such sale to be evidenced by the signatures of all to the instrument so often referred to. There was nothing in the writing itself to indicate a different arrangement; on the contrary it purported to be a sale by all to the three persons mentioned. Under the circumstances the contract between plaintiffs and the defendant Bacon must be construed to have been what the former understood it to be, and what he must have known they understood it to be. They could not be deprived of their rights under it by means of agreements, unknown to them, between Bacon and others of those who executed the agreement of April 14th, which was executed by the others as it was agreed by plaintiffs and Bacon it should be executed. As between plaintiffs and Bacon, the legal effect of the arrangement was that he, as agent for them, and the others, for whom he asserted he had, or would, secure authority to act, should make a joint sale of the stock. The sale made was made under such power, and, like every other similar agent, he was liable to account to his principals for the proceeds of the sale. If the other parties chose to waive their rights, or, rather, by reason of separate private agreements, lost the power to assert any rights as joint vendors, this did not operate to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefits of the only contracts they entered into.

Of course, the foregoing is based upon the assumption of the existence of facts such as are necessarily implied by the general findings and judgment of the Superior Court, since there was at least a substantial conflict in the evidence.

Judgment and order affirmed.

A. S. HALLIDIE, APPELLANT, v. SUTTER STREET RAILROAD COMPANY, RESPONDENT.

CONTRACT — EXECUTORY SALE — PLEADING.— The plaintiff agreed for a stipulated price to manufacture a steel rope or cable suitable in all respects for the operation of defendant's street cars, and to deliver it to defendant for trial. If found suitable, defendant agreed to accept it, but if it proved unfit, it was to be returned to the plaintiff. After testing the rope, defendant refused to accept it, and returned it to the plaintiff, who took it back, and brought this action for goods sold and delivered. The court below found that defendant rejected the rope because of its unfitness for the purpose intended. Held, first, that the contract was executory, and that such an action would not lie. Second, that the return of the rope to plaintiff, and his acceptance of it, was a rescission of the contract by mutual consent.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Estee & Boalt, for Appellant.

Lloyd & Woods, for Respondent.

McKee, J.— Action to recover three thousand eight hundred and eight dollars for eleven thousand four hundred feet of three-inch flexible steel rope, which the plaintiff claims to have sold and delivered to the defendant at its special instance and request. By the answer defendant denied a sale, and affirmed that the rope was made under a contract by which the plaintiff agreed, for a stipulated price, to manufacture in the best manner and of the best quality of steel wire, a steel rope or cable, which would be in all respects suitable for operating and running the cars of the Sutter Street Railroad up and down Sutter Street, between Sansome Street and Larkin Street, in the city and county of San Francisco, and, when manufactured, to deliver the same to defendant for trial; and if, after a fair trial of the rope, it was found to be suitable for the purposes of the road, the defendant agreed to accept the same, and to pay the plaintiff the price agreed upon; but if found unsuitable, the rope was to be returned to the plaintiff.

As shaped by the pleadings the case presented for consideration the question, whether the transaction between the parties was an executed or an executory sale. The plaintiff contends that it was a contract of sale with warranty. (§ 1770, Civ. Code.) If that was the nature of the transaction the title to the property passed to the defendant, and plaintiff had a cause of action for goods sold and delivered, but the defendant, in case of a breach of the subsidiary agreement of warranty, had the right to return the property, especially if a return had been stipulated, or to sue on the breach of warranty for damages. (Perley v. Balch, 23 Pick. 283; Dorr v. Fisher, 1 Cush. 271; Bryant v. Isburgh, 13 Gray, 607.)

If, however, defendant merely agreed to buy the rope on condition that it would be fit and suitable for the purpose of its road, and time was given to test it for that purpose, then the title to the rope did not pass until the rope was accepted. If accepted the sale was complete, and liability for the price agreed upon then attached; but if not accepted there was no sale, and the plaintiff's remedy was for a breach of the agreement. (Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136.)

The difference between an actual bargain and sale, and a contract for sale of an article to be manufactured under an agreement to sell and buy is thus stated by Shaw, C. J., in Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 205: "When the contract is a contract of sale either of an article then existing, or of articles which the vendor usually has for sale in the course of his business, the statute (of Frauds) applies to the contract as well where it is to be executed at a future time as when it is to be executed immediately. But where it is an agreement with a workman to put materials together and construct an article for the employer, whether at an agreed price or not, though in common parlance it may be called a purchase and sale of the article to be completed in future, it is not a sale until an actual or constructive delivery and acceptance." (See also Spencer v. Cone, 1 Met. 283; Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450; Hight v. Ripley, 19 Me. 137; Ficket v. Swift, 41 Me. 68.) And that is the rule formulated by section 1141, Civil Code: "Title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale . . . of personal property only when the buyer has accepted the thing, or when the seller has completed it and offered it to the buyer, with intent to transfer the title thereto in the manner prescribed by the chapter upon Offer of Performance." (See also § 1729, Civ. Code.)

Here, as found by the court, the rope was manufactured and delivered to the defendant in performance by the plaintiff of the contract set up in the defendant's answer. Upon delivery of the rope, the plaintiff had executed the contract on his part, but the contract was still executory on the part of the defendant. The defendant was under no obligation to perform unless it found the rope to be what was bargained for; for it was upon that condition the defendant promised to accept the rope and pay for it. But the court found that the rope was unsuitable for the purpose of the defendant's road; and that, because of its unfitness for that purpose, the defendant refused to accept it and returned it to the plaintiff, who took it back.

Although based on conflicting evidence as to the facts, yet the findings are sufficiently sustained by the evidence; and upon the facts found it is clear that the executory contract between the parties had never been performed. The defendant refused to accept, there was therefore no executed sale; the relation of vendor and vendee did not exist between the parties, and the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, was not for goods sold and delivered, but for a breach of the agreement, if the defendant was at fault in refusing to accept; or if the defendant had damaged the rope by a wrongful use of the same before it had been returned to the plaintiff, liability would attach for such damages.

But as the condition on which the rope had been made and delivered was not complied with, the defendant had the right to reject the rope (Brown v. Foster, supra), and rescind the contract; and when the rope was rejected by the defendant and returned to the plaintiff who took it back, there was, in fact, a rescission by mutual consent (§ 1689, Civ. Code), and as to the contract the parties were in statu quo.

Judgment and order affirmed.

O. H. JOHNSON, PETITIONER, v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
RESPONDENT.

CONTEMPT — POWER OF THE COURT. — A defendant in an action for a divorce cannot be denied the process provided by law for procuring the testimony of witnesses residing beyond the jurisdiction of the State, on the ground that he has not obeyed the order of the court requiring him to pay the plaintiff her costs and counsel fees.

Id. — SERVICE. — Before a party can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of court, such order must be served upon him. The mere delivery to a person in another State of a certified copy of the order is not such a service as the law requires. (SHARPSTEIN, J., and McKEN, J.)

APPLICATION for writ of mandate.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

T. Z. Blakeman, for Petitioner.

John D. Whaley, for Respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J.—Application for a writ of mandate. It appears by the petition for the writ that on the 28th of September, 1882, the wife of the petitioner commenced an action for divorce against him, and that, on the 2d of November, 1882, he, by his attorney, filed an answer to the complaint denying some of the material allegations thereof. On the 11th of November, 1882, the plaintiff's attorney in that action served upon the defendant's attorney therein notice of a motion to have the court allow the plaintiff therein a reasonable sum for expenses and counsel fees in said action. Said motion was heard on the 22d of November, 1882, and an order was then made that the defendant in said action pay to the plaintiff therein fifty dollars costs and fifty dollars counsel fees. A certified copy of said order was sent to the State of Missouri, and there delivered to the defendant in that action, who is the petitioner herein. He has never complied with said order. It is alleged in the petition that the petitioner has never at any time during any of the proceedings in said action, or during its pendency been within the State of California.

On the 23d of February, after serving due notice of his motion, petitioner applied to said Superior Court in which said action was pending for an order directing a commission to issue to take the depositions of certain witnesses residing in Missouri, whose names were stated in said notice of motion. The court refused to order such commission to issue, on the ground that petitioner was in contempt for not obeying said order requiring him to pay plaintiff in said action her costs and counsel fees.

These are, in substance, the facts upon which the petitioner bases his application for a writ to compel said Superior Court to make the necessary order for the issuance of a commission to take the depositions of his said witnesses. The respondent demurs to the petition on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the writ prayed for.

Ordinarily, a person sued has a right to defend, and the law has made provision for procuring the testimony of witnesses both within and without the jurisdiction of this State. Whether a defendant in an action for divorce can legally be denied the process which the law has provided for procuring the testimony of witnesses residing beyond the jurisdiction of this State, on the ground that he has not obeyed such an order as the one above mentioned, of which a certified copy was delivered to him in the State of Missouri, is the question which the record presents for adjudication.

Cases are not rare in which courts of equity have denied to parties in contempt, for disobedience of orders, all the rights to which said parties would otherwise be entitled; and even have gone so far as to strike out the answers of parties so in contempt. But "in this State the power of courts to punish for contempt has been regulated by statute. It is provided that, when one is adjudged guilty of contempt, he may be punished by a fine of not exceeding five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for not exceeding five days, except when the contempt consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in his power to perform, in which case he may be imprisoned until he have performed it." (Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475.)

The Code states what shall constitute a contempt, and prescribes how a party committing it shall be punished; and it provides that "no statute, law, or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject; but in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this State, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated." (Code Civ. Proc. § 18.)

In view of these provisions can it properly be held that a law or rule which authorized a punishment for contempt different from the punishment prescribed by the Code was not abrogated by the adoption of the Code? If so, what force and effect is to be given to the clause above quoted? The suggestion that a disobedient party, situated as the petitioner is, could not be punished in either of the modes prescribed by the Code, and would escape altogether unless he could be punished in some other way, is one for legislative rather than judicial consideration.

But there are other difficulties in the way of sustaining the action of the respondent herein. It does not appear that there was any service of the order which the petitioner failed to comply with, unless the delivery of a copy of it to him in the State of Missouri constituted a service. The six sections of the Code which immediately precede section 1016 provide several modes in which notices and papers may be served, but those provisions do not apply to the service "of any paper to bring a party into contempt." And where a party has an attorney in an action, service of papers to bring such party into contempt cannot be made upon such attorney. (Code Civ. Proc. § 1015.) Before a party can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of court, such order must be served upon him, and the mere delivery to a person in Missouri of a certified copy of an order made by a court in this State, would not be a service upon him within the meaning of the law.

Finally, we do not think that the remedy adopted by the respondent to enforce a compliance with the order of the court is applicable to a divorce case. In this State "no divorce can be granted upon the default of the defendant." (Civ. Code, § 130.) The policy of the law, doubtless, is that a divorce shall not be granted until after a fair and full hearing of all the material and relevant testimony which either party may be ready or willing to introduce upon the issues raised by the pleadings. It cannot be granted "upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties." But if the position of respondent be tenable, a divorce can be granted in a case in which a defendant is denied the privilege of introducing competent evidence to disprove all the material allegations of the complaint. And we are not advised that the petitioner, who has denied all the material allegations of the complaint filed against him, may not, if an opportunity is afforded him, fully establish his defense by competent proof. To deprive him of that opportunity in a divorce case, in which he is defendant, would, in our opinion, be to contravene the plain policy of the law.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

McKEE, J., concurred.

THORNTON, J.—I concur in the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion on the last ground stated in it.

ERWIN DAVIS, PETITIONER, v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
RESPONDENT.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — STATUTE — MANDAMUS. — On the authority of Fraser v. Freelon, 58 Cal. 644, held, that the constitutionality of the act creating the municipal court of appeals in San Francisco cannot be determined in a proceeding by mandamus, the present Supreme Court being governed, in regard to the construction and effect of the former Constitution, and the mode in which such questions may be presented, by the decisions of the Supreme Court created and existing under that instrument.

MUNICIPAL COURT OF APPEALS — TRANSFER OF CAUSES FROM COUNTY COURT — JURISDICTION. — The municipal court of appeals acquired jurisdiction of causes, pending in the county court, by operation of the statute creating the municipal court of appeals. An order transferring them was unnecessary.

APPLICATION for writ of mandate to compel the Superior Court to try an action, wherein the petitioner was a party, notwithstanding the same had been tried by the municipal court of appeals prior to the adoption of the present Constitution. The remaining facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. Howard Smith, for Petitioner.

The validity of a statute may be tested in an action between private parties. (Sill v. Village of Corning, 15 N. Y. 297; Rabe v. Fyler, 10 Smedes & M. 440; Houston v. Royston, 7 How. (Miss.) 543; Mulligan v. Smith, 59 Cal. 206; Dawson v. Horan, 51 Barb. 459; Klokke v. Dodge, 103 Ill. 125.)

Lloyd Baldwin, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.—1. It is urged that the Act of April 1, 1878, creating the municipal court of appeals in San Francisco, was violative of the former Constitution. (Stats. 1877-78, p. 947.) Since the organization of the present Supreme Court it has been repeatedly held that we would follow, as authoritative, the construction placed upon any provision of the Constitution of 1849, by the highest judicial tribunal created by and under that Constitution. By parity of reasoning we are bound by the views of the former Supreme Court, with reference to the mode in which the invalidity of a legislative act, or its repugnancy to a clause of the then existing Constitution could be presented or insisted upon.

In Fraser v. Freelon, 53 Cal. 644, it was held that the invalidity of the statute in question could not be determined upon the return to a writ of certiorari. It was there said the "people" were interested in the question whether the statute prescribing the jurisdiction of the court was constitutional; that the question could only be decided in an appropriate form of action brought in the name of the people, or to which the people were made a party. It is manifest that every consideration which induced the former Supreme Court to refuse to inquire into the question of the constitutionality of the statute in a proceeding by writ of review, applies with redoubled force to the present, which is a proceeding by mandamus, by one of the parties to an action originally brought before the justices' court, to compel the Superior Court—as successor of the county court—to try the action, notwithstanding the same was transferred to the municipal court of appeals, and tried de novo in that court prior to the adoption of the present Constitution.

2. It is urged that the municipal court never acquired jurisdiction of the action transferred to it, because, although that action was pending in the county court before the creation of the municipal court, no special order was made by the former court transferring it to the latter. We find nothing in the act creating the municipal court (Stata. 1877-78, p. 947), which requires any such order, general or special. The twelfth section of that act provides: "Immediately after the organization of said court the clerk of the county court shall transmit to said municipal court of appeals all papers in civil cases of appeal then pending and undetermined," etc. The direction of the statute is to the county clerk, who is clerk of both courts.

Fraser v. Freelon, above referred to, has sometimes been supposed to hold that the order of the county court transmitting a cause pending when the municipal court was created was necessary to give the latter court jurisdiction. But such supposition is based upon an erroneous interpretation of the language of the opinion in Fraser v. Freelon. It is there said: "Section 12" (of the act to create the municipal court) "provides that the court may hear and determine civil appeal cases which are directed to be transferred to it from the county court. It does not appear from the transcript returned with the writ that the action in controversy was either transferred to it from the county court, or brought up on appeal to that court. . . . The transcript fails to show that the defendants in that action either were served with process, or that a notice of appeal was served by or upon them; and, therefore, the transcript does not show that the court acquired jurisdiction of the defendants."

The plain meaning of the language employed in Fraser v. Freelon is that by section twelve of the act referred to, the municipal court acquired jurisdiction of the causes directed, not by any order of the county court, but by the twelfth section of the statute, to be transferred to the municipal court. The transfer by the common clerk from one department of his office to another is not indicated by any record which would constitute a portion of the return to certiorari. Nevertheless, as the municipal court was an inferior court, the record required to be returned should show it had jurisdiction. Whether an appeal was taken first to the county court, and the case was thence transferred to the municipal court, or the appeal was taken direct from the justices' court to the municipal court, the record, returned with the writ of review issued to the municipal court, should show service of the notice of appeal or waiver of such service by an appearance to the merits.

There is no pretense here that the action of which it is claimed the municipal court never acquired jurisdiction was not regularly appealed from the justices' court to the county court. The county court had jurisdiction, and the papers were before the municipal court when the case was there tried, as appears from the transcript.

Writ denied and proceedings dismissed.

JEROME MILLARD, RESPONDENT, v. YEE TEEN ET AL.,
RESPONDENTS.

APPEAL — JURISDICTION — MUNICIPAL COURT OF APPEALS. — In an action pending on appeal in the county court of the city and county of San Francisco at the time of the passage of the act creating the municipal court of appeals, no order transferring the action to the latter court was required to give that court jurisdiction to hear and determine the same. The transfer was made by operation of the act itself.

Id. — UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL. — In such a case, the undertaking on appeal to the county court is as effectual to bind the sureties as if the action had not been transferred.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Estee & Boalt, for Appellants, cited Uridias v. Morrill, 22 Cal. 473; Fraser v. Freelon, 53 Cal. 644; Norwood v. Kenfield, 34 Cal. 329; Trobock v. Caro, 60 Cal. 301.

L. Quint, for Respondent.

PER CURIAM.— Woon Ah Wah commenced an action in a

Justices' Court of the city and county of San Francisco against Woon Ah Chin and two others. Such proceedings were had therein that on the 21st of April, 1879, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants for $295 damages and $42 costs. On the same day the defendants gave notice of appeal, and filed an undertaking on appeal, in the sum of $750, with Lee You and Ah Yung as sureties, which recited the judgment and the desire of the defendants of appealing therefrom to the county court of the city and county of San Francisco, and was conditioned, that if the defendants should pay the amount of said judgment and all costs, and obey any order the said county court might make, if the appeal be withdrawn or dismissed, or pay the amount of any judgment and all costs that might be recovered against the appellants in the said county court, etc. On the 30th of April, 1879, the said defendants filed another undertaking of the same import, with Yee Teen and Luey Sing as sureties. The case was subsequently, in September, 1879, tried in the municipal court of appeals, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for $295 and costs. Payment of the amount of the judgment was demanded of the defendants and of the sureties, and payment was refused; thereupon this action was commenced in the Superior Court, on the undertaking, against the sureties, in which action judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff herein (assignee of the plaintiff in the former action) for $444.13 and costs. It does not appear that any order was made for the transfer of the case, after being appealed, from the county court to the municipal court of appeals; it appears merely, that the case was appealed to the county court, that it by some means got into the municipal court of appeals, was there tried, and there judgment was rendered.

The appellants do not question the constitutionality of the Act of April 1, 1878, creating the municipal court of appeals but they contend that that court did not acquire jurisdiction of the appeal for the reason that there was no order made by the county court transferring the action to the municipal court of appeals for trial. In Davis v. Superior Court, post, it was held that no order was necessary; that the act itself operated such transfer.

It was urged that as the undertakings were to abide the judgment of the county court, as that court has rendered no judgment, the sureties have incurred no liability. The giving of the notice of appeal and the undertaking were means — processes — by and through the use of which the appellants were empowered to have a retrial of the case. The law provided for the appeal to be taken to the county court; being so taken, the other court had authority by the terms of the act creating it to hear the case and determine it; it was a hearing and determination on appeal that the defendants desired, and that hearing and determination, in a method provided by law, has been had.

The judgment is affirmed.

THORNTON, J., and McKEE, J., dissented.

MARCUS UNGER, RESPONDENT, v. EMILY MOONEY
ET AL., APPELLANTS.

EJECTMENT — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ADVERSE POSSESSION. — In order to make out an adverse possession sufficient to sustain a defense in ejectment under the Statute of Limitations, five elements are required. (1) there must be an actual occupation, open and notorious, not clandestine; (2) the possession must be hostile to the title of the plaintiff; (3) it must be held under a claim of title exclusive of any other right; (4) it must be continuous and uninterrupted for a period of five years before the commencement of the action; (5) payment of taxes as provided by section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

ID. — TENANTS IN COMMON — OUSTER. — The possession of one tenant in common is the possession of his co-tenant. There is no element of hostility in such a possession. An actual adverse holding will not operate as an ouster, and set the Statute of Limitations in motion, until the tenant out of possession has notice of such holding. But if the hostile character of the possession is so openly manifested that his observation as a man reasonably careful of his interests would be sufficient to discover it, he will be deemed to have notice. Thus, where one of two tenants in common conveys to a third person by deed purporting to convey the whole land, and the deed is recorded by the grantee, who enters under it, such entry is hostile in its nature, and the mere fact of possession by a stranger is enough to put him on inquiry, and charge him with notice. So, the making of valuable improvements, paying the taxes upon the land, and receiving the rents and profits without accounting or offering to account, are circumstances indicating an adverse holding, and their effect upon the co-tenant is the same as if notice were directly communicated to him. The means of knowledge being furnished by the open and notorious character of the possession, he is chargeable with actual notice.

1D. — REQUESTING A DEED FROM THE CO-TENANT — EFFECT UPON THE CHARACTER OF THE POSSESSION — If the possession of a tenant in common is adverse to his co-tenant, it will not lose its hostile character by the former tendering a quit-claim deed to the latter, and requesting him to sign it, there being no offer to purchase, nor any acknowledgment of the tenancy.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, and Roche & Desbeck, for Appellants.

1. A conveyance by one co-tenant, purporting to convey an estate in severalty, constitutes color of title, and when the grantee enters under the deed and claims title in himself, and to the exclusion of all other right, his entry is under color of title, and his possession is adverse to all the world, and will, if maintained for the statutory period, toll all other right, and will vest in him a perfect title. 3. Asking the co-tenant for a deed was a recognition of his title.

THORNTON, J.—This is an action to recover possession of an undivided half of a lot of land situate in the city and county of San Francisco, to which the Statute of Limitations was pleaded. The court held against the defendants on this plea, and judgment passed for plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied. One of the grounds on which this motion was denied was the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding on the issue joined on the plea of the statute above mentioned.

The findings of fact, so far as they are adverted to or necessary to be remarked on herein, are as follows:—

“1. That one Frederick S. Sproul, on the 1st day of December, in the year 1863, was the owner in fee and in possession of the lot of land described in the complaint in this action.

“2. That said Frederick S. Sproul and Phebe C., his wife, on the 27th day of February, in the year 1865, granted, bargained and sold said premises to James Brokaw and J. W. Metcalf, by deed duly recorded on the same day, who entered into the possession of said premises under said deed.

“3. That said Frederick S. Sproul, Phebe C. Sproul, his wife, and James Brokaw, on the 2d of January, in the year 1867, granted, bargained, and sold said premises to Thomas Mooney, who entered into the possession of said premises under said deed, and while he held the same paid the city, county, and State taxes levied thereon, added to the improvements thereon, and received the rents and profits thereof.

“4. That said Thomas Mooney, on the 15th day of December, in the year 1868, made a deed of gift of said premises to his wife, Emily Mooney, one of the defendants in this action, which deed was duly recorded on said last named day. That said defendant entered into possession of said premises under said deed, and has ever since held the possession thereof by herself or tenants, and received the rents and profits thereof, and paid the city, county, and State taxes imposed thereon.

"5. That said J. W. Metcalf, on the 13th day of November, in the year 1880, by deed duly acknowledged and recorded, granted, bargained and sold the undivided one half of the premises described in said complaint to the plaintiff.

"6. That the defendants, on the 4th day of March, in the year 1881, ousted the plaintiff, and denied his title to the premises described in said complaint, and in and to every part thereof."

The court, it will be observed, finds that the plaintiff was ousted or disseized on the 4th day of March, 1881. The denial of the title, also found, is either a mere evidential or probative fact, having no proper place in a finding of facts, or, if it has, is of the same purport with the fact of ouster previously found. In this latter view, it is a mere repetition of the finding of ouster, and need not be further noticed.

It is contended that the evidence shows that the disseizin or ouster of plaintiff by defendants was at a much earlier day; in fact, that the testimony establishes that the ouster occurred on the entry of Thomas Mooney under the deed executed to him on the 2d day of January, 1867 (see finding three), by Sproul and wife and Brokaw.

To set the Statute of Limitations in motion there must be a hostile possession, open and notorious or accompanied by such circumstances as are calculated to make it notorious. (Grimm v. Curley, 43 Cal. 251; Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508.) This accords with the definition of disseizin, which Blackstone defines to be "a wrongful putting out of him who hath the freehold." (3 Blackst. Com. 169 — and so, Littleton and Coke.) The definition of the former is "where a man entereth into any lands or tenements where his entrance is not congeable and ousteth him who hath the freehold." (Co. Litt. 279.) Coke defines it as "the putting a man out of possession, and ever implieth a wrong." (Co. Litt. 153.) It must be with intent to usurp the place of the true owner, and put him out of possession. Lord Mansfield in Taylor dem. Atkyns v. Horde, said that disseizin at common law "signified some mode or other of turning the tenant out of his tenure, and usurping his place and feudal relation," from which it followed, that if the disseizor died seized, the descent to his heir gave him the right of possession and tolled or took away the true owner's entry. (Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60.) This was said of actual disseizins, or disseizins in spite of the owner, and not of disseizins at the election of the owner, which were allowed to the owner for the sake of the remedy by assize of novel disseizin. This actual disseizin is the species of ouster or dispossession by reference to which adverse possession is defined and illustrated. The last class of disseizins above mentioned need not be further noticed.

In fine, we think that the authorities justify our saying that every dispossession of the true owner, whether by force or fraud, by violent or peaceful means, and an open and notorious occupation under claim of title in the person who dispossesses, is a disseizin or ouster (disseizin is but a species of ouster, see 2 Blackst. Com.) sufficient to set in motion the Statute of Limitations and constitutes an adverse possession, which, when it continues for the period of time prescribed by statute, bars the owner of his right to recover.

Now, the possession of one tenant in common is the possession of his co-tenant. Such possession by one tenant has no element of hostility to the right of his co-tenant. The co-tenant out of possession is not informed by such possession that it has any adverse character. Such a possession under claim of title adverse to the co-tenant, but not manifested to him by the conduct of the possessor of a character to notify the co-tenant of its adverse nature, is not sufficient to set the statute in operation as between tenants in common. The co-tenant must, in some way, be notified of the adverse holding, in order to be prejudiced by it. This may be by actual notice, or by acts or declarations so open and notorious, that it may be inferred that the co-tenant had knowledge of them. This rule and the reason on which it is founded is well stated in Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 539, referring to the tenant out of possession in these words: "But until he has notice either actual or constructive, in some form, that the possession of his co-tenant has become hostile, it will be deemed in law to have been amicable, notwithstanding the tenant in possession may, in fact, have been holding adversely. If the rule were otherwise, the tenant out of possession might be disseized, and lose his remedy by the bar of the Statute of Limitations, without notice that the possession of his co-tenant had become hostile. To avoid this injustice, the law deems the possession to have continued amicable until the tenant out of possession has in some method been notified that it has become hostile."

The adverse character of the possession must in every case be manifested to the owner. The owner must be notified, in some way, that the possession is hostile to his claim, or the statute does not operate on his right. (See remarks, in opinion, in Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 517, 518; Trustees etc. Town of Fort Hampton v. Kirk, 84 N. Y. 220; Culver v. Rhodes, 87 N. Y. 354; Abell v. Harris, 11 Gill & J. 371, per Dorsey, J.) As was said in the case cited from 84 N. Y., per Andrews, J., "the object of the statute defining the acts essential to constitute an adverse possession is, that the real owner may, by unequivocal acts of the disseizor, have notice of the hostile claim and be thereby called upon to assert his legal title." Hence, an open and notorious occupation with hostile intent is a necessary constituent of an adverse possession. Neither a hostile intent without such occupation, nor such occupation without hostile intent, is sufficient. The case of tenants in common is no exception to this rule. The evidence required is of a different character, from the legal character of the tenure, tenants in common being seized per my et per out and the actual occupation of one tenant of the entire tract having no element of hostility to his co-tenant. Such occupation with user of the land for husbandry or of any kind is reconcilable with right, and in harmony with the legal aspects of the tenure. Hence there must be some conduct of the occupying tenant evidenced by acts or declarations, or both, in its nature and essence hostile to the title of the tenant out of possession, and imparting knowledge of such hostility to the latter, to affect his right. (Portis v. Hill, 3 Tex. 278.)

The important question here is, does the evidence show an ouster prior to the date at which it is found, and an adverse possession of sufficient duration to bar the plaintiff's action?

The facts found are set forth above, together with the further fact not proved, that Emily Mooney paid the taxes during the whole time she was in possession. We do not say this payment of taxes was proved, because the bill of exceptions shows that the offer was made to prove it, and it was ruled out, except as to the fact of payment since March, 1878, when the proviso to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure went into operation. The payment of taxes, it seems, is, under the circumstances of this case, competent evidence along with the other facts admitted to show the character of the holding by the party in possession, that it was adverse and under claim of title. (Keyser v. Evans, 30 Pa. St. 509.)

The evidence shows the entry by Thomas Mooney under a deed executed to him by Sproul and wife, and Brokaw, conveying the whole premises, which deed was duly recorded soon after its execution. This is strong evidence of an ouster or disseizin. It bears the appearance of a declaration by the grantee that his entry under the deed is for himself exclusively and not for another, that he enters in his own exclusive right. In Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 330, Judge Story, in discussing the subject of the ouster of one tenant in common by another, used this language: "I take the principle of law to be clear, that where a person enters into land by a recorded deed, his entry and possession are referred to such title; and that he is deemed to have a seizin of the land co-extensive with the boundaries stated in his deed, where there is no open adverse possession of the land so described in any other person." This was said in 1827. Afterwards, at the January Term, 1845, of the Supreme Court of the United States, the same learned jurist delivering the opinion of the court in Clymer's Lessee v. Dawkins, 3 How. 690, expressed himself thus: "In the case of the Lessee of Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Peters, 319, 354, this court also held, that when a person enters into land under a deed or title, his possession (in the absence of all other qualifying or controlling circumstances) is construed to be co-extensive with his deed or title; and although the deed or title may turn out to be defective or void, yet the true owner will be deemed disseized to the extent of the boundaries of such deed or title." The learned justice cites several other cases "affirming the same doctrine," viz: Green v. Lister, 8 Cranch, 229, 230; Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. 213, 223; The Society for Propagating the Gospel v. The Town of Pawlet, 4 Peters, 480, 504, 506; Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535. See also, Bradstreet v. Huntington, 5 Peters, 439; Clapp v. Bromagham, 9 Cowen, 531, 532, 533;

Culler v. Motzer, 13 Serg. & R. 358; Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 329, 330; Alexander v. Kennedy, 19 Tex. 496.

In Culler v. Motzer, 13 Serg. & R. 358, it was held where the very point was in judgment that possession of land by a purchaser, under deed of an entire lot, is adverse to the rightful owner, though tenant in common with the grantor. There are numerous other cases to the same effect. (Horne v. Howell, 46 Ga. 9; Cain v. Furlow, 47 Ga. 674; Gill v. Fauntleroy's Heirs, 8 Mon. B. 186; Long v. Stapp, 49 Mo. 508; Warfield v. Lindell, 30 Mo. 282; S. C. 38 Mo. 578; Lapeyre v. Paul, 47 Mo. 590; Gray v. Bates, 3 Strob. 500; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 178; Bigelow v. Jones, 10 Pick. 162; Goewey v. Urig, 15 Ill. 242; Hinkley v. Green, 52 Ill. 230-233; Townsend & Pastor's Case, 4 Leon. 32; Reed v. Taylor, 5 Barn. & Adol. 575; Parker v. The Proprietors etc. 3 Met. 101; Thomas v. Garvan, 4 Dev. 223; Cloud v. Webb, 4 Dev. 290; Hubbard v. Wood, 1 Sneed, 286; Weisinger v. Murphy, 2 Head, 674; Kinney v. Slattery, 51 Iowa, 353; Abernathie v. Con. Virginia Mining Co. 16 Nev. 260; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.)

The deed to Mooney (its character is stated above) was recorded and Mooney entered under it into a lot within the city of San Francisco, described in the complaint as being twenty-three by ninety feet. The evidence on the part of the defendants, in regard to the adverse possession, is that of Mrs. Mooney, and is as follows: "I took possession of the property in December, 1868. When my husband made me a deed of gift of it, my husband and I lived there. At first, when he bought the property it was a four-roomed house. He and I lived there for about six or eight months, and then we let it to a newly married couple. When they left the house, my husband had it raised to a two-story house. My husband and myself ceased to live there in 1867. We lived there five or six months. The newly married couple lived there six or seven months. Mr. Wiel and family next lived there. They occupied the premises five or six years. The plaintiff was my next tenant. He remained there three or four years. I have always received the rents of the premises since the time the deed was made to me. Madison & Burke had charge of the place for me. I never accounted to any person for any portion of the rents or profits. Nobody ever demanded an account of them from me until within the last two or three months. Nobody ever demanded of me to be let into possession of these premises until the demand of Mr. Unger. Mr. Mooney raised the house. It was four-roomed. He raised it to a two-story house, with modern improvements, and I have always kept it in repair, paid taxes, assessments, and everything. The lot is surrounded by a fence. The cost of raising the house and putting in the modern improvements must have been eighteen hundred or two thousand dollars. I offered to sell the property. I never acknowledged any claim to any portion of the property on the part of any one else. I have been in possession for a number of years. I have always received the rents and profits. I always thought it was mine, and I believe it is mine now. During all the years since that deed was given to me, I have leased the premises to tenants. Nobody but my tenants and myself has been in possession or occupation of these premises since the deed to me from my husband."

The above, with what has been before stated, is all the testimony on the issue of adverse possession, except one circumstance, which will be adverted to hereafter.

There are five elements required to make out an adverse possession sufficient to constitute a defense under the Statute of Limitations. (1) The possession must be by actual occupation, open and notorious, not clandestine. (Thompson v. Pioche, supra; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325.) (2) It must be hostile to the plaintiff's title. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 321, 322, 323.) (3) It must be held under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, as one's own. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 323, 325; Garrison v. McGlockley, 38 Cal. 78; Lowell v. Frost, 44 Cal. 471; Thompson v. Pioche, supra.) (4) It must be continuous and uninterrupted for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 324; San Francisco v. Fulde, 37 Cal. 349; City of San Jose v. Trimble, 41 Cal. 536.) It may be added here that this period of five years need not be next before the commencement of the action. (Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 535.) (5) Since the passage of the proviso to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1878, payment of taxes. (C. P. R. Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261.)

Each one of these elements is established by the evidence.

(1) There was open and notorious occupation by Mrs. Mooney and her husband. Mrs. Mooney and her husband were in possession when the deed was made to the former in December 1868. They lived there for several months. Mrs. Mooney took possession in December, 1868. Her husband added to the house, raised it to a two-story house. Mrs. Mooney has let the house during this period to several tenants, and a tenant has occupied the house during nearly the whole period. She has made repairs on the house, improved it at a cost of from eighteen hundred dollars to two thousand dollars, received the rents of the property, paid taxes and assessments, has never accounted to any one, and no one ever demanded an account or to be let into possession until within a short time before the suit was brought. The deeds under which she claims, and herself and her husband entered, were recorded soon after made. Her acts of ownership, and those of her husband, were unequivocal and open to the observation of all, and during this period, Metcalf, the alleged tenant in common, lived near enough to the city to have reached it in less than twelve hours, and had full opportunity of observing the condition of the lot, the change of possession from Brokaw, his co-tenant, so-called, or that a person other than Brokaw was in possession, its occupation by tenants, and of ascertaining all the above-mentioned facts, which facts a man ordinarily regardful of his interests would have made himself acquainted with. The possession of other persons than Brokaw was enough to put Metcalf on inquiry, according to the rule in Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 486. If he had inquired he would have discovered the hostile character of the possession. This means of notice constituted notice. (See Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 184; Pell v. McElroy, 86 Cal. 272.) (2) The hostility of the plaintiff's claim of title is evident from the above facts, for the character of the possession may be evidenced by acts as well as words. Independent of the entry of Mooney and wife under the deeds of the whole lot, such acts indicate the adverse character of the holding. With the deeds, we cannot see that there can be any doubt about it. Mrs. Mooney testified, she always thought it was her property, and never acknowledged any claim to any portion of the property on the part of any one else. Her acts accord with and support this testimony. (3) The above facts show that Mrs. Mooney occupied and possessed the property under a claim of title exclusive of any other right; (4) and also that the evidence conclusively established that this adverse possession continued for a period sufficiently long, prior to action brought, say five years, to bar plaintiff's action; and (5) that she paid the taxes.

The evidence as to these points is all one way. The fact that she presented a deed to Metcalf and requested him to sign it does not rebut any of the deductions above made from the evidence. Metcalf and Mrs. Mooney alone testify as to this matter. Metcalf says she presented a deed and requested him to sign it; he does not state the character of the deed. But there is no evidence that she ever offered to buy anything. Mrs. Mooney says that the deed presented to Metcalf was a quit-claim. These facts do not sustain the conclusion that the case here made is within the decision of Lovell v. Frost, 44 Cal. 471; and C. P. R. Co. v. Mead, 63 Cal. 112.

There was no offer to purchase the property or to purchase anything, but the testimony shows that it was an effort by the defendant to get in an outstanding or adverse claim of title, called to her attention by an objection made to her title when she was negotiating a sale of the lot. This she had a right to do, and doing it was no recognition of the plaintiff's claim so as to do away with the effect of her hostile occupation. On the contrary, the facts proved point strongly to the conclusion that she asked for a deed which was rightfully her due from one who had no title; that Metcalf's name was inserted in the deed of Sproul and wife to himself and Brokaw as a merely nominal owner, to hold the title for the grantors of Thomas Mooney, Sproul and wife, and Brokaw.

This will explain the facts that though living in the neighborhood of the city of San Francisco during the whole time of Mrs. Mooney's occupation, he (Metcalf) paid no attention to the property, never asked for a portion of the rents, made no inquiry about the property, and had forgotten that he had any interest in it.

We are referred to the case of Seaton v. Son, 32 Cal. 487,

Whether the possession was adverse or not is certainly, in the case before us, a question of fact to be determined upon a view of all the circumstances appearing in the evidence. In Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60, Lord Mansfield said: "Disseizin is a fact to be found by the jury." That such is the general rule as to whether a possession was adverse or not to the owner's title, see the cases cited in note 2 to § 258 of Wood's Lim. of Actions. It is not necessary for us to overrule the case referred to, but we feel bound to say that in our opinion the ruling in it as to the deed to Brophy, and his entry and possession under it, is overborne by the weight and current of authority, and is not in accordance with the well-settled principles on which the question of adverse possession has been adjudged in nearly every case to which our attention has been called or which we have been able to find. The cases are cited above.

The finding as to the issue made by the Statute of Limitations in this case is scarcely in accordance with that definiteness and certainty which should characterize a finding of facts. (See sixth finding quoted above.) In finding an adverse possession it would be well to find the elements above given. If one of the elements is lacking, the adverse possession is not made out, and in finding such an issue for the plaintiff it is sufficient to negative the existence of any one of these elements.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

ODD FELLOWS MUTUAL AID ASSOCIATION OF
SAN FRANCISCO ET AL., APPELLANTS, v. WALLACE
T. JAMES ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

CORPORATION — MONEY LOST BY THEFT — LIABILITY OF OFFICER — The secretary of a corporation, whose duty it is to receive all moneys due the corporation, and pay the same over to the treasurer, must exercise reasonable diligence in paying over any moneys received by him, and if he fail to do so, and the moneys are stolen from him, he is liable therefor.

Id. — BOND — LIABILITY OF SURETIES. — The sureties on a bond given by the secretary to the corporation, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, are also liable for moneys stolen under such circumstances. The violation of duty on his part in failing to pay the moneys over constitutes a breach of the bond.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

THORNTON, J. — This is an action upon a bond for five thousand dollars executed by the defendants to the plaintiff, with this stipulation, that whereas Wallace T. James has been elected secretary of the Odd Fellows Mutual Aid Association for the year commencing on the fifth day of February, 1878, and until his successor shall have been duly elected and qualified, now if the said James "shall in all respects fully, faithfully, well and truly perform all the duties of his said trust according to the constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations of said association, and at the end of his official term surrender all books, papers, money, or sureties" (sic) belonging to or appertaining to his office, to such person or persons as said association may direct, then the bond was to be void, otherwise not.

The breach of the bond assigned in the complaint is the failure of James to pay over to the treasurer of said corporation the sum of $1,455.25, moneys of the corporation received by him (James) as secretary, while he was in office as such, in the year 1878, and before the 15th of August in that year, which payment to the treasurer it was his duty to make under the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the corporation. It is further averred that the corporation, by its treasurer, demanded of James the payment of the sum of money mentioned, which he refused to pay to him, and that it has never been paid. None of the allegations of the complaint are denied by the answer, except as hereinafter stated, but the defendants set up in defense that the corporation was conducting and carrying on its business in a building known as the Odd Fellows' Hall Building in the city of San Francisco, that James, as secretary, was required by the association to occupy and do the business of the corporation in its office during all the times mentioned in the complaint, that the corporation furnished its office with an iron safe for the purpose of safely keeping its books, papers, and moneys; that in the usual and ordinary manner of doing the business of the corporation, the secretary (James) was accustomed to and did receive the funds of the corporation as the same were paid in from time to time, and deposit them in the safe above mentioned; that it was the usual and ordinary way of conducting the said business for James, the secretary, to allow the said funds to remain in the safe until the treasurer of the corporation called to receive them, that James did receive the sum of money mentioned in the complaint, and, as was his usual custom and the custom of doing business, placed the same in the safe aforesaid; that after this money had been deposited in the safe and before the treasurer called for or made any demands for it or any part of it, some person or persons unknown, in the night time, broke open the safe, and stole and carried away the money, without the knowledge or consent of James, and without any neglect or default on his part. The defendants further aver that James, in all things and at all times, faithfully performed all the duties of his trust according to the constitution, by-laws, rules "and usages of the said association"; that at the time the treasurer made the demand on him he did not have the sum of money mentioned, and that it was not his duty to pay over this money, or any part of it, to the treasurer, or in any way reimburse the corporation "for the said loss or any part thereof."

We think it best to insert here the findings of the court below as to the facts of the case, which are as follows:—

“That the defendant’s made, executed, and delivered the bond attached to the complaint at the time alleged; that by the constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations of said association mentioned in the condition of said bond, the secretary, Wallace T. James, was required to keep all the books of account of the association, to receive all the moneys of the association, giving his receipt for the same; to pay over all moneys in his possession belonging to the association to the treasurer, taking his receipt therefor; to write and send all notices and communications called for by the rules of the association to its members, to make a written report of the transactions and condition of the association at the annual meeting in each year, and at such other meetings as the board of directors or association should direct; that there was no other duties which the secretary was required to perform, and that the said bond was given for the performance of these duties, and these only; that there was no contract or undertaking whatever by which the said James undertook or agreed to be the insurer of moneys or goods in his charge, or received by him as secretary; but that his undertaking, with reference to the custody of the moneys received by him as secretary, was to keep them, under the direction of the association, and in the place and manner directed by the association; that said James was furnished by the association with an office, in which was a safe for the purposes of the transaction of business, and the custody of moneys and other valuables; that during the continuance of his term of office, the said James received money to the amount of $1,455.25, and deposited the same in the said safe, furnished by the said association; that while in said safe, and during the night of August 6, 1877, the said office was broken into and said money stolen by some unknown person, without the knowledge, agency, or assent of said James.

“And the court finds as a fact that the said James was not guilty of any negligence in the custody or care of said money, but that he faithfully performed all the duties of his said office; that he failed to pay over said $1,455.25, solely because the same was stolen from him as above found; that the said safe and office was not a fit or proper place for the keeping of said money, but that it was the place provided by the association for the purpose, and that the fact that it was not a proper place for the keeping of said money was known to the association at all times previous to the robbery above mentioned."

Judgment passed for defendants following the conclusions of law arrived at by the court.

The court below treated the case as one for the custody and safe-keeping of moneys by the secretary, which it clearly is not, any further than this: that he was to keep the money for such reasonable time as was required for him to deposit it with the treasurer. There is no such contract on the part of the defendant. The contract of defendant as shown by the bond, which was admitted as set forth by the complaint and as found by the court, was to receive the moneys of the association and pay them over to the treasurer, taking his receipt for the same.

On a motion for a new trial the findings of the court were assailed on the ground that the evidence was insufficient in several specified particulars to justify the findings of the court. We shall notice the following of the particulars specified: First — That the undertaking of the secretary was to keep the money received by him as secretary under the direction of the association, in the place and manner directed by the association. Second — That the association furnished or provided James with a safe for the purpose of the custody of the money belonging to the association. Third—That the defendant James was not guilty of any negligence in the custody or care of the money sued for, and that he faithfully performed the duties of his office.

We are of opinion that the evidence establishes the contrary of that found by the court, as stated in the above particulars. There was nothing in the conduct of the board of directors, taking the testimony of the defendant James himself, which shows that it ever gave any directions as to his dealing with the moneys received by him as secretary other than that embodied in the by-laws of the corporation which were in evidence and are embodied in the statement. By these by-laws it was distinctly provided as to the moneys, that the secretary should "receive all moneys due the association, giving his receipt for the same," and pay over all such moneys "to the treasurer, taking his receipt therefor." This did not make him the custodian of the moneys. Any inference to the contrary is not justified by any evidence in the case. The impression which was attempted to be made by James in his testimony that any such direction was given other than that above stated, is based upon a remark of a director of the board, at one of its meetings, or on something said or done by the president. Conceding that the corporation could be bound in this way, the remarks stated by him and the acts of the president did not justify any inference that the board had ever attempted in any way to give the moneys any other direction than that prescribed by the by-laws above mentioned.

There is no evidence that the safe was furnished James by the association for keeping the money of the association. James himself gives no such testimony. He says: "There was a safe in the office furnished by the plaintiff's corporation. The safe belonged to the association. It was a Tilton & McFarland old combination safe. I was required to do the business of the association in that office." He nowhere says that he was required or directed to keep the money in the safe; on the contrary, the evidence, not in conflict with any facts which he states, shows that the board refused to hire a box in the Safe Deposit Building, in which he could deposit the money, and he was told not to keep the money in the safe. He testifies that he felt uneasy at night about the money, and in consequence of this uneasiness called the attention of the board to this safe. The evidence further shows that he was warned of the insecurity of the safe, and instructed by the board to deposit the money with the treasurer. The money stolen was accumulating a month or so before the larceny occurred.

If he was required to keep the money, if this was any part of his duty, the evidence establishes a clear case of negligence. The money was kept in an insecure place, to the knowledge of the secretary, a key to the combination lock of the safe was in the hands of another person not connected in any way with the association, and had been for some time, and the combination was allowed by him to remain unchanged, and the building had no watchman. Under the circumstances, if the duty to keep the money was devolved on him, he would have been justified, and it would have been his duty to have sought a safe place of deposit, of which many could have been found in his neighborhood. But it was no part of his duty to become the custodian of the moneys of the association, but to pay them over to the treasurer under the by-laws above mentioned. The evidence shows that there was a treasurer, that his office was not more than five or six blocks distant from the office of the association, easily accessible, and thus a custodian was provided by the association, and his assumption of the office of custodian was entirely unnecessary. We see no evidence that any course of business was established by the board by which it should be inferred that the board required him to keep the money until called for by the treasurer. If any course other than that prescribed by the by-laws above referred to was pursued, it was pursued by the secretary of his own head without any direction either express or implied of the board of directors of the association.

It may be remarked here that the evidence in relation to the safety of the money in the safe and his calling the attention of the trustees to it, and the way of doing business while he was secretary in regard to the treasurer calling on him for the money, instead of his taking it to the treasurer, was objected to by the plaintiff on the ground substantially that it altered the contract between the parties; the objection was overruled and exceptions reserved. The objections should have been sustained, and the evidence ruled out. There was error in admitting it.

As this cause must go back for a new trial, the true intent of the contract of the parties should be defined for the direction of the court below on such new trial. The question has been fully argued orally and in the briefs of counsel, and it should be decided, that the litigation may sooner come to an end, thus saving time and expense to the parties.

The engagement of the defendant James, as shown by the bond, was in all respects "fully, faithfully, well and truly, to perform all the duties of his said trust according to the constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations" of the association; and as we have stated above, his duty as to the moneys was to receive all the moneys of the association, giving his receipt for them and pay them over to the treasurer, taking his receipt therefor. This is the proper meaning of the bond in regard to the moneys. He was no custodian or bailee of the moneys further than as set forth above. He was such bailee for such time as was requisite in the use of due and proper diligence under the circumstances to get the money to the treasurer and pay it over to him. James was a paid officer, receiving a salary of one hundred dollars a month, and his engagement as to diligence in the brief period that the money should remain in his possession was that of a good and trustworthy business man in attending to his own affairs. He engages to use this diligence in keeping the money and paying it over. The degree of diligence to be employed must have regard to the circumstances, of course.

In the case before us the moneys lost were allowed to accumulate for more than a month. It was the secretary's duty to pay over within a reasonable time. His diligence should have been spurred by the fact that this treasurer was the officially appointed custodian of the moneys, and he (the secretary) was not. Under the circumstances before us in this case, he was bound to pay over in our opinion on the day he received the money if practicable, at furthest on the day after he received it. This he did not do, but allowed the money to accumulate and it was stolen. This was a breach of his engagement under the bond, and rendered him and the other defendants liable. It may be that if, while keeping the money during the brief time he was allowed to keep it, and exercising proper care in keeping it, he had lost it by robbery accompanied by violence which overcame him, or if, while taking the money in the exercise of due and proper care to the treasurer, he was violently robbed of it, against his will and consent, he might be excused. Such was the case of Walker v. British Guarantee Association, 18 Q. B. 277, which was an action by the trustees of a building society under an act of parliament, against the sureties of one Jones the treasurer of the society, on a covenant whereby it was stipulated that Jones would faithfully discharge the duties of treasurer, duly obey the directions of the trustees in relation to such duty, and punctually account to the trustees for all moneys, etc., received by him as treasurer. One of the directions of the society in regard to the treasurer's duties was that he should pay over the moneys to the bankers of the society within a given time. The breach assigned was that Jones did not pay over the money to the bankers or at all. The defendants pleaded four pleas. The fourth plea, which was the one on which the case turned and was decided, was that Jones had received the money, and before the time that he ought to have paid or could have paid it to the bankers of the society, he was, without any act or default or negligence or want of due and proper care on his part, robbed by violence of the money, by which he was prevented from paying. There was a verdict for the plaintiffs on three of the pleas, and on the fourth verdict passed for the defendant. There was a motion for judgment for plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, which brought up the sufficiency of the plea. The court denied the motion, and per Campbell, C. J., said: "The plea avers that, after he received the moneys, and before the time when he ought to have paid, or could have paid, the same to the bankers, he, without any default or negligence or want of due care on his part, was robbed by violence of the whole of the said moneys, by the same being feloniously and violently stolen and carried away from his person; and thereby he was unavoidably, and without any act or default of his, prevented from paying the said moneys to the bankers of the society. This plea (found to be true) alleges a loss of the moneys by irresistible violence; and the general doctrine is not denied, that, if the subject-matter bailed be lost by vis major, which we translate irresistible violence, the bailee is discharged."

The defense was here sustained on account of the diligence of the treasurer. He was doing his best to comply with his engagement and was prevented by the vis major. If he had been dilatory in taking the money to the bankers, it cannot be supposed that the court would have sustained his defense.

There is here nothing like robbery nor violence, nor inevitable accident, nor vis major, to excuse defendant, but a case where the money has been lost by the want of care and prudence on the part of James, which his contract bound him to use, and he and his sureties are liable. In the case of the act of God, or inevitable accident, or casus (as the civilians call the act of God or inevitable accident), (Wharton on Negligence, §§ 114, 115, 116, 117, etc.), or vis major, the defendant is not excused when the injury or damage might have been avoided by the exercise of due care and prudence on the part of defendant as is illustrated in many cases. (See Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 423; Chidester v. Consol. Ditch Co. 59 Cal. 202, 203; Holladay v. Kenard, 12 Wall. 254, case of common carrier; and City of Philadelphia v. Gilmartin, 71 Pa. St. 140; Wharton on Negligence, § 123.)

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
PETITIONER, v. THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY, RESPONDENT.

PROHIBITION — REMOVAL OF CAUSE — JURISDICTION. — The filing of a petition and bond for the removal of a cause from the State court to the Circuit Court of the United States does not divest the State court of jurisdiction so far as to authorize a writ of prohibition to prevent it from proceeding to try the cause.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Glassell, Smith & Patton, for Petitioner.

Smith, Brown & Hutton, for Respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. — This is an application for a writ to prohibit said Superior Court from proceeding any further in the case of The People of the State of California v. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, which was commenced in said Superior Court, and afterwards, as the plaintiff claims, removed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

It appears by the record before us, that the plaintiff herein filed an answer in the action commenced against it in said Superior Court, and afterwards, but on the same day, filed a petition and bond for the removal of said suit into said Circuit Court. And that afterwards a certified copy of the record and proceedings in the case and of the petition and bond for the removal of said suit to said Circuit Court were filed therein. No objection was or is made to the sufficiency of the bond.

In the petition for a removal it is alleged that the action is "of a civil nature at law, and arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum and value of five hundred dollars." This is followed by more specific allegations as to the questions involved in said action, from which it appears that it was brought to recover taxes alleged to be due from said Railroad Company to said State and county, which the petitioner alleges are illegal, because the assessment on which said taxes are based was made in accordance with section 10, of article xiii., of the Constitution of this State, which the petitioner insists violates the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by depriving it, the petitioner, of its property without due process of law.

The Superior Court made an order denying the petition. According to the opinion of Blatchford, J., in Hatch v. The Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, 6 Blatchf. 105, 117, it would appear that this order was wholly superfluous. In that opinion this language occurs: "No order of the State court for the removal of the cause is necessary. The right of the defendant to a removal is not dependent on the question whether the State court does or does not make an order." And this seems to be in consonance with the doctrine that the determination by a State court that a petition for the removal of a suit to a federal court is sufficient or insufficient is of no practical moment. (Dillon on Removal of Causes, 70.)

But it does not follow from this that a federal court upon the mere filing in it of copies of the record of the State court and the petition and bond for removal, acquires jurisdiction of the suit in the full sense of that term. For notwithstanding the filing and entry of a copy of the record of the suit in the federal court, it is the duty of the court to dismiss or remand the case whenever it appears to its satisfaction that the "suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court." (Act of Congress of March 3, 1875, § 5.) And unless this suit is one "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States," the federal court could not by any known process acquire jurisdiction of it. And if not within federal, it certainly was within State, jurisdiction. And this must be so whether or not the power to determine the question of jurisdiction is vested exclusively in the federal court. The fact of filing in that court a copy of the record of the State court, together with copies of the petition and bond for the removal of the suit, does not determine the question of jurisdiction. For "if it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Circuit Court at any time after such suit has been . . . removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy, properly within the jurisdiction of said Circuit Court, . . . the said Circuit Court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed." It will thus be seen that while section three of the Act of 1875 provides that after a petition and bond for a removal of a suit commenced in a State court have been filed therein, "it shall be the duty of the State court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in such suit, section five declares that upon its appearing that the suit is not one of federal cognizance, "the Circuit Court shall proceed no further therein." And that court will not take cognizance of the suit unless it affirmatively appears by the record that the case is one within its jurisdiction. (Trafton v. Nougues, 4 Sawy. 178.)

So that when a suit is remanded to a State court by a federal court on the ground that the case is not one of federal cognizance, it is simply a recognition of the fact that the State court did not lose jurisdiction by reason of the attempt to remove the case from the State to the federal court. If the State court loses its jurisdiction it cannot be restored by a federal court. By reading sections three and five of the Act of 1875 together, they simply provide that after one of the parties to an action pending in a State court has taken the proper steps to remove it to a federal Court, the State court shall "proceed no further in such suit" until the same is remanded or dismissed by the federal court. The removal of the suit to a federal court stays the proceedings in the State court until the case is remanded or dismissed by the federal court. In Knapp v. Railroad Co. 20 Wall. 117, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment, with instructions to the United States Circuit Court to remand the case to the State court "from whence it was improperly removed to the Circuit Court." It could not with propriety be said that the State court ever lost its jurisdiction of that case. It was a case within the jurisdiction of the State court and not within the jurisdiction of the federal court. The most that could fairly be claimed in such a case would be that while it was pending in the federal court the jurisdiction of the State court was in abeyance. In many of the cases it is said that upon the filing of a proper petition and bond in a State court for the removal of a suit pending therein every subsequent exercise of jurisdiction in the case by such court is null and void, and every step coram non jndice. But Dillon, after saying that on the filing of such petition and bond "the rightful jurisdiction" of the State court "ceases eo instanti" and that a subsequent judgment of such court in the case would be erroneous, adds: "We do not say null and void. Such a judgment is perhaps valid unless reversed or set aside." (Dillon on Removal, etc., 67.) And the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held in a recent case that such a judgment was not null and void, but was valid until reversed or set aside. (Johnson v. The Brewers' Fire Ins. Co. 51 Wis. 570.)

It seems to us that this case is somewhat analogous to that of The People v. Whitney, 47 Cal. 584, in which an application for a writ of prohibition was based on the ground that after an appeal had been taken from an order of the district court denying a motion to change the place of trial, said district court was proceeding in the case as it might if no appeal had been pending in this court. The application was denied. The court said: "Conceding that the fact that the petitioner had taken an appeal to this court from the order of the court below, denying his motion to change the place of trial, entitled him to a continuance of the general cause in the court below, while such appeal was pending in this court, under section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and within the rule laid down in Pierson v. McCahill, 23 Cal. 250, it does not follow that the court below has, by reason of the pendency of such appeal, lost jurisdiction of the case, or that a trial of the case pending the appeal would be a proceeding without or in excess of the jurisdiction of the court below, in the sense of section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to authorize us to issue a writ of prohibition to that court."

In Pierson v. McCahill, supra, it was held that an appeal from an order denying a motion for a change of place of trial operated as a stay of all further proceedings in the case in the court below until such appeal was determined, and a judgment entered in the court below pending such appeal was reversed on the sole ground that it was error for that court to proceed in the case while an appeal from said order was pending in this court.

These two cases illustrate the difference between a stay of proceedings and a complete loss of jurisdiction. Proceedings had during a stay are erroneous only. Every step taken in a case after loss of jurisdiction is absolutely void. After an appeal a case may be remanded by the appellate court to the court below for further proceedings. And after a suit has been removed from a State to a federal court such suit may at any time be remanded to the court from which it was removed. Can it consistently be said that, in the case of an appeal, if there be a stay bond filed, the court below does not lose jurisdiction of the case so as to authorize the issuance of a writ of prohibition, but that, in case of removal of a suit from a State to a federal court, the former does lose jurisdiction so as to authorize the issuance of that writ?

In Insurance Company v. Pechner, 95 U. S. 183, it was held that where a State court had once acquired jurisdiction, it might proceed until it was judicially informed that its power over the cause had been suspended. In that case a State court had refused to suspend further proceedings, although a petition and bond for removal had been filed, and the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment of the court of appeals of New York, holding that as the petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to a removal, it was not even error for the State court to proceed to trial and judgment. "Having once acquired jurisdiction, the court may proceed until it is judicially informed that its power over the case is suspended," is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in that case. From which we infer that in the opinion of that court a removal of a suit from a State to a federal court simply suspends the power of the former to further proceed in such suit until it is remanded or dismissed by the federal court.

It is quite clear that the filing of a petition and bond in a State court for a removal of a case pending therein to a federal court does not ipso facto confer jurisdiction upon the latter, and equally clear that the State court does not lose jurisdiction until it vests in the federal court. Conceding, then, that neither the State court in which an action is pending, nor this court, can determine whether the case is one which can be removed to a federal court, how can this court determine that the power of the State court over the cause has been suspended even? Because it is not even error for a State court to proceed in the trial of a case after a petition and bond for removal have been filed in it, unless such petition shows that the case is one of federal cognizance. (Ins. Co. v. Pechner, supra.) In "Removal Cases," 100 U. S. 457, the court said: "We fully recognize the principle heretofore asserted in many cases, that the State court is not required to let go its jurisdiction until a case is made which, upon its face shows that the petitioner can remove the cause as a matter of right."

In Bell v. Dix, 49 N. Y. 232, a petition and bond for the removal of a case from a State court of original jurisdiction to a federal court had been filed, and a motion made in the State court for a stay of proceedings, which was denied. From that order an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and from that court to the court of appeals, in both of which the order denying the stay was affirmed. In the opinion of the latter court it is said: "The order of the Supreme Court, or of this court, granting or refusing a stay, would be in effect but the expression of an opinion upon the question; as neither court has the power to decide the question either way, the decision would neither be authoritative nor final in the premises."

In Ex parte Grimboll, the Supreme Court of Alabama (8 Cent. Law J. 151) denied an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent a court of original jurisdiction from proceeding further in a cause after a petition and bond for its removal had been filed. The ground upon which the refusal in that case was based was that it did not appear that the case was one which could properly be removed from a State to a federal court.

In the two cases last cited, the highest appellate courts of New York and Alabama, for different reasons, declined to interfere in cases in which inferior courts of those States were proceeding with the trials after petitions and bonds for removals had been filed.

But it seems to us quite clear that, if we can look into the petition for removal for the purpose of determining whether a case within federal cognizance is presented, the Superior Court in which the case is pending may do so, and if it can, its determination of the question, whether right or wrong, would neither be without nor in excess of its jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, neither the Superior Court nor this court can inquire into the sufficiency of a petition filed for the removal of a cause to a federal court, we do not see how the result reached in Bell v. Dix, supra, can be avoided. How this court can determine whether a Superior Court is proceeding without or in excess of its jurisdiction, unless we are permitted to inquire whether or not the case is one of federal cognizance, passes our comprehension. For, as before remarked, if it be not, a federal court cannot acquire jurisdiction of it. And if it takes jurisdiction of such a case, and proceeds to trial and judgment, the Supreme Court of the United States will reverse the judgment and remand the case to the State court "from whence it was improperly removed to such federal court." (Knapp v. R. R. Co. 20 Wall. 117.)

In a very recent case the Supreme Court of Texas affirmed a judgment in a case in which the court below proceeded to try a cause, notwithstanding the filing of a petition and bond for its removal to the federal court, holding that the State court had the power to inquire into the sufficiency of the petition, and if insufficient, it was not error to disregard it. After reviewing the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court of Texas says: "These decisions all leave a discretion with the State court to at least pass upon the sufficiency of the case made by the petition. They do not require that it should surrender its jurisdiction until a petition complying with the provisions of the statute is presented to the court." (Texas and Pacific Railway Company v. McAllister, 59 Tex. 349.)

In Sheehy v. Holmes, 55 Cal. 485, we did grant an application similar to the one now before us. But in that case no one appeared to resist the application, and it is quite evident that the case received but little attention in this court. We do not think under the circumstances that it should be followed.

Application denied.

McKEE, J., McKINSTEY, J., and ROSS, J., concurred.

MYRICK, J.—I concur in the judgment, for the reason that it does not appear to me that the Superior Court is acting in excess of its jurisdiction.

Petition for rehearing denied.

THE PEOPLE, RESPONDENT, v. DENNIS BURNS,
APPELLANT.

CRIMINAL LAW — BURGLARY — SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION. — The defendant was accused of the crime of burglary. The information charged that he feloniously and burglariously entered a certain house with intent to commit a rape, but did not state under which set of circumstances, specified in section 261 of the Penal Code, the crime was committed. Held, that the information was sufficient.

Id. — CHARGE. — Where the court, in a charge to the jury, reads the whole of a section of the Code, a part only being relevant, the judgment will not be disturbed if it is not apparent that some substantial right of the accused was affected.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Colusa County, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Carr & Hatch, for Appellant.

The information is not sufficient. (People v. Nelson, 58 Cal. 106; Greer v. State, 50 Ind. 267; Commonwealth v. De Jardin, 126 Mass. 46.)

The charge was erroneous. (People v. Bird, 8 Pac. C. L. J. 334; Hanks v. Naglee, 54 Cal. 51.)

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The information is sufficient. (People v. Shaber, 32 Cal. 36; Commonwealth v. Barney, 10 Cush. 480.)

The charge was not prejudicial. (People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191; People v. Girr, 53 Cal. 629.)

MYRICK, J.—The defendant was accused by the district attorney of the crime of burglary, and the information charged that the accused committed the crime as follows: That he did feloniously and burglariously enter a certain house of one — [naming a woman], in which said house she, the said [woman named] did then and there reside, with intent then and there to commit a rape upon the said [woman named].

Section 261, Penal Code, defines the crime of rape as the act therein named accomplished under either of six sets of circumstances therein set forth. Objection was made to the information in that it did not state under which set of circumstances specified in this section the act was intended by the defendant to be accomplished. We think the information was sufficient. (People v. Shaber, 32 Cal. 36; People v. Girr, 53 Cal. 629.)

In the charge to the jury the court read subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 261, above mentioned, as applicable to the case on trial. Subdivision 3 and the first part of subdivision 4 did relate to the case; but there was no testimony to which the latter part of subdivision 4 would be applicable, in that there was no testimony that any intoxicating, narcotic, or anæsthetic substance was administered or attempted to be administered. The defendant alleges that it was error to read the latter part of this subdivision. The entry into the house in the night time, and the use of force and threats in endeavoring to accomplish the act, were in evidence; and upon that evidence the jury was justified in convicting the defendant. It is not apparent that the reading of the clause objected to affected any substantial right of the defendant. (§ 1258, Pen. Code.)

Judgment and order affirmed.

G. J. CARPENTER ET AL., RESPONDENTS, v. THE NATOMA WATER AND MINING COMPANY, APPELLANT.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — FORMER ACTION — JUDGMENT — EJECTMENT. — A judgment in ejectment does not create a new estate or vest a new title in the plaintiff so as to interrupt the running of the Statute of Limitations, where it has begun to run. An actual entry is necessary to stop the running of the statute.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of El Dorado County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Department Two, adopted by the court in Bank.

A. P. Catlin, for Appellant.

The suit and judgment in Bugby v. Natoma Water Co. did not interrupt the Statute of Limitations. (Freeman on Judgments, § 293; Aslin v. Parkin, 2 Burr. 666-668; Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal. 465; Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 489)

G. J. Carpenter, for Respondent.

A judgment is the appropriate conclusion of an action, and it should and does conclude what it decides. It is conclusive of all antecedent defenses, including the bar of the statute. (Burden v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200; Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326; Montgomery v. Hernandez & Co. 12 Wheat. 129; Vassault v. Leitz, 31 Cal. 225; Knowles v. Inches, 12 Cal. 212; People v. Frisbie, 26 Cal. 135; Sherman v. Dilley, 3 Nev. 21; Harris v. Harris, 36 Barb. 88; Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688.)

PER CURIAM.— We concur in the views of Department Two with respect to this case. The result reached by the department is sustained by decisions in other States. (Wood on Limitations, 272; Doe ex dem. Kennedy's Heirs v. Reynolds, 27 Ala. 377; Smith v. Hornback, 4 Litt. 233; Jackson v. Haviland, 13 Johns. 228.)

Lord Mansfield, in Aslin v. Parkin, 2 Burr. 665, speaking of the effect of a judgment, recovered in ejectment, as evidence in an action for mesne profits, remarked: "This judgment only concludes the parties as to the subject-matter of it. Therefore, beyond the time laid in the demise, it proves nothing at all; because, beyond that time, the plaintiff has alleged no title," etc.

The judgment in the common law ejectment determined the plaintiff to have the right of possession during the demise laid in the declaration. Under our laws, ejectment, so called, may be employed to try title, and if the issue is as to plaintiff's seizin in fee, or for a less estate, the judgment in his favor determines that he was seized in fee, or of the less estate, at the commencement of the action. But the judgment does not create a new estate, or vest a new title in the plaintiff, which interrupts the running of the Statute of Limitations, in case the same has begun to run. The running of the limitation can be interrupted only by an actual entry. The establishment of a right, in the lessor of plaintiff, to the possession for a term of years, did not, as the cases show, interrupt the running of the Statute of Limitations. There is no reason why the establishment of a right to a larger estate, by the judgment under our law, should interrupt the running of the statute. As an interruption of the statute, the judgment for the recovery of lands under our Code is no more effectual than a judgment in a common law ejectment.

Judgment reversed.

McKEE, J., dissented.

ROSS, J., expressed no opinion.

The opinion of Department Two is given below.

MORRISON, C. J.—Plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant for the recovery of certain land described in the complaint, and defendant interposed as a defense to the action, the plea of the Statute of Limitations. The case comes up on the judgment roll, and it will be sufficient for us to refer to some of the findings filed by the learned judge before whom the trial was had:—

"That in the early part of the year 1851, the line of the canal mentioned in the pleadings was surveyed and located on the lands sought to be recovered in this action; and that during the years 1851 and 1852, the canal was being excavated by the defendant; and was completed through said lands about the 1st of March, 1853, and has ever since been continuously used and possessed by defendant for running water therein. That all the land over and through which said canal was constructed was vacant, unclaimed public land of the United States government."

"That said canal is about twenty-five miles in length, with several branches; and ever since its construction has been claimed by the defendant as its property, and so continuously held and used. That the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint were at the time said canal was located and constructed, and for a long time thereafter, public lands, belonging to the government of the United States."

"That for more than twenty-six years before the commencement of this action, the part or portion of the lands described in plaintiffs' complaint as passed over and occupied by said canal of defendant, was in the continued, uninterrupted, absolute, peaceable, and exclusive possession of defendant, except as interrupted by the suit brought by plaintiff's predecessor in interest, B. N. Bugby, to recover possession of said premises, as in the findings hereinafter set forth. That defendant claimed title thereto adverse to plaintiffs and all other persons, and that during all this time defendant was running water through said canal, and exercising dominion and control over the whole thereof, and running water therein for the purposes aforesaid."

"That defendant's right to the use of the land sued for in this action for the purposes of furnishing water for mining, agricultural, domestic, and other uses and purposes during all the time since the construction of said canal, has been uniformly acknowledged and recognized by the local customs and decisions of the courts of this State and the United States, except in the suit brought by plaintiff's predecessor in interest, B. N. Bugby, against defendant, to recover possession of said land and premises, as hereinafter in these findings set forth."

"That on the 22d day of April, 1867, the State of California, under the provisions of an act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act to provide for the survey of the public lands of California, the granting of the pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes, approved March 2d, 1853, and in accordance with the various acts of the legislature of said State preceding said 22d day of April, 1867, did by letters patent grant and convey to B. N. Bugby, the plaintiffs' predecessor in interest, the tracts of land located and described as follows, to wit: The southeast quarter, and the east half of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, all of section No. 16, township No. 10 north, range No. 8 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging and appertaining."

By the twelfth finding it appears that Bugby (under whom plaintiffs derive title), commenced an action similar to the present on the 16th day of April, 1868, and recovered a judgment therein in the district court in April, 1873; that an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and the judgment was affirmed on the 30th day of April, 1875; that thereupon a writ of error was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and by that court the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State was affirmed in the year 1878.

The complaint now before us was filed on the 18th day of February, 1880. There is but one question in the case, and that is, were the plaintiffs barred by the Statute of Limitations? If not, it is very clear that the judgment was correct, and should be affirmed. Was this statute saved by the bringing of the action of Bugby against the defendant? The present action is not founded upon the judgment in the Bugby case, and no allusion is made to such judgment in the complaint filed in this case. It is well settled that any interruption in the Statute of Limitations stops its running and establishes a new date from which it again begins to run. But does the bringing of an action and the recovery of a judgment affect the right of the defendant to avail himself of the statute as a defense in another action, between which two actions there is no connection except that they relate to the same subject-matter and are between the same parties or their privies?

In his argument the learned counsel for the defense very pertinently says: "This action is not an action in aid of the judgment put in evidence, nor a proceeding to procure the execution of that judgment." The present action is not a continuation of the former one, and is in no measure connected with it. It is a separate and independent proceeding which could have been as well maintained without as with reference (by evidence or otherwise) to the first action and the judgment therein, and the plaintiff as fully established his right to a recovery after he had introduced his patent in evidence, as he did by superadding proof of a judgment in the case of Bugby, referred to above.

Our attention has not been called to any case which conflicts with the views above expressed, and we are not aware of any.

The California cases referred to by the learned counsel for plaintiffs are not in point.

Judgment reversed.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF HENRY E.
ROBINSON, DECEASED — RESIDUARY LEGATEES,
APPELLANTS.

WILL — BEQUEST FOR CHARITABLE PURPOSES. — A bequest of money to the mayor and common council and commonalty of the city of San Francisco in trust to invest the same, and to pay the interest from time to time as they may deem proper to the destitute women and children of that city, is a bequest for charitable purposes, and not in violation of any provision of the Constitution or statutes of this State against perpetuities.

ID. — CAPACITY OF THE CORPORATION TO TAKE. — Under section 1313 of the Civil Code, a municipal corporation may take property in trust for charitable purposes within the general scope of its powers and duties. The care and support of its indigent women and children are matters germane to the objects of the municipality, and it is competent for the corporation to take a bequest for such purposes, and administer the trust as directed by the testator.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco making distribution of the estate of the deceased.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

D. P. Bellknap, and C. J. Swift, for Appellants. (Cited McCartee v. Orphan Asylum, 9 Cowen, 437; §§ 1275, 1313, Civ. Code.)

W. C. Burnett, for the Mayor and the city and county of San Francisco, Respondents.

ROSS, J.—Henry E. Robinson, by his will executed in the State of New York, bequeathed “to the mayor, common council and commonalty of the city of San Francisco, California, the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000), in trust, to be by them and their successors invested to the best advantage, the interest accruing thereon to be paid out from time to time to the destitute women and children of the city of San Francisco, California, in such a manner as such mayor and common council may deem most proper and beneficial.”

Mr. Robinson having died and administration upon his estate having been had, the court below, in the decree of distribution, directed the executor to pay, out of the estate, “to the mayor and board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco the sum of forty thousand dollars in trust, to be by them and their successors in office invested to the best advantage, the interest accruing thereon to be paid out from time to time to the destitute women and children of the city of San Francisco, California, in such a manner as such mayor and board of supervisors may deem most proper and beneficial.” The appeal is from this portion of the decree.

We do not understand appellants to claim that the court below erred in substituting the legal appellation of the municipality in question for that employed by the testator, but their claim is that the bequest itself is void because prohibited by statute.

In the Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457, we held that trusts for perpetual charitable uses are not in conflict with the Constitution of the State, nor are they in conflict with those provisions of the Civil Code which prohibit perpetuities; and further, that the perpetuities prohibited by the common law do not include trusts for charitable uses. It is here contended, however, that by section 1275 of the Civil Code, all corporations, other than those formed for scientific, literary, or solely educational purposes (within which exception the municipality in question does not come), are prohibited from taking under a will, unless expressly authorized by statute to take, and that the statute nowhere authorizes this corporation to take a bequest in trust for charitable uses.

The first of these propositions is obviously true, for the statute in terms so declares. It reads: “Sec. 1275. A testamentary disposition may be made to any person capable by law of taking the property so disposed of, except corporations other than those formed for scientific, literary, or solely educational purposes, cannot take under a will, unless expressly authorized by statute."

But section 1313 of the same Code is as follows: "No estate real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society, or corporation, or to any person or persons, in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy, and each of them, shall be valid: provided, that no such devises or bequests shall collectively exceed one third of the estate of the testator leaving legal heirs, and in such case a pro rata deduction from such devises or bequests shall be made, so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one third of such estate; and all dispositions of property contrary hereto shall be void and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law."

This section recognizes the right on the part of the testator to give to charitable uses, with such limitations as the legislature deemed sufficient to prevent extravagant donations—"to the disherison of natural heirs"—for by it, it is expressly declared that a bequest or devise made to any charitable or benevolent society, or corporation, or to any person or persons, in trust for charitable uses, if made at least thirty days prior to the death of the testator, shall be valid; subject to the proviso therein contained.

In the present case, the bequest was made more than thirty days prior to the death of the testator, and it does not fall within the proviso to the section. There is, therefore, express statutory authority for it, unless there is something in the nature of the corporation, upon which the trust is conferred, that prevents it from taking. The bequest, as must be admitted, is a most laudable one. It is a charity, for it is not limited to any particular persons. The objects to be benefited were strangers to the testator. They are the destitute women and children of the city of San Francisco. The care and protection and support of these are objects within the general scope and purpose of the municipal corporation, although not its immediate purpose. The purpose for which the trust was conferred being, therefore, germane to the objects of the corporation, there is no reason why it may not take, under the statute, and abundant authorities sustain the proposition that it may. "Not only may municipal corporations," says Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, sec. 567, "take and hold property in their own right by direct gift, conveyance, or devise, but the cases firmly establish the principle, also, that such corporations, at least in this country, are capable, unless specially restrained, of taking property, real and personal in trust, for purposes germane to the objects of the corporation, or which will promote, aid, or assist in carrying out or perfecting those objects. So such corporations may become cestuis que trust within the scope of the purposes for which they are created. And where the trust reposed in the corporation is for the benefit of the corporation, or for a charity within the scope of its duties, it may be compelled, in equity, to administer and execute it. But the legislature may divest a municipal corporation of the power to administer the charitable trusts conferred upon it, and appoint or provide for the appointment of new trustees independent of the corporation, and vest in them the management of such trusts."

Judgment affirmed.

W. W. CROSS, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF T. W. SIGOURNEY, DECEASED, RESPONDENT, v. MARKS ZELLERBACH ET AL., MARKS ZELLERBACH, APPELLANT.

SAME v. SAME — EUREKA LAKE AND YUBA CANAL COMPANY CONSOLIDATED, APPELLANT.

LAW OF THE CASE. — A decision on appeal, based upon a particular state of facts, is not binding in respect to questions arising on a second appeal, and depending for their solution upon facts essentially different.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE — PLEADING — CROSS-COMPLAINT — DEMURRER. — On the 1st of July, 1864, T. W. Sigourney brought an action to foreclose a mortgage against the property of a corporation known as the Eureka Lake Company. Marks Zellerbach and certain other persons, alleged to be subsequent encumbrancers, were made defendants. Zellerbach afterwards succeeded to the rights of the company, and was the only one of the original defendants who appeared in the action. On the 28d of August, 1865, Sigourney and Zellerbach made the agreement referred to in the opinion of the court. The Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated was organized in pursuance of that agreement, and intervened in the action which was then tried, and resulted in the recovery of a judgment by Sigourney. This judgment was reversed on appeal, and before any other proceedings were taken Sigourney died, and his administrator was substituted as plaintiff. A supplemental complaint was afterwards filed, setting up the agreement, alleging its non-performance by Zellerbach, and making the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated a defendant. Zellerbach answered, and the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated withdrew its intervention, and filed an answer, and also a cross-complaint claiming affirmative relief against Zellerbach and the plaintiff. Zellerbach demurred to the cross-complaint, and the demurrer was sustained. The action was again tried, and from the judgment rendered, separate appeals were taken by Zellerbach and the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated. After an extended examination of the case as presented by the two appeals, held, that the demurrer was improperly sustained, and that the court below proceeded on an erroneous view of the rights of the parties.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the county of Nevada.

The facts stated in the opinion cannot be understood without the cross-complaint. This complaint, therefore, is given in full as follows:—

And further and for cause of action, by way of cross-complaint, defendant avers that it is a corporation duly organized in the year 1865, under and pursuant to the laws of the State of New York, and having its principal place of business in the city and county of New York, in the State of New York.

That the corporate name of this defendant, under which it was organized and still exists, is the "Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated."

That as such corporation it now is, and for more than fifteen years last past has been, the sole and exclusive owner of, in the sole and exclusive possession of, and is entitled to the sole and exclusive possession of all and singular the water ditches, property, land, premises, franchises, and privileges described in the original complaint in this case, and in the mortgage described therein.

That in the year 1865, Marks Zellerbach, one of the defendants herein, had succeeded to the ownership of, and was the exclusive owner of, and possessed of, all and singular the property described in the mortgage sought to be foreclosed by the original complaint in this case, holding and owning the same, however, subject to the lien of the two certain mortgages referred to in the agreement hereinafter set forth; and being desirous of selling such property, together with other and similar property in the vicinity thereof, by him, the said Zellerbach, either owned or controlled, and this defendant being willing to purchase all of said property, provided the same could be so purchased free and clear from all liens and encumbrances. Whereupon he, the said Marks Zellerbach, for the purpose of effecting the sale to this defendant, and of removing all such liens and encumbrances from the property about to be conveyed, and more particularly the lien of the mortgage of the plaintiff herein, and the lien of a certain other mortgage held by Sigourney and E. P. Marsellus, did enter into the following agreement with T. W. Sigourney:

"Articles of agreement made and entered into this twenty-third day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, between T. W. Sigourney, of the county of Nevada, in the State of California, party of the first part, and Marks Zellerbach, of the city and county of San Francisco, in said State of California, party of the second part.

"Whereas, the said party of the first part is the owner and holder of a certain note made by the Eureka Lake Company, for the sum of ten thousand dollars, which note is secured by a certain mortgage, made by said Eureka Lake Company to the said party of the first part, and hereinafter more particularly described.

"And whereas, the said party of the first part is also the holder and owner of a certain other note, made by the Eureka Lake Company, for the sum of twelve thousand dollars, which note is secured by a certain mortgage, made by the said Eureka Lake Water Company to the said party of the first part and one E. P. Marsellus, and which is also hereinafter more particularly described; and, whereas, the said party of the second part is desirous of purchasing such notes and mortgages, and the interest of said party of the first part therein, and the said party of the first part has consented and agreed to sell and convey the same to him, in manner hereinafter mentioned.

"Now this agreement witnesseth, that in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of one dollar, to him in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part does hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner following — that is to say, that he will forthwith assign, transfer, and set over, by good and legal assignments, unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the said hereinbefore recited note for ten thousand dollars, made by the said Eureka Lake Company, and all interest now due, or to grow due thereon, together with the said indenture of mortgage, made to secure payment of said note, and which indenture of mortgage is more particularly described as a certain indenture of mortgage, bearing date of the second day of July, A. D. 1859, and made between the Eureka Lake Company, party of the first part, and the said party hereto of the first part of the second part, and which is duly recorded in the office of the recorder of the county of Nevada, in said State of California, in book 3 of Chattel Mortgages, page 359, and also the said other hereinbefore recited note of twelve thousand dollars, made by the said Eureka Lake Water Company, and all interest now due, or to grow due thereon, together with all his interest in the said indenture of mortgage, made to secure the payment of said note, and which indenture of mortgage is more particularly described as follows: —

"A certain indenture of mortgage, bearing date the ninth day of November, A. D. 1861, and made between the Eureka Lake Water Company, party of the first part, and one E. P. Marsellus, and the said party hereto of the first part, parties of the other part, and which is duly recorded in the office of the recorder of said county of Nevada, in book 4 of Mortgages, page 235; and also in book 6 of Chattel Mortgages, page 523, such last described mortgage being given to secure said note of twelve thousand dollars; and also a certain other note of twenty-eight thousand dollars, which is now held and owned by said party hereto of the second part, and further, that he will immediately upon executing such assignments as aforesaid, place such assignments, notes, and mortgages (so far as he can control the possession thereof) in the hands of John Parrott, of the city and county of San Francisco, aforesaid, to be by him held in escrow, and delivered to the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, at the time and in the manner hereinafter declared and set forth. And in consideration of the premises and such assignments so to be made to him as aforesaid, the said party of the second part does hereby, for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner following—that is to say, that immediately upon the execution of such assignments, and the deposit thereof, together with said notes and mortgages as aforesaid, in the hands of John Parrott, as aforesaid, he, the said party of the second part, will make, execute, and deliver to said party of the first part, his certain promissory note for the sum of forty thousand dollars, payable in United States gold coin to the order of said party of the first part, nine months after the date thereof, with interest thereon at the rate of one half of one per cent per month until the maturity thereof; and if not paid at maturity, said note to bear interest at the rate of one and one quarter per cent per month until paid, and also, at the same time, will make, execute, and deliver to said party of the first part his certain other promissory note for the sum of ten thousand dollars, payable in United States gold coin, to the order of said party of the first part, nine months after the date thereof, and interest thereon at the rate of one and one quarter per cent per month; and further, that he will pay, or cause to be paid, the interest on such forty thousand dollar note monthly, in United States gold coin, and on the said ten thousand dollar note, at the end of every three months, in like gold coin. And it is hereby mutually agreed and declared by and between the said parties hereto, that in case the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall, at any time hereafter, and before the expiration of the time of payment of the said last hereinbefore mentioned and described note, be desirous of paying off and discharging the same, that, in such case, it shall and may be lawful for him or them so to do, upon giving thirty days' previous notice in writing of such his or their intention, to the said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, or assigns. And, whereas, it is the intention of said party of the second part to forthwith proceed to organize a corporation for the purpose of carrying on and conducting the works in Nevada and Sierra Counties, California, heretofore owned in and conducted by the said Eureka Lake Water Company (the property formerly belonging to whom the said hereinbefore recited mortgages in part cover), and by the Middle Yuba Canal and Water Company.

"Now this agreement further witnesseth, and it is hereby mutually declared and agreed, by and between the said parties hereto, that the hereinbefore mentioned and described assignments, together with the notes and mortgages so deposited, in escrow as aforesaid, in the hands of said John Parrott, shall remain and continue in his hands as security for the payment of the said hereinbefore mentioned and described notes of forty thousand dollars and ten thousand dollars, until said notes are paid or other security given as next hereinafter mentioned. And said assignments shall in no case be recorded, or filed for record, in the office of the county recorder of said county of Nevada until they are delivered to said party of the second part, as hereinafter provided for. And it is further mutually agreed and declared, by and between the said parties hereto, that if, in the formation of said company, as hereinbefore recited, the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns shall deposit with the said John Parrott unencumbered and unassessable stock of said company, to the amount of one sixteenth part or share of the whole capital stock, as collateral security for the payment of said forty thousand dollar note, and the further amount of one sixty-fourth part or share of said stock, likewise unencumbered and unassessable, as collateral security for the payment of said ten thousand dollar note; then and in such case it shall be lawful, and it is hereby made the duty of said Parrott to receive such stock as such collateral security, and immediately thereupon to deliver to said party of the second part, his executors, administrators or assigns, or his or their attorney, the said assignments, notes, and mortgages so deposited with him in escrow as aforesaid; provided always, and it is made the duty of said Parrott, before receiving such stock as security, and delivering such paper, so deposited with him, as aforesaid, to be fully satisfied that the titles of all property formerly belonging to the Middle Yuba Canal and Water Company and the Eureka Lake Water Company are conveyed to, and the same fully and completely vested in the new company so to be formed as aforesaid, free and clear from encumbrances, other than liens, mortgages, or encumbrances held or controlled by said company, or by parties in trust for it, or held in escrow for its benefit.

"And it is further mutually agreed and declared that on payment of said notes the stock so deposited as security, as aforesaid, shall be retransferred and redelivered to said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and on the payment of either of said notes before the other, the part of said stock so specially deposited to secure such note shall be retransferred and redelivered as aforesaid; and on payment of a part of either of said notes, a proportionate part of the stock especially deposited to secure such note shall be so retransferred and redelivered as aforesaid.

"And it is further mutually agreed and declared that in case said notes of forty thousand dollars and ten thousand dollars, or either of them, shall remain wholly unpaid at the maturity thereof, it shall be the duty of said John Parrott to deliver on demand, to the said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the stock especially deposited as security for such notes so remaining unpaid as aforesaid; and in case a part only of said notes, or either of them, shall remain unpaid at the maturity thereof, then a proportionate part only of the stock so especially deposited as security for the note so remaining unpaid in part shall be so delivered to said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, or assigns. And upon the event of said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, or assigns so receiving any of such stock, as lastly hereinbefore provided, it shall and may be lawful for him or them to sell and dispose of said stock, or so much thereof as may be needful, at public sale, having first given thirty days' notice in writing of his or their intention to sell, and of the time and place of such sale, to the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and out of the proceeds arising therefrom shall, in the first place, pay the reasonable costs and expenses of such sale, and after payment thereof shall retain the amount due for principal and interest on the note or notes so remaining unpaid, and the balance (if any), together with the stock unsold (if any), he shall immediately pay and transfer to the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

"In witness whereof, the said parties hereto have, to duplicates hereof, set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"T. W. SIGOURNEY. [SEAL]

"M. ZELLERBACH. [SEAL]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of

"OCTAVIUS BELL."

And defendant avers that said agreement in writing as above set forth was duly executed by said T. W. Sigourney and by Marks Zellerbach on the 23d day of August, 1865, and was by the parties thereto duly deposited with John Parrott, of the city and county of San Francisco, and the foregoing is a copy thereof, and of an agreement of which an imperfect copy is set out in the supplemental complaint of plaintiff herein.

That thereupon, as defendant is informed, verily believes, and avers the truth to be, T. W. Sigourney did execute assignment of the notes and mortgages in the said agreement specified, including the identical note and mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this action, to Marks Zellerbach, as in said agreement provided for; and the said Marks Zellerbach then and there did deliver to the said T. W. Sigourney his promissory note in writing, dated May 19, 1865, for forty thousand dollars, payable in United States gold coin, at the time and in the manner, with the interest, and in all respects as in said agreement specified, and did also make and deliver at the same time and place, and under the same date, his certain other promissory note for ten thousand dollars, payable in like gold coin, to the said T. W. Sigourney, at the time, in the manner, and with the interest, as in said agreement provided for; copies of which two several promissory notes are set out in the supplemental complaint herein.

And defendant avers that the consideration of the said two promissory notes included the sum of money due to T. W.

Sigourney upon the note secured by mortgage, described in the original complaint herein, and the sum of money due to said Sigourney on account of the note to him and E. P. Marsellus, mentioned in the foregoing agreement; that said promissory notes were, by the said Zellerbach, made and delivered, and by the said Sigourney received and held, in lieu of said former notes secured by mortgages; and thereupon and thereafter the note and mortgage described in the original complaint herein was held only as collateral security for the payment of said promissory notes, for forty thousand dollars and ten thousand dollars, as in the foregoing agreement expressly provided, and as this defendant is informed and verily believes, Marks Zellerbach has, since said date, and up to December 19, 1876, paid all the interest theretofore accrued on said two promissory notes to the said T. W. Sigourney, as in said agreement provided, and as in said notes specified.

Defendant is informed and verily believes and avers the truth to be, that Marks Zellerbach, in further compliance with the agreement aforesaid, and in the manner therein provided for, did deposit, or cause to be deposited, with John Parrott, unencumbered, unassessable paid-up capital stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated, the corporation in said agreement specified and intended, to the extent of one sixteenth of all the capital stock of said company, consisting of twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock, as security for the payment of said promissory notes, which said stock, though less in quantity than called for by the contract, was by the parties thereto, and by each of them, taken and treated as a compliance with the contract, and the said stock was managed, controlled, and voted by the said Sigourney, or by his authority, and remained in the hands of John Parrott, as trustee under said contract, until disposed of as hereinafter stated.

And defendant is further informed, verily believes, and avers the truth to be, that, except as to the quantity of stock deposited, Marks Zellerbach has on his part fully kept and performed all the conditions, agreements and covenants by him, the said Zellerbach, to be kept and performed by said contract of August 23, 1865, between him, the said Zellerbach, and the said Sigourney, and hereinbefore set out.

And defendant avers that before receiving the stock aforesaid as security, the said John Parrott, trustee, became and was satisfied and reported to this defendant that the property in said agreement specified was free and clear from all encumbrances and liens, excepting only such as were held by defendant or by parties in trust for it, or in escrow for its benefit.

And defendant avers that the said Marks Zellerbach represented to it that the encumbrances in the agreement hereinbefore set out and referred to were so deposited as and for him, to be delivered up to him and cancelled upon the conveyance to it, the defendant, of the property of the Eureka Lake Company—the Eureka Lake Water Company—the Middle Yuba Canal Company and certain other property, upon the issuing and deposit of the stock called for by said agreement with John Parrott for T. W. Sigourney.

That relying upon such statement, and believing the same to be true, this defendant was thereby induced to purchase, and on, to wit, December 20, 1865, did purchase from the said Marks Zellerbach, and take and receive from him, the said Zellerbach, a deed of conveyance whereby he conveyed to defendant, in fee simple, all and singular the property in said agreement specified and referred to, including all the property in the mortgage in this cause described; that by said deed of conveyance the said Marks Zellerbach warranted and bound himself to defend the title to the property conveyed as against all liens and encumbrances, or adverse claims, and covenanted to and with defendant, the grantee in such conveyance, that all of said property was free and clear from liens and encumbrances of every nature and kind whatsoever.

That the conveyance aforesaid was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Nevada County, California, on, to wit, January 29, 1866, in book 21 of Deeds, pages 79–86, Records of Nevada County, and thereupon the stock was by this defendant issued to Marks Zellerbach, as called for by said contract, and by him deposited with John Parrott as aforesaid, and thence hitherto, until sold as hereinafter stated, has been managed and controlled by T. W. Sigourney, as collateral security for the payment of the promissory notes aforesaid.

And defendant denies that there is, in any event, due to plaintiff the sum of ten thousand dollars and interest thereon at two and one half per cent per month, less five hundred dollars paid, as in his complaint specified; and in support of such denial avers that the sum of ten thousand dollars, the principal due on the promissory note secured by mortgage, and set out in the original complaint, formed a part of the consideration for the two promissory notes set out in the supplemental complaint.

And defendant is informed, verily believes, and avers the truth to be, that Marks Zellerbach has become and is insolvent, and is wholly without means to respond to the defendant for the damage it will sustain, or for any part thereof, if the mortgage herein is foreclosed, and decreed to be satisfied out of the property in such mortgage described, viz., out of the property of this defendant so conveyed to it under covenants and warranty by said Zellerbach as aforesaid.

Defendant further avers, that on, to wit, September 9, 1878, a decree of foreclosure was duly entered in this cause by the Hon. District Court, in and for the county of Nevada, which court was the predecessor to this honorable court, whereby and by virtue whereof, it was among other things decreed that the twelve hundred and fifty shares of capital stock aforesaid be first sold to satisfy the amount found due to T. W. Sigourney, viz., $63,077.74, and interest thereon from September 9, 1878, at seven per cent per annum, and that the residue of said sum if any, after a sale of said stock, be made by a sale of the mortgaged premises in the mortgage set forth in this cause; that in said cause the court had jurisdiction of the parties, hereto, and of all of them, and of the subject-matter in the cause involved; that said judgment was duly entered, and was and remained in full force and effect until the 30th day of August, A. D. 1880, when it was, on an appeal therefrom by Marks Zellerbach, reversed by the Supreme Court of the State of California, as of the date of May 20, 1880, and a new trial ordered herein.

Defendant further avers that after the entry of the judgment and decree aforesaid, an order issued to the sheriff of Nevada County, in due form, commanding him to sell the twelve hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock so issued to T. W. Sigourney, as collateral security; whereupon said stock was, by the said sheriff, duly advertised for sale at public auction on the 13th day of February, 1879, on which last named day it was sold to this defendant for the full amount of the judgment and costs in said cause, to wit, for $66,255.63, said defendant being the highest and best bidder therefor.

And defendant avers that the sum bid by it for the said twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock was in excess of the market value thereof at that time, by at least twenty thousand dollars; that this defendant was induced to bid said sum of money thereon by Marks Zellerbach who represented to defendant that, being bound by his covenants in the deed of conveyance by him made to this defendant as aforesaid, to hold the defendant harmless from the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, he was desirous to have the twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock sold for a sum sufficient to satisfy the entire demand of plaintiff and costs; and that, if this defendant would bid therefor such sum, he, the said Zellerbach, would, upon being given time therefor, purchase from this defendant said twelve hundred and fifty shares at the price by it paid therefor, and interest thereon; whereupon, and relying upon such statements, defendant purchased the stock as aforesaid for said sum of $66,255.63, and thereupon, and on the same day, viz., on the 13th day of February, 1879, this defendant entered into a written agreement with said Marks Zellerbach whereby, in consideration of the payment to it by the said Zellerbach, at any time within eighteen months next thereafter, of the sum of $66,255.63, and interest thereon at nine per cent per annum, it would deliver to said Marks Zellerbach the said twelve hundred and fifty shares of capital stock so by it purchased, together with an additional one thousand shares of such stock, and would deliver to Charles Allenberg an additional one thousand shares of its capital stock, and pay to said Allenberg two thousand dollars, and to said Marks Zellerbach the sum of two thousand dollars; which said two several sums of money were by defendant paid, and said thousand shares of stock were by it delivered to said Charles Allenberg, pursuant to said agreement, but that the said Zellerbach has neglected and refused to pay said sum of $66,255.63, or any part thereof, though the period of eighteen months has long since elapsed.

And defendant avers that by his acts in the premises as above set forth, and in various other ways, the said Zellerbach approved and ratified the hypothecation and holding said stock as collateral for the payment of said promissory notes, and the sale thereof and the application of the proceeds arising therefrom to the satisfaction of the sum of money due to plaintiff herein.

Defendant further avers that the said sum of $66,255.63, realized from the sale of said twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock, was, after deducting costs, expenses, and fees of sale, paid over to T. W. Sigourney, and by him applied in satisfaction of his claim in this action.

Wherefore, in consideration of the premises, defendant prays this honorable court that it will, by its final decree herein, adjudge that said sum of money so realized from the sale of said twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock stand in lieu of and as the substitute for said stock.

That the plaintiff herein be decreed to retain and hold the same in full satisfaction of his claim in this action.

That plaintiff be adjudged to fully satisfy of record, and to cancel and deliver up the note and mortgage described in the original complaint herein, and to cancel and deliver up to Marks Zellerbach, defendant herein, the promissory notes for forty thousand dollars and ten thousand dollars in the supplemental complaint described, and that the note and mortgage to Sigourney & Marsellus be decreed to be fully satisfied, and for such other and further relief as may be just, proper, and in consonance with equity, and for costs of suit herein.

Ross, J.—These cases have been argued and submitted together. The first is an appeal by the defendant Zellerbach, and the second an appeal by the defendant, the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated. These defendants and the plaintiff are the real parties to the controversy. On the first appeal of Zellerbach, reported in 55 Cal. 431, the appeal came up and was considered on, (1) the complaint filed July 1, 1864, by Sigourney — the present plaintiff's intestate — which complaint was in the usual form for the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the payment of a promissory note for ten thousand dollars, executed, July 2, 1859, to Sigourney, by a corporation called the Eureka Lake Company; (2) a complaint in intervention filed by the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated; (3) the answer of Sigourney to the complaint in intervention; and, (4) the findings and decree of the court. There were some other pleadings in the case, not, however, important to mention.

On that appeal it was rightly held here that the decree of the court then under review, which adjudged Sigourney a lien on the twelve hundred and fifty shares of the stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated, to secure the payment of the ten thousand dollar note set out in the complaint then before the court, and which directed a sale of that stock to pay the amount of that note, was erroneous — first, because the complaint contained no averment to sustain such decree; secondly, because the contract between Sigourney and Zellerbach of date August 23, 1865, did not provide for any lien on the shares of stock as security for the note then in suit; thirdly, because, even if the court could have looked to the complaint in intervention in support of the decree, that complaint showed full compliance on the part of Zellerbach with all of the agreements, covenants, and conditions of the contract of August 23, 1865, which performance, according to the terms of that contract, entitled Zellerbach to the surrender of the note and mortgage on which the complaint, then under consideration, was based, as also the notes and the mortgage made to Zellerbach and Marsellus by the Eureka Lake Water Company for cancellation; and lastly, because the findings then before us showed that none of the stock in question was ever accepted by Sigourney as security, or as a compliance with the contract of August 23, 1865, but, on the contrary, that it was deposited with Parrott only in escrow, and that the contingency upon which the transfer was to take effect had never happened.

But, by the records now brought here, the case is presented in a very different aspect. It now appears that, after the going down of the remittitur from this court, the plaintiff was permitted to, and did, file in the court below a supplemental complaint, to which Zellerbach and the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated filed an answer; the complaint in intervention of the last-mentioned company was, by the permission of the court, withdrawn, and there was filed by it a cross-complaint, a demurrer to which, filed by Zellerbach, was sustained by the court, and which ruling constitutes the ground of the present appeal, taken by the cross-complainant — the other appeal being brought by Zellerbach.

An examination of the pleadings shows that the decision of this court on the former appeal does not cover the points now presented. Facts are now alleged which were not then before the court, and which, if true, materially change the rights of the parties. The averments of the cross-complaint must, of course, be taken as true, and such of the averments of the supplemental complaint as were found by the court below to be true, and such as are not denied, must also be accepted as facts on these appeals. Both the supplemental and cross-complaints allege, and the court below on the last trial found the fact to be, that, in pursuance of the provisions of the contract of August 23, 1865 — which is fully set out in both the supplemental and cross-complaints — Sigourney executed assignments to Zellerbach of the note and mortgage on which the original complaint was based and of the twelve thousand dollar note made to him by the Eureka Lake Water Company, together with his (Sigourney's) interest in the mortgage given by the Eureka Lake Water Company to secure the payment of the note last mentioned and the twenty-eight thousand dollar note given to Marsellus, and that thereupon Zellerbach executed and delivered to Sigourney his two promissory notes for forty and ten thousand dollars, respectively, as provided for by the contract of August 23, 1865, and which are set forth in the supplemental and cross-complaints; and, further, that pursuant to the provisions of the contract of August 23d, Sigourney deposited the note and mortgage set out in the original complaint, and the twelve thousand dollar note and mortgage securing the same, together with the assignments thereof, with Parrott, to be by him held as collateral security for the payment of the forty and ten thousand dollar notes executed to Sigourney by Zellerbach, or until Zellerbach should deposit with Parrott as security for said two last mentioned notes, the shares of stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated as provided for in and by the contract of August 23d. Upon the deposit of the stock as provided for by the contract, or upon the payment of Zellerbach's notes for forty and ten thousand dollars, Parrott was to deliver up to Zellerbach for cancellation the notes and mortgages deposited with him by Sigourney. Zellerbach, it must be remembered, had become the owner of the property covered by the mortgage set out in the original complaint and of that covered by the mortgage executed by the Eureka Lake Water Company to secure the twelve and twenty-eight thousand dollar notes given to Sigourney and Marsellus, respectively, the latter of which he had also acquired; and being also the owner and controller of other property of like character as that mortgage, had become desirous of organizing a corporation in the State of New York, to which he might sell all of the said property. To accomplish his purpose in that regard it became necessary to free the property of all liens, and it was with that end in view that he entered into the contract with Sigourney — the holder of the liens — of date August 23, 1865. Both the supplemental and cross-complaints, as also the findings of the court below, show that Sigourney kept and performed all of the agreements, covenants, and conditions on his part provided to be kept and performed, in and by that contract. Zellerbach performed a part of his. He executed the forty and ten thousand dollar notes to Sigourney, and paid the interest thereon to the 19th day of December, 1876. He also deposited with Parrott, pursuant to his agreement, the one sixteenth part of the capital stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated, consisting of twelve hundred and fifty shares. But he did not deposit with Parrott an additional one sixty-fourth part of the capital stock of that corporation as in and by the contract of August 23, he had agreed to do. The cross-complainant, however, alleges that the twelve hundred and fifty shares he did deposit were so deposited, "as security for the payment of said promissory notes (for forty and ten thousand dollars respectively), which said stock, though less in quantity than called for by the contract, was by the parties thereto, and by each of them, taken and treated as a compliance with the contract, and the said stock was managed, controlled, and voted by the said Sigourney, or by his authority, and remained in the hands of John Parrott, as trustee under said contract until disposed of as hereinafter stated."

Parrott, according to the averments of the cross-complainant, having, before receiving the stock, become satisfied, and so reported to the cross-complainant, that the property was in the condition required by the contract of August 23, 1865, and Zellerbach having represented to it that the encumbrances in the said contract referred to were deposited for him to be delivered up and cancelled upon the conveyance to the cross-complainant of the property, and upon the deposit of the stock with Parrott as by the contract provided, the cross-complainant, relying upon such statements and believing them to be true, was thereby induced to purchase, and on December 20, 1865, to take from Zellerbach a deed of conveyance, whereby he conveyed to it all of the property referred to in the contract of August 23d, including that described in the mortgage sought to be foreclosed by the original complaint filed in this action, and by which deed Zellerbach warranted and bound himself to defend the title to the property conveyed as against all liens and encumbrances, or adverse claims, and covenanted to and with the grantee, the cross-complainant here, that all of the property was free and clear of liens and encumbrances of every nature and kind whatsoever. When the twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock which were deposited with Parrott were sold under the decree of the District Court, which was subsequently reversed by this court on the former appeal, they were purchased by the cross-complainant for the sum of $66,255.63, which, according to the averments of the cross-complainant, was at least twenty thousand dollars in excess of the market value thereof. Cross-complainant, according to the averments of its complaint, was induced to bid said sum for the stock by Zellerbach, who represented to it that, being bound by the covenants in his deed of conveyance to hold cross-complainant harmless from the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, he was desirous of having the twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock sold for a sum sufficient to satisfy the entire demand of plaintiff and costs, and that, if cross-complainant would bid therefor such sum, he, Zellerbach, would, upon being given time therefor, purchase from cross-complainant said twelve hundred and fifty shares at the price by it paid therefor, with interest thereon; whereupon, and relying upon such statements, cross-complainant purchased the stock as aforesaid, and thereupon, and on the same day, to wit, February 13, 1879, cross-complainant entered into a written agreement with Zellerbach, whereby, in consideration of the payment to it by him, at any time within eighteen months thereafter, of the sum of $66,255.63, and interest thereon at nine per cent per annum, it would deliver to the said Zellerbach the twelve hundred and fifty shares so by it purchased, together with an additional one thousand shares of such stock, and would deliver to one Allenberg an additional one thousand shares, and pay to said Allenberg two thousand dollars in money, and to the said Zellerbach a like sum of two thousand dollars in money; which said two several sums of money were so paid by cross-complainant, and said one thousand shares of stock were by it so delivered to Allenberg; by all of which, it is averred, Zellerbach approved and ratified the hypothecation and holding of the twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock as collateral security for the payment of his notes for forty and ten thousand dollars respectively, and approved and ratified the sale thereof, and the application of the proceeds thereof, to the satisfaction of the amount due the plaintiff. The amount so bid and paid by the cross-complainant for the stock was, according to the averments of the cross-complaint, as also those of the supplemental complaint, sufficient in amount, after deducting costs and the expenses of sale, to fully satisfy the plaintiff's claim in this action, and was, by the officer making the sale, paid to and received by Sigourney; and both the supplemental and cross-complaints pray that the plaintiff be decreed to retain and hold the same in full satisfaction of his claim in this action, and that he be adjudged to fully satisfy of record, and to cancel and deliver up the note and mortgage described in the original complaint, and to cancel and deliver up to Zellerbach the forty and ten thousand dollar notes executed by him, and that the twelve thousand dollar note executed to Sigourney by the Eureka Lake Water Company, together with the mortgage executed by that corporation to Sigourney and Marsellus, be decreed to be fully satisfied.

If the facts be as stated—and for the purposes of our decision we must so consider them—why should not such a decree be entered? It is true that the original complaint was one simply for the foreclosure of the mortgage executed July 2, 1859, by the Eureka Lake Company. But, during the pendency of the action, Zellerbach, who had become the owner of the property subject to the liens of Sigourney, desired to free the property of those liens in order that he might sell it, with other property, to the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated. For that purpose he made the contract with Sigourney of August 23, 1865. No objections have been urged to the validity of that contract, and it is clear that none could be successfully urged. Sigourney performed his part of the contract, and Zellerbach performed his obligations thereunder in part. He executed to Sigourney the forty and ten thousand dollar notes therein provided for, and from that time forth, according to the terms of the contract, the note and mortgage set out in the original complaint, as also the note and mortgage executed by the Eureka Lake Water Company, were held only as collateral security for the payment of Zellerbach's notes for ten and forty thousand dollars respectively. The latter became the principal obligations, and were assumed by Zellerbach in order that he might free the property of the liens held by Sigourney, to the end that he might effect the sale he contemplated making to the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated. In further pursuance of the contract with Sigourney, he (Zellerbach) deposited with Parrott twelve hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated. These shares were to be held as collateral security for the payment of the forty thousand dollar note executed by Zellerbach to Sigourney. The additional amount of one sixty-fourth part of the capital stock of the same corporation which the contract required Zellerbach to deposit as collateral security for the payment of the ten thousand dollar note executed by him to Sigourney, he did not deposit; but the cross-complaint alleges that the twelve hundred and fifty shares so deposited were by both Sigourney and Zellerbach "taken and treated as a compliance with the contract, and the stock was managed, controlled, and voted by the said Sigourney, or by his authority, and remained in the hands of John Parrott as trustee under said contract" until taken and sold by the sheriff.

Whether under such a state of facts a lien attached to the twelve hundred and fifty shares of stock for the payment of the forty and ten thousand dollar notes executed by Zellerbach, or either of them, we find unnecessary to determine; for when the stock was sold under and by virtue of the decree of the District Court, which was subsequently reversed by this court, the cross-complainant purchased it, at the instance and at the request of Zellerbach, and under a definite and specific contract with him, for a sum largely in excess of its market value, and sufficient to discharge what Zellerbach had bound himself to discharge, to wit: the liens on the property held by Sigourney. The money thus paid and bid for the twelve hundred and fifty shares of the stock of the Eureka Lake and Yuba Canal Company Consolidated, less costs and the expenses of sale, was paid over to Sigourney, and according to the averments of the supplemental and cross-complaints, was sufficient in amount to satisfy the entire demand of the plaintiff. If the facts be as stated we see no reason why a decree should not be entered substantially as prayed for in both the supplemental and cross-complaints, to the effect that the plaintiff retain and hold the money so paid in full satisfaction of his demand in the action, and that he be adjudged to satisfy of record and to cancel and deliver up the note and mortgage described in the original complaint, and to cancel and deliver up to Zellerbach the forty and ten thousand dollar notes executed by him, and that the twelve thousand dollar note executed to Sigourney by the Eureka Lake Water Company, together with the mortgage executed by that company to Sigourney and Marsellus be decreed to be fully satisfied. Such decree would give effect to the contracts of the parties and do exact justice between them. All of the parties in interest are, with sufficient pleadings, before the court of equity, which can and will take hold of the entire case and give effect to their contracts legally made.

We cannot at all assent to the proposition that the agreement under which the cross-complainant purchased the stock was "binding on nobody, and utterly void for want of consideration." The liens held by the plaintiff were the very liens Zellerbach had covenanted to remove; the debt for which they stood as security had become his debt, and, according to the facts as now made to appear, it was for the very purpose of paying that debt and satisfying those liens that he induced the cross-complainant to pay for the stock a sum of money largely in excess of its value and sufficient to pay the debt, and thereby discharge the liens, agreeing at the same time, and as part of the same transaction, to repurchase the stock, within a given time, at the same price (with interest as provided for), and obtaining for himself two thousand dollars in money, and a contract for an additional one thousand shares of stock, together with two thousand dollars in money, and one thousand shares of stock for one Allenberg. Performance of the agreement on the part of the cross-complainant is averred, and it would be grossly inequitable to permit Zellerbach to repudiate the agreement under which, at his request, the money of the cross-complainant went to pay his debt, and to remove encumbrances which he had, in the most solemn manner, bound himself to remove, and by which he received other and further considerations of value.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the cross-complaint, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Right of Lateral Support is incident to the land. The notice required before excavating, under section 832 of the Civil Code, as amended, does not relieve from the prudent care which one excavating must take. How far the right extends to buildings on the land, pp. 272, 273.

Cited in Conboy v. Dickinson, 92 Cal. 604, to same effect, and stating an example of insufficient precaution in excavating; Sullivan v. Zenier, 98 Cal. 348, holding that the omission of the words "by nature" from the original section 832 of the Civil Code did not enlarge the common law right of lateral support. Overruled in S. C., p. 349, as to right to support of a building; Green v. Berge, 105 Cal. 58, 45 Am. St. Rep. 28, holding that the only neglect necessary to give a cause of action is the neglect to furnish the support required by the statute; dissenting opinion Bohrer v. Harness Co., 19 Ind. App. 514, 520, main opinion sustaining recovery irrespective of negligence. Note to 66 Am. Dec. 649, on no natural right to support of building by adjacent land; note to 66 Am. Dec. 650, on notice to be given to adjacent owner of building before excavation; note to 66 Am. Rule of Respondent Superior does not apply where the excavation is done by an independent contractor, who is liable for damages, pp. 274, 275.

Doubted in Green v. Berge, 105 Cal. 57; 45 Am. St. Rep. 28, and S. C., pp. 58, 69, 45 Am. St. Rep. 29, saying that all other authorities hold that the landowner cannot relieve himself of responsibility by making a contract. Cited in note to 66 Am. Referred to in Hutchinson v. Ainsworth (being appeal from second trial of same case), 73 Cal. 453, holding the notary not a necessary party, as the reformation of the certificate would be made by the court; note to Williams v. Hamilton, 65 Am. St. Rep. 485, 513, on reformation. Distinguished in Cox v. Holcomb, 87 Ala. 592, 13 Am. Explained in Willard v. Superior Court, 82 Cal. 460, and developing the meaning of the section. Cited by Thornton, J., S. C. p. 467, in his dissenting opinion arguing that nothing could take away the constitutional right of a prisoner to compel the attendance in court of a prisoner witness on his behalf.

Cited as a case in point in State v. Boswell, 104 Ind. 543. Note the principal case after being affirmed as appears above (63 Cal. 288) went back to the trial court, and on the day for fixing the date for execution defendant's counsel raised the question that all the proceedings were invalid because founded on information instead of indictment, and argued that the provision in the constitution of California, article I, section 8, was in conflict with the fifth and fourteenth articles of amendment of the constitution of the United States. The objection was overruled and on appeal the decision was sustained. (See 64 Cal., cases not reported XVIII.) From this decision error was taken to the supreme court of the United States; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, where after an elaborate discussion of the question it was held that a proceeding by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate instead of by presentment and indictment by a grand jury was "due process of law."

63 Cal. 332-333. DUFFICY v. SHIELDS.

Chattel Mortgage on hotel furniture is void when it is intended to secure more than the purchase price of the furniture, p. 333.

Mentioned in San Francisco Breweries v. Schurtz, 104 Cal. 426, as having been cited by appellant to hold that a mortgage of saloon fixtures and other personal property not mortgageable was wholly void, the court stating that the principal case was also cited in In re Fischer, 94 Cal. 523, and, to the extent that it (the principal case) did so declare, it was in effect overruled by the last-named case, and was no longer authority.

Note.—In the case of In re Fischer, 94 Cal. 523, above referred to, the principal case was cited by appellant's counsel, but not by the court in its opinion as authority for the proposition that the mortgage was wholly void for a failure to strictly comply with the provisions of the Civil Code, but in what respect the report does not state, and the court held that a mortgage of printing presses was not wholly void because it included other property not mortgageable. It is conceived that the court in the case of San Francisco Breweries v. Schurts, supra, if it intended to overrule the principal case, and, also, the writer of the annotation to section 2955 of the Civil Code (Deering's), subdivision eight, in stating, on the authority of the principal case, that "if the chattel mortgage on the furniture in a hotel included other property it would be void," have both misread the decision of the principal case, and also overlooked the fact that subdivision eight of section 2955 of the Civil Code contains a special feature, not found in any of the other subsections, to the effect that a mortgage on hotel furniture can only be given to secure the purchase money of the articles mortgaged, and that the decision in the principal case turned on this one point, viz., that there the mortgage was given to secure something else, namely, the purchase money for the hotel or part of it, and was not held void because it included other property, viz., the lease of the hotel. The principal case therefore has not been overruled.

Cited in Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 60, 11 Am. Merced Bank*, 110 Cal. 202, to sustain the rule that a homestead cannot be created upon land held in cotenancy or tenancy in common in favor of one of the cotenants; nor, Lindley v. Davis, 6 Mont. 456, in land held in partnership; but, S. C., 7 Mont. 214, on a rehearing the first decision was reversed, and it was held that a cotenant was an "owner" within the meaning of the homestead laws of Montana, and entitled to the homestead exemption; note to 83 Am. Dec. 134, on homesteads cannot be carved out of land held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common; note to 1 Am. St. Rep. 594, on homestead exemptions. Distinguished in Payne v. Cummings, 146 Cal. 432, where homestead declared on community property including pre-emption claim and desert land claim and water rights in which claimant had part interest appurtenant to desert claim, after death of wife, conveyance by husband of moiety of desert land claim and water rights does not affect homestead exemption.

Note.—The broad assertion of the rule in Rosenthal v. Merced Bank, 110 Cal. 203, that "it is well settled in this state that a homestead cannot be created in lands held by tenancy in common," is unintelligible in view of the alteration effected in the law by the statute of March 9, 1868 (Stats. 1867-68, p. 116.) This act, in the plainest terms, enabled a homestead to be declared on land held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common, the sole requirement being that the land should be inclosed and exclusively occupied by the intending homesteader. If this law has not been repealed or declared unconstitutional, then it is conceived the recent decisions are contrary to law. The statute is referred to by Mr. Deering in his annotations to the Civil Code, section 1238, edition 1887, as in force, also in the note to 63 Am. Dec. 124, although in the subsequent note to 83 Am. Dec. 134, it is apparently overlooked. In the Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, ed. 1889, vol. IX, p. 423, note 4, the statute is again mentioned as in force, and the statement made that the sole requisites were exclusive possession (the statute reads "occupation"), and inclosure of the tract. It is noteworthy that the act of 1868 was not cited or referred to by either of the counsel or by the court in the case of Rosenthal v. Merced Bank, supra. The court in Rosenthal v. Merced Bank cite Fitzgerald v. Fernandez, 71 Cal. 504, as an authority for their ruling; reference to that case will show that it holds squarely the reverse, and that it upholds the act of 1868, when the requisites of exclusive occupation and inclosure are present. The question depends on whether the act of 1868 is still in force. The foregoing references appear to show that it is; but in the index to the laws of California, prepared in accordance with the act of March 11, 1893, while in one place, p. 285, it appears under the head of "Homestead, joint tenant entitled to without any reference to a repeal"; at another page, 710, it is indexed as a statute superseded or intended to be superseded by the codes.

Chattel Mortgage.—Recording is, under section 2957 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession, and a recorded mortgage passes the legal title, and subsequent purchasers and encumbrancers are bound by the notice which it imparts, p. 552.

Cited and approved in Beamer v. Freeman, 84 Cal. 557; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 183, holding that a subsequent encumbrancer was charged with notice that the legal title was in the mortgagee; Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 258, 49 Am. St. Rep. 89, holding that recording the instrument takes the place of delivery of possession of the mortgaged chattels. Distinguished and explained in Fassett v. Wise, 115 Cal. 325, 326, in dissenting opinion of Garoutte, J. Cited in Alferitz v. Ingalls, 83 Fed. Rep. 971, 972, as an instance of a decision following the common-law rule that a chattel mortgage operates to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee. Note: The decisions in this state as to the effect of a chattel mortgage upon the legal title are hopelessly at variance. In the above-mentioned cases, down to that in 115 Cal. 325, which was decided in Bank, December 14, 1896, it seems to have been held in language more or less distinct that, as is said in the principal case (decided in June, 1883), the mortgage "passes the title." But in the later cases of Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, after stating, p. 680, that in many of the states it was held, as at common law, that a mortgage of personal property transfers the title, the court says: "Such is not the rule in this state." Again, in Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, the court says, p. 218: "Prior to 1872 the giving of a chattel mortgage in this state vested the mortgagee with the title to the property mortgaged. . . . The Civil Code, however, went into effect that year, and under its provisions the mortgagor is not, by the execution of the chattel mortgage, divested of his title to the property, but still remains its owner, while the mortgagee has only a lien thereon, citing Civil Code, section 2888. It may be that the decision was intended to have reference only to the particular chattel mortgage there in question, one of livestock, it being doubted whether such mortgage covered the natural increase of the stock, but the opinion lays down the proposition in general terms as applicable to all chattel mortgages. Overruled in Alferitz v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 207, holding title not to pass, Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 296, 311, noted under Martin v. Thompson, 63 Cal. 3; Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 652, in point that mortgagee may maintain replevin where entitled to possession under the contract; and cf. Erreca v. Meyer, 142 Cal. 311, stating effect of Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, on main case.

I HAVE endeavored to give place in this volume to every thing which may be necessary to a correct understanding of the opinions of the court and to nothing more. The briefs of counsel are omitted, and where the opinion contains a sufficient statement of facts I have not thought it necessary to explain the omission of such statement by the reporter. All dissenting opinions will be found in their connection, and when the bench was not full the fact is noted. Several early cases of little interest to the profession, and some in which the facts cannot be obtained, are not reported. The number of unreported cases does not exceed ten, according to the best information I can get. It has been difficult to limit the cost of this publication to the amount which may probably be obtained from sales of it, and if any thing has been omitted from these pages which should have a place therein, I trust that the omission will be excused in view of the necessity of the occasion.

RULES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Adopted September 28, 1872.

WRIT OF ERROR; SUPERSEDEAS; PROCESS ON WRITS OF ERROR.

I. Writs of error shall be directed to the clerk or keeper of the record of the court, in which the judgment or decree complained of is entered, commanding him to certify a correct transcript of the record to this court. But when the plaintiff in error shall file, in the office of the clerk of this court, a transcript of the record, duly certified to be full and complete, before a writ of error issues, it shall not be necessary for the clerk of the inferior court to certify another transcript of the record to this court, but such transcript so filed with the clerk of this court shall be taken and considered to be a due return to said writ, and in such case the clerk of the inferior court shall return upon said writ, that the same has been served upon him, and that it appears by the indorsement thereon that a transcript of the record has been filed in the office of the clerk of the supreme court.

II. A scire facias or summons to hear errors may be made returnable on any day of the term; but all such writs which shall be issued more than ten days before the term shall be made returnable on the first day of the term, and if any such writ shall not be served ten days before the return day thereof, the defendant so served shall not be required to appear in obedience thereto until the first day of the term of court next succeeding such return day. A defendant, upon whom process has not been served, may enter his appearance and, upon five days' notice to the plain tiff, may proceed in the same manner as if duly served with process.

III. If a scire facias or summons to hear errors shall not be served, an alias or pluries may be issued without an order of court therefor.

IV. No supersedeas will be granted unless the transcript of the record, on which the application is made, be complete and certified by the clerk of the court below, with an assignment of errors written thereon or appended thereto.

V. When a writ of error shall be made a supersedeas, the clerk shall indorse upon said writ the following words: "A transcript of the record in this cause having been filed in my office with an order indorsed thereon, that the writ of error herein be made a supersedeas according to law, this writ of error is therefore made a supersedeas and shall operate accordingly;" which indorsement shall be signed by the clerk of this court.

VI. Whenever execution or other final process shall be issued upon a judgment at law or decree in equity, and the record of such judgment or decree shall be removed into this court by writ of error operating as a supersedeas, such writ of error may be served upon the officer in whose hands such execution may be, and thereupon all proceedings under such execution shall be discontinued, and such officer shall return the same into the court from whence it was issued, together with the copy of the writ of error served on him, and shall set forth in his return to such execution what, if any thing, he hath done in obedience to the command thereof. Such service of the writ of error and supersedeas may be made by delivering to the officer having such final process for execution a copy of such writ of error and the indorsements thereon, with the certificate of the clerk of the supreme court or of the clerk of the inferior court, to whom the same is directed, that the same is a true and perfect copy of the original of such writ of error and the indorsements thereon.

VII. Whenever a bond is executed by an attorney in fact, the original power of attorney shall be filed with the bond in the office of the clerk of this court, unless it shall appear that the power of attorney contains other powers than the more power to execute the bond in question, in which case the original power of attorney shall be presented to the clerk and a true copy thereof filed, certified by the clerk to be a true copy of the original.

TRANSCRIPT OF THE RECORD.

VIII. Clerks of inferior courts, in making up an authenticated copy of the record, shall certify to this court a copy of the process with the return thereto, the pleadings of the parties, the verdict in jury trials, the judgment of the court below and all orders of the court, the bill of exceptions, the appeal bond in cases appealed. This rule shall not extend to appeals or writs of error in chancery or criminal causes.

IX. The clerk of the court below shall arrange the several parts of the record in chronological order.

X. The clerk of this court shall not tax as costs in this court any matter inserted in the transcript contrary to the foregoing rules.

XI. The appellant or plaintiff in error, or his attorney, may, by precept, indicate to the clerk what of the files of the cause shall be inserted in the record, and in such case, if the record shall be insufficient, it shall be perfected at his costs, and if unnecessarily voluminous, the costs of the unnecessary parts shall be taxed against him.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

XII. Appellants and plaintiffs in error shall assign errors at the time of filing the transcript of the record, and each error shall be separately alleged and particularly specified. When the error alleged is to the charge of the court, the part of the charge referred to shall be quoted totidum verbis in the specifications. The same shall be signed by an attorney or counselor of the court.

XIII. If the appellant or plaintiff in error shall fail to assign errors, the appeal or writ of error may be dismissed, and if the appellee or defendant in error shall not appear and join in error the cause may be heard ex parte, or the judgment or decree may be, in the discretion of the court, reversed without a hearing.

XIV. Counsel will be confined to a discussion of the errors stated, but the court may, in its discretion, notice any other errors appearing in the record.

ABSTRACTS OF THE RECORD.

XV. Appellants and plaintiffs in error, in all causes in the supreme court, shall prepare a printed abstract of the record in each case, in which they shall set forth the title of the cause, with the date of the filing of all papers in the court below, and a brief statement of the contents of each pleading, and shall set forth fully the points of the pleadings or evidence, and the points relied upon for the reversal of the judgment or decree. The clerk of the court below shall also number each folio of one hundred words, in the transcript of the record, and appellants and plaintiffs in error shall refer to the same in the margin of the abstract in such manner that orders, pleadings and evidence referred to in the abstract may be easily found in the record. They shall file with the clerk of this court, for the use of the appellee or defendants in error and judges of this court, four copies of such abstracts at least three days before the cause is heard.

XVI. The defendant's counsel shall be permitted, if he is not satisfied with the abstract or abridgment by the plaintiff's counsel, to furnish each of the justices of this court with such further abstracts as he shall deem necessary to a full understanding of the merits of the cause.

XVII. In case the appellant or plaintiff in error shall neglect to file an abstract, in compliance with the rules of this court, the opposite party may file the abstract and prepare the cause for a hearing ex parte, and have the costs taxed therefor, provided the appellant or plaintiff in error would have been entitled to have the cause heard at the same term, or the court may dismiss the appeal or writ of error.

XVIII. If the abstracts filed shall not present the parts of the record to which reference is made in the assignments of errors, the appeal or writ of error may be dismissed.

BRIEFS AND ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

XIX. The brief of the counsel for appellant or plaintiff in error shall contain a statement of the errors relied upon and the authorities to be used in the argument, and four copies thereof shall be filed with the clerk of this court at least three days before the cause is heard. One of the copies may be withdrawn by the counsel for appellee or defendant in error, and the others shall be for the use of the justices of the court.

XX. Counsel for appellee or defendant in error shall also file with the clerk four copies of his brief for the use of the justices, and the opposing party, on or before the day next preceding the day in which the cause is to be heard.

XXI. In citing cases from published reports, the names of the parties as they appear in the title of the case, as well as the book and page, shall be given.

XXII. Counsel who have not complied with the rules relating to briefs will not be heard.

XXIII. If the counsel for both parties shall submit arguments in writing, it shall not be necessary to file briefs; but if counsel for either party shall desire to address the court orally, the opposing counsel shall file his brief as required by the rule.

MOTIONS.

XXIV. All motions, except motions for further time to assign errors or to file briefs, abstracts and the like, shall be in writing, and at least twenty-four hours' notice of the time at which the same will be heard shall be given to the opposite party.

XXV. The party holding the affirmative shall begin and conclude the argument upon the hearing of any matter before the court.

DISMISSAL OF APPEALS.

XXVI. If a transcript of the record shall not be filed as required by law in case of appeal, the appellee may present a transcript of the judgment, the order allowing the appeal, the bond and the approval thereof, and thereupon the appeal shall be dismissed with costs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

XXVII. No paper shall be taken from the files except by leave of court; but appellants and plaintiffs in error may withdraw the transcript of the record, for the purpose of making abstracts, upon giving receipt therefor to the clerk; and, upon such withdrawal, may retain the same for eight days and no more.

If the appellee or defendant in error shall desire to make an abstract of the record, he may withdraw the transcript upon giving the like receipt and retain the same for the like time.

Neither party shall withdraw the transcript of the record more than once.

AGREED CASE.

XXVIII. No judgment will be pronounced in any agreed case unless an affidavit of some credible person shall be filed, setting forth that the matters presented by the record were litigated in good faith, about a matter in actual controversy between the parties, and that the opinion of this court is not sought with any other design than to adjudicate and settle the law relative to the matter in controversy between the parties to the record.

REHEARING OF CAUSES.

XXIX. Application for rehearing of any cause shall be by petition to the court, signed by counsel, briefly stating the points wherein it is alleged that the court has erred; such petition to be filed within fifteen days next after the filing of the opinion in the cause, if the same shall have been filed in term time, or if such opinion shall have been filed in vacation, then within the first five days of the next succeeding term: counsel may accompany such petition with a brief of the authorities relied upon in support thereof.

XXX. If in any cause in which the opinion of this court is filed in vacation, or within fifteen days of the adjournment of the court, a petition for rehearing is presented to either of the justices of this court, and he shall certify that there is probable cause for granting the prayer of the petition, all further proceedings authorized by the judgment of this court shall be stayed until the next term of the court.

COSTS.

XXXI. Upon printed abstracts being furnished, as required in the foregoing rules, it shall be the duty of the clerk to tax a printer's fee at the rate of forty-five cents for each one hundred words of one copy of such abstract, against the unsuccessful party not furnishing such abstracts, as costs, to be recovered by the successful party furnishing the same.

XXXII. Clerks of district and probate courts shall be entitled to receive the fees allowed by law for all copies of records before delivering the same. If, in a criminal cause, the defendant shall be unable to pay for a transcript of the record, the justice assigned to the judicial district in which such record may be shall have power to order and direct that such transcript be made and furnished to the defendant without charge.

ATTORNEYS.

XXXIII. No person shall be admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law, upon evidence that he hath been admitted to the bar of another State or territory, unless such evidence shall proceed from the highest court of law or equity authorized by the laws of such State or territory to grant the same, nor unless such admission to the bar of such other State or territory shall have been upon examination of the applicant or other evidence of his knowledge of law. Provided, that if it shall appear by the affidavit of some disinterested party or other satisfactory evidence, that the applicant has been actually engaged in the practice of law as his usual occupation in the State and territory wherein such license was obtained, for the space of two years, such applicant may be admitted to the bar of this court.

XXXIV. No person shall be admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law upon evidence that he hath been admitted to the bar of another State or territory, if, at the time of his admission to the bar of such State or territory, he was a citizen of this territory.

XXXV. No person shall be admitted to practice law in this territory, who shall not first have taken and subscribed an oath, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the territory of Colorado, and to make the practice of the law his permanent and usual occupation, and that he will commence the practice of the law therein within three months from the date thereof, and the fee of the clerk of the supreme court for filing such oath and entering the name of such party upon the record and issuing a license shall be $10.

XXXVI. There shall be hereafter kept in the office of the clerk of the district court of each county a roll of attorneys of the supreme court, and, in order thereto, the clerk of the supreme court shall, within thirty days next after the promulgation hereof, transmit to the clerk of the district court in each judicial district a certified copy of this and the following rules: No. XXXVII, XXXVIII, XXXIX of this court, and of the roll of the attorneys of this court, as the same then appears in his office.

XXXVII. Upon receiving such certified copy of said rules and roll of attorneys, the clerk of each of the district courts shall cause the same to be entered at large in a book to be kept in his office, and shall immediately prepare copies thereof at length and certify the same to each of his deputies, except in the county where the said clerk himself resides, and each of such deputies shall in like manner enter such rules and the roll of attorneys in a book to be kept in his office; all such certificates shall be preserved in the office where the same are transmitted.

XXXVIII. Whenever the name of any attorney, hereafter admitted to the bar, shall be entered upon the roll of attorneys kept in the office of the clerk of the supreme court, the clerk of the supreme court shall certify to the clerk of the district court in each judicial district a copy of the roll of attorneys, so far as the same includes the name of such attorney so admitted, and the clerk of each of said district courts shall cause the name of such attorney so admitted to be entered upon the roll of attorneys so kept in his office, and shall prepare copies of such certificate of the clerk of the supreme court, and certify the same to each of his deputies, save in the county wherein the said clerk himself resides. When the name of such attorney shall in like manner be added to the roll of attorneys there kept, and no person shall be entered upon any such rolls of attorneys unless his name shall appear on the roll of attorneys of the supreme court certified in manner aforesaid.

XXXIX. Hereafter no clerk of any district court shall issue any writ, or permit any cause to be instituted or discontinued at the instance of any person, unless the name of such person appear upon the roll of attorneys in his office, or at the instance of the plaintiff in such cause appearing thereunto in his own proper person, and no person, whose name is not upon the roll of attorneys in the office of the clerk of such court, shall be permitted to appear in any cause in any district court, or take part in any such cause, unless he is himself a party thereto, and then only in his own behalf.

LIBRARY.

XL. No book shall be withdrawn from the library of this court for any purpose, except by the order of the court in open session.

XLI. The foregoing shall be the standing rules of this court, and all other rules are hereby rescinded.

COLORADO REPORTS.

GARDNER v. DUNN.

APPEAL BOND, may be amended. On appeal to the district court from the judgment of a justice of the peace, if the appeal bond be adjudged insufficient, the appellant may file an amended bond, and time should be allowed him for that purpose.

Appeal from District Court, Park County.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellant.

Mr. C. C. POST, for appellee.

BRADFORD, J. This was an action of forcible entry and detainer, instituted before a justice of the peace of Park county on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1862. On the 5th of May, following, trial of said cause was had before the justice, and the verdict and judgment was for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed to the district court, and on the following day, May 6th, filed his appeal bond, which bond was approved by the justice. On the 3d of June, 1862, being one of the days of the June term of the district court of Park county, the cause came on to be heard, and the defendant moved the court to dismiss the appeal for want of a sufficient bond. The plaintiff asked leave to file a sufficient bond, the court refused the leave and sustained defendant's motion to dismiss appeal, and rendered judgment against plaintiff for costs. The plaintiff appealed to this court, and assigns the following errors, viz. :

1st. That the said court erred in sustaining the motion of the defendant to dismiss the said appeal.

VOL. I.—1

2d. That the court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff to file a good and sufficient bond.

3d. That said judgment was given for the defendant when it should have been given for the plaintiff.

It is not doubted by this court but that the appeal bond was informal and insufficient; but it is equally clear that the court erred in overruling the motion of the appellant to permit him to file a good and sufficient bond in pursuance of the forty-fifth section of the act of our legislature, entitled, "An act concerning justices of the peace and constables," approved October 31, 1861. That act, after prescribing the mode of taking appeals from judgments of justices of the peace, goes on and declares that "if upon the trial of any appeal the bond required to be given shall be adjudged informal or otherwise insufficient, the party who shall have executed such bond shall in nowise be prejudiced by reason of such informality or insufficiency; provided he will, in reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, execute a good and sufficient bond." That Gardner intended to take an appeal is manifest, and whenever a party intends appealing and makes such an attempt at the execution of a bond, that the officer authorized to approve accepts the bond, it is not the design of the statute that the appellant should be prejudiced by any informality or deficiency therein. By executing what was honestly intended to be a good bond, with such security as was approved by the justice, the appellant did all that was required of him until the bond was adjudged insufficient by the court; and even then, the law declares that such insufficiency shall not operate to his prejudice, if he will execute a good one. This the appellant offered to do, but the court refused permission and dismissed the appeal.

The evident intent of the legislature in enacting the law herein referred to was to simplify proceedings before justices of the peace, and to dispense with all technicalities consistent with a fair trial of the cause upon the merits. This just intent would be defeated by giving to the act any other construction than the one we have adopted.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to that court to permit the appellant to file a good and sufficient bond, and to hear and determine the cause upon its merits. Reversed.

THE PRINCIPAL CASE is adopted as authority for the decision in Lynn v. Merriole, 1 Colo. &

LYNN v. MERRIOLE.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

ASSUMPSIT before a justice of the peace, and appeal to district court. Motion by appellee to dismiss, because of defective appeal bond, and cross-motion by appellant for leave to file a sufficient bond. The district court refused to allow the amendment and dismissed the appeal.

BRADFORD, J. The opinion given at the present term of this court, in Gardner v. Dunn, ante, 1, is applicable to this case. The judgment of the district court must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court for further proceedings.

WILCOX et al. v. FIELD et al.

PRACTICE—judgment nil dicit. If defendants, after appearance, fail to plead or demur, judgment nil dicit should be rendered against them before other proceedings are had in the case.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. J. BRIGHT SMITH, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. G. W. PURKINS, for defendants in error.

BRADFORD, J. This was an action in debt, instituted in the district court of Arapahoe county, on the 2d day of July, A.D. 1862, by C. H. Field and E. Magoffin, trustees of Jones & Cartright, against B. C. Wright, P. P. Wilcox, E. C. Mason and D. M. Bivens, on a promissory note alleged to have been executed by said defendants, and payable to said plaintiffs on the 21st day of December, 1861, for the sum of $110, the ad damnum in the plaintiff's declaration being laid at $110. At the August term of said district court, the cause came on to be heard, and the defendants, by J. Bright Smith, their attorney, appeared and filed a motion to dismiss the suit, alleging that plaintiffs were non-residents of Colorado territory; and said motion being heard, the court overruled the same, and ordered the case referred to the clerk to assess damages. The clerk, the same day, reported the plaintiffs' damages at $127.84, and the court thereupon rendered judgment against the said defendants for the sum of $127.84, and for costs.

To reverse this judgment the plaintiffs in error, being the defendants below, have brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The plaintiffs in error assign the following errors, viz.:

1. There was no judgment of nil dicat rendered against the plaintiffs in error in default of a plea, but a reference made to the clerk to assess damages without such judgment.

2. The final judgment rendered is for a greater amount than the ad damnum in the declaration.

It is a well-settled rule of practice that where defendants, after appearance, neither plead nor demur, judgment of nil dicat will be rendered against them before any other proceedings are had in the case. The record in this case discloses the fact, that the court referred the matter to the clerk for the assessment of damages without first rendering an interlocutory judgment against the defendants for want of a plea, as the law requires. In this we think there is manifest error (see Colorado statute, first session, § 15, p. 279, Stephen's Pleadings, 108).

It is equally apparent that the court erred in rendering judgment for a greater amount than the sum claimed in the declaration. This is a matter of substance, it being apparent from the record that the court could not legally render such a judgment; from the evidence presented in the record, the proper judgment, so far as the amount is concerned, was entered by the district court; but this was unwarranted by the declaration and consequently illegal. See Stephen's Pleadings, 429; 4 Gilman, 79. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Reversed.

APPEARANCE—JUDGMENT NIL DIXIT.—If, after appearance, the defendant fails to plead, judgment nil dicit should be rendered against him: Gomer v. Shiner, 4 Colo. 247.

LEE v. RALSTON.

PRACTICE—trial of appeals from justice of the peace. Upon appeal to the district court from the judgment of a justice of the peace, the trial should be de novo, and the district court has no power to review the proceedings of the justice of the peace.*

Error to District Court of Gilpin County.

Mr. C. C. Post, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. B. MORSE, for defendant in error.

BRADFORD, J. This was an action of assumpsit commenced by Silas Ralston, the plaintiff below, on the 28th day of December, 1861, before H. D. Bristol, a justice of the peace of Gilpin county, against Wm. L. Lee and others, composing the Black Hawk Mill Co., and, on the 3d day of January, A. D. 1862, judgment was rendered against the said William L. Lee, the defendant, served with process, for the sum of $48.75, and costs, from which judgment of the justice of the peace the defendant Lee appealed to the district court of Gilpin county; and afterward, at the April term, A. D. 1862, of said court, the cause came on to be heard, and the record shows the following proceedings to have been had in said court, to wit:

* Lee v. Doley and Lee v. Fargo, decided at this term, were to the same point.

“SILAS RALSTON }
 v. } Appeal from justice of the peace.
 WILLIAM L. LEE. }

And now this case came on to be heard, and the plaintiff appeared by his attorney, and the defendant, although solemnly called, came not; and no other proceedings being had, on motion of the plaintiff, it is considered that the judgment of the justice's court, for $48.75, be affirmed, and that the plaintiff recover of and from the defendant the said sum, and his costs and charges in this behalf expended, as well in the justice's court below as in this, and that he have execution therefor.”

Which said judgment has been removed to this court by writ of error.

The plaintiff in error assigns the following errors, viz: 1st. That the district court, not being a court of review, could not affirm or review the judgment of the justice's court. 2d. That the trial of said cause should have been de novo, and the court could not render judgment unless evidence was adduced to warrant it. 3d. The court erred in rendering judgment against William Lee alone, when the suit was brought against a firm of which he was a member.

In order to dispose of this cause in this court, we only deem it necessary to consider the second error assigned. By the act of our legislature, concerning justices of the peace and constables, it is provided, that, upon all trials of appeal before the district court, the court shall hear and determine the cause in a summary way, according to the justice of the case (see § 46); and it is further provided by section 48 of said act, that the rights of the parties shall be the same as in original actions. A fair construction put upon these sections leads us to the conclusion that causes brought up by appeal from justices' courts shall be tried de novo, and the judgment below furnishes no evidence to sustain the correctness of the decision of the justice. It consequently follows, that, when the cause is tried in the district court, its decision not being controlled by the decision below, the judgment must be rendered in accordance with evidence adduced on the trial in the district court. The record in this case plainly showing that no evidence was produced and no trial had in the district court, the judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

DEMURRER—what is final. An order overruling a demurrer to a bill in chancery is not a final decree in the cause.

APPEAL will not lie from an interlocutory order. An appeal cannot be prosecuted from an order overruling a demurrer to a bill in chancery.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

APPELLANT demurred to the bill filed in the district court by appellees, and his demurrer was overruled. He then appealed to this court. Appellees now moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that no final decree had been entered in the cause.

HARDING, C. J. This appeal must be dismissed, for the reason assigned. Dismissed.

WRIT OF ERROR—FINAL JUDGMENT.—An appeal or writ of error does not lie from an interlocutory order, but only from a final judgment or decree; and a judgment on demurrer is not final: Andrews v. Loveland, 1 Colo. 10.

GIBSON v. SMITH.

DEFAULT cannot be taken while demurrer is pending. It is error to enter a judgment by default against a defendant who has a demurrer on file which has not been disposed of.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. J. BRIGHT SMITH, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for defendant in error.

HARDING, C. J. At the March term, 1863, of the district court of Arapahoe county, David Smith recovered against the plaintiff in error a judgment for the sum of $500, and costs of suit taxed at $10. A default was taken against said Gibson, and the damages assessed by a jury who returned their verdict for the damages above named, upon which the court rendered judgment. It appears from the record that before default was entered against Gibson, the defendant in the district court, that he had appeared and filed a general demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, which was then on file, and upon which no decision of the court had been had.

On the 14th day of April, 1863, a writ of error issued from this court on behalf of Gibson, and this case is before us for our action.

The whole case turns upon the first error which is assigned in plaintiff's brief and is as follows:

That the said court erred in giving judgment by default against the said Gibson, he having appeared and pleaded to the declaration previous thereto by general demurrer, upon which no decision whatever appears to have been given. 4 Scam. 53, 54.

We think that it is clear, that the district court committed an error in entering judgment by default against the defendant in the court below, when he had appeared to the action and filed his demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, and when such demurrer was undisposed of, and in impaneling a jury to assess the damages.

Per curiam. The judgment is reversed for further proceedings in the district court, with costs, etc. Reversed.

JUDGMENT NIL DICT - PENDING ISSUES. - Where there are issues pending, judgment nil dict is irregular: Taylor v. McLaughlin, 2 Colo. 375. In San Juan & St. L. & M. Co. v. Finch, 3 Colo. 225, where the principle is also cited to this point, it is held error to rule plaintiff to plead to cross-bills, while a demurrer thereto is pending.

ANDREWS v. LOVELAND et al.

JUDGMENT upon demurrer not final. A judgment sustaining a demurrer is not final.

WRIT OF ERROR will not lie from interlocutory judgment. An appeal or writ of error will not lie from an interlocutory judgment.

Error to District Court, Jefferson County.

Messrs. J. BRIGHT SMITH and JAS. MACDONALD, for plaintiff in error.

MR. G. W. PURKINS, for defendant in error.

HARDING, C. J. This is an action of assumpsit commenced in the district court and tried at the March term, 1862.

The abstract shows the following state of facts. The plaintiff in error filed his declaration against the defendants in the court below, which contained four counts.

1st. That plaintiff had recovered a judgment against the defendants in the district court for Jefferson county, in said territory, under the late provisional government, for $311 and costs of suit and interest thereon accruing, amounting in all to the sum of $410.37, which still remained due and unpaid, for which defendants were liable, and which they had promised to pay.

Second count set forth a promissory note, made by the defendants to the plaintiff, for the sum of $324, which they had promised to pay, etc.

Third count claimed $47.50 interest on an account stated between the parties.

Fourth count set up a general promise and breach.

To this declaration defendant Loveland filed a demurrer, alleging that the matters and things in the petition were not sufficient in law to maintain the action, etc.

The court sustained the demurrer, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted and sued out a writ of error from this court. The record in this case is most deficient, and we cannot determine the precise action of the court below from any thing before us. The judgment of the court in sustaining a demurrer is not a final judgment. Hays v. Caldwell et al., 5 Gilm. 33; Fleece v. Russell, 13 Ill. 32.

An appeal or writ of error does not lie from an interlocutory decree or judgment. Practice Act, Stat. Colorado, 1st Sess. 285; Woodside et al. v. Woodside et al., 21 Ill. 207; Cunningham v. Loomis et al., 17 Ill. 555; Young v. Grundy 6, Cranch, 51.

There is nothing to lead us to the conclusion that final judgment was rendered in this case in the court below. For this reason this case must be dismissed. We have determined this question at the present term of the court, in the case of Armor v. Lyon et al. This case is dismissed at the cost of plaintiff in error without prejudice to his suit in the court below.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—mechanics' lien act of 1861. The act of 1861, relating to mechanics' liens (1 Sess. 258), is not retrospective.

MECHANICS' LIEN—prior to November 4, 1861. A party who furnished materials toward the erection of a building prior to November 4, 1861, cannot have a lien for the value thereof upon the premises benefited.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. MOSES HALLETT, for appellants.

Mr. G. W. PURKINS, for appellees.

BRADFORD, J. This was a petition for a mechanics' lien, filed in the district court of Arapahoe county on the 7th day of November, A.D. 1861, by J. E. Wild et al., plaintiffs, against the defendants, asking for judgment for the sum of $262.23, in payment for lumber and material alleged to have been furnished to said Foster, and used in buildings and inclosures upon lots Nos. 5 and 6, in block No. 12, in East Denver, in said county, and praying that said demand may be made a lien upon said lots, and that said lots be sold to satisfy the same; the petition further alleges that, at the time of furnishing the material, the said Foster was the owner and occupant of said lots, and that, on the 2d day of September, A.D. 1861, the said Eliza Townsend, wife of the said Copeland Townsend, became the purchaser of said lots, and that said Foster then delivered possession of said premises to the appellants, who have retained possession hitherto. At the August term of the district court, A.D. 1862, this cause came on to be heard, and the court ordered a decree entered in accordance with the prayer of the plaintiffs' petition, rendering judgment against all the defendants for the sum of $262.23 damages, and for costs. From this judgment of the district court the defendants, Copeland Townsend and Eliza Townsend, appealed to this court. The appellants appear in this court upon assignment of ten errors; we will consider only the sixth assignment of error, not deeming it important or necessary to pass upon the other errors assigned. The sixth error assigned is as follows: "There was no law for the proceeding, the materials having been furnished, if any were furnished, before the passage of the law respecting mechanics' liens." The plaintiffs allege in their petition that they furnished the materials used in erecting buildings and inclosures on lots described in their petition to Foster (he then being the owner and occupant of said lots), within one year preceding the filing of said petition, which appears to have been on the 7th day of November, A.D. 1861; they further allege in said petition, that on the 2d day of September, A.D. 1861, Foster sold the premises to Mrs. Eliza Townsend, and then and there delivered possession of the same to the appellants, who retained possession at the time of the commencement of this suit, viz., on the 7th day of November, A.D. 1861.

The organic act of Colorado territory was approved on the 28th day of February, A. D. 1861. On the 4th day of November, A. D. 1861, the act of the legislature of Colorado, entitled "An act creating a lien in favor of mechanics in certain cases," was approved, which was the first law passed by the legislature of Colorado on the subject of liens to mechanics and to persons furnishing materials used in the erection of buildings. On examination of said act it clearly shows that it was not even intended to be made retrospective, consequently it is clear that the plaintiffs cannot recover, by virtue of the provisions of said act, the premises sought to be affected by the plaintiffs having been conveyed to the appellants on the 2d day of September, 1861, long before the passage of said act, and it does not even appear that the appellant had any notice, either actual or constructive, of plaintiffs' claim upon the premises.

The attorney for the plaintiffs argues that the lien laws passed by the legislature of the territory of Kansas was in force in Colorado, until the passage of a law upon the same subject by the legislature of Colorado. A portion of Colorado territory embracing territory formerly within the limits of Kansas territory. We are unable to see the force of this reasoning. There is no provision in our organic law adopting or putting in force in this territory any portion of the laws of the late territory of Kansas, or any other laws excepting the constitution and laws of the United States.

This court being clearly of the opinion that, at the time of the purchase by the appellants of the premises upon which the plaintiffs claim a lien, there was no lien law in force in this territory, the judgment of the district court must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

McNASSER v. SHERRY.

PRACTICE—upon overruling a demurrer. Upon overruling a demurrer to a declaration if the defendant does not plead, further judgment of nil dicit should be entered and a jury should be impaneled to assess damages. In such case it is error to swear the jury to try the issue joined.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. AMOS STECK, for appellant.

Mr. G. W. PERKINS, for appellee.

HARDING, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the district court of Arapahoe county.

There is but a single question for us to decide. At the August term, 1862, of said court, the appellee recovered judgment in said district court for the sum of $296.75 in damages and costs, and this appeal is prosecuted to this court to reverse said judgment.

It appears from the record that a demurrer had been filed by defendant in the court below, which was overruled, to which ruling an exception was taken. That afterward a jury was impaneled and sworn, well and truly to try the issue joined, etc. These facts are made apparent to us from the bill of exceptions which is contained in the record. After the finding of the verdict by the jury a motion was made to set aside the verdict on the ground that the jury had been improperly sworn. It is clear that this fact was brought to the mind of the court, and yet, disregarding the motion, judgment was rendered on the verdict.

That is the error which is presented to us for our determination. There might have been another objection urged, but we will content ourselves by passing on the one before us.

When the jury was sworn to well and truly try the issue joined, etc., there was no issue joined in the case then on hearing. Upon the overruling of the demurrer, and the defendant failing to file a plea to the action, the proper practice would have been to have entered a judgment of nihil dicti, and then have impaneled a jury to assess damages, and not to well and truly try the issue joined, when no issue had been joined in the pleadings.

Per curiam. The judgment of the district court is reversed, with costs. Case remanded for further proceedings.

Messrs. BOWEN & MACDONALD, for appellant.

Mr. AMOS STECK, for appellee.

HARDING, C. J. This is an action for forcible entry and detainer, commenced by Bradford against Wier on the 20th day of April, 1862, before a justice of the peace of Arapahoe county. A judgment was rendered against the defendant, who appealed to the district court of said county. The case was taken to Gilpin county on change of venue, and tried at the March term thereof, 1863, by jury. Verdict in favor of plaintiff and judgment rendered on the same. An appeal was taken by defendant to this court, and the case is before us on the record, which is presented to us.

The complaint filed before the justice, and on which the case was tried in the district court without amendment, is as follows in substance: That the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of certain premises (describing them) in the county of Arapahoe, on the 20th day of February, 1862; that the defendant forcibly entered and detained the possession thereof to the damage of plaintiff $100. There is another allegation in the complaint, as follows: That the legal right to the possession of said premises is in the plaintiff, and that the defendant holds over after demand made in writing, and that the plaintiff claims damages in the sum of $100.

Before considering the error assigned, upon which we are asked to reverse the judgment of the court, it becomes necessary to notice the statute under which this action is authorized :

SECTION 1. "No person or persons shall hereafter make any entry into lands, tenements or other possessions, but in cases where entry is given by law, and in such cases not with strong hand nor with multitude of people, but only in a peaceable manner, and if any person from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convicted, he shall be punished by fine."

The eleventh section of said act authorizes the complainant to recover against the defendant treble damages in an action of trespass, after conviction of the forcible entry and detainer aforesaid.

The twenty-second section provides that all matters in excuse, justification or evidence of the allegations in the complaint, shall be pleaded specially, or notice thereof given with the plea of general issue. Stat. 1 Sess., p. 251.

We will not notice here in this connection the proceeding on the trial before the justice of the peace. We do not sit here to take cognizance of matters arising in their courts, but from the record before us it seems that this cause was tried on the same papers in the district court as in the justice court, without amendment.

The defendant filed his demurrer in the district court to the complaint, as follows : 1st, assigning a misjoinder of actions ; 2d, that it is not averred that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises ; 3d, that the force is not averred to have been done with a strong hand ; 4th, that the plaintiff claims damages in the sum of $100 ; 5th, that in the second count, assigning unlawful detainer, no contract is averred, and other insufficiencies.

On motion of the plaintiff, this demurrer, as it is called, was stricken from the files of the cause, to which the defendant excepted. The defendant obtained leave of the court to file a motion to dismiss plaintiff's action, and the motion was filed. Plaintiff moved the court to strike this motion to dismiss from the files of the cause also, which motion was sustained, to which the defendant excepted; the case went to the jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the court rendered judgment. Defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and to which ruling of the court the defendant excepted. The defendant appealed to this court, and has assigned in his brief and abstract ten errors, upon which he relies for the reversal of the judgment of the district court. We will not notice all of them, but only such as must determine our action in this case. These are included in Nos. 1, 2 and 6 in defendant's brief, and are as follows: 1. That the said court erred in sustaining the motion of plaintiff to strike the demurrer filed by the defendant from the files of the cause, without consideration or decision upon the merits of the said demurrer. 2. That the said court erred in sustaining the motion made by the plaintiff to strike from the files of this cause the motion made by defendant to dismiss the said suit, without consideration, etc.

We have no doubt but that the court below erred in striking from the files of this cause the paper called a demurrer and the motion to dismiss plaintiff's suit, under the circumstances which are manifest to us. There is no rule of practice which can tolerate such a proceeding on the part of a court. There may arise cases where such a practice is justifiable and proper, but this is not such a case. The questions which the paper called a demurrer raised had never been decided by the court or acted on in this case. No matter how informally these questions may have been presented to the court, it, nevertheless, was the duty of the court to sustain or overrule the demurrer. So with the motion to dismiss plaintiff's action. After leave had been granted by the court to defendant to file his motion, it was then too late to object that the motion came too late, and it was the duty of the court to pass upon the merits of the motion, and not to strike it from the files. If this practice could be tolerated, it might lead to great abuses, and might become very convenient for any incompetent judge to hide his ignorance of the principles upon which he was called upon to act. No matter whether or no the demurrer was sustainable, that does not alter the case. We will therefore give no opinion on that subject.

The sixth error assigned is as follows: The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury upon the issues joined, at the request of the defendant, as follows: That, to sustain the complaint in this case, the jury must find that the plaintiff was in the actual, not constructive, possession of the premises in question, and that the defendant, by an unlawful and forcible entry, actually dispossessed the plaintiff. 14 U. S. Digest, 320, §§ 13, 14 and 15; 8 Eng. 448.

We think that the above instruction was in accordance with the authorities on that subject, and that it ought to have been given by the court. The act of the legislature above cited must receive a construction consistent with itself and with the jurisdiction of justices of the peace. If all cases of entering into the possession of lands and tenements, where the title is in dispute, could be brought within the meaning of the act; if so broad a construction is put upon it as seems to have been contended for, it would give justices a jurisdiction totally repugnant to the limitations placed upon them by the organic act and the laws of this territory, which limit their jurisdiction. If the justices may try all cases where the defendant is found in the peaceable possession of land, without regard to the mode by which he gained possession, then, indeed, a proceeding in his court would supersede the necessity of prosecuting an action of ejectment in the district court.

There might be given many more reasons why the judgment of the district court must be reversed, but the above are sufficient.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, with costs. Case is remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

DORSETT v. CREW.

JURISDICTION — service of process. It is error to enter judgment against parties who have not been served with process.

INSTRUCTIONS should be written. Instructions to the jury should be written, and the court should not orally qualify or modify them.

VERDICT EXCESSIVE. Where the verdict of the jury was for $231.66, and was expressed to be for the amount of a note, without interest, and it appeared that the note was for $231 only: Held, that it was error to receive and enter judgment on the verdict.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. J. Q. CHARLES, for appellant.

Mr. MOSES HALLETT, for appellee.

HARDING, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the district court of Arapahoe county. On the 3d of June, 1862, the appellee filed his affidavit in attachment against James L. Dorsett, G. B. Reed and F. Dorsett, junior, in aid of an action of assumpsit against the persons last named, commenced the same day. The cause of action consisted of a certain note made by the above-named defendants to the said Crew, on the 11th day of August, 1860, and payable three months from date, for the sum of $221. On the 4th of August, 1862, a summons issued against G. B. Reed, James L. Dorsett and F. Dorsett, jun., returnable to August term, 1862, of the said district court. There was no return of sheriff on the summons. On the fifth of August a writ of attachment issued against the property of James L. Dorsett alone, returnable to August term of said court.

On the 6th of August, 1862, the writ of attachment was returned executed June 3, 1862, by attaching three brown horse mules and one brown mare mule, the property of James L. Dorsett. On the 25th July, 1862, the plaintiff filed his declaration herein, containing two counts: 1. Count on the promissory note; 2. Common count for goods, wares, etc., and for work and labor, money had and received ad damnum $300. Plaintiff also filed copy of note sued on in declaration.

At the August term of said court, the defendant, James L. Dorsett, appeared and filed a motion to dismiss the suit for want of a sufficient affidavit. The motion was overruled and an exception taken. Said J. L. Dorsett then filed his plea in abatement, denying the allegations set forth in the affidavit. Issue joined on said plea by the plaintiff and cause tried by a jury.

The court gave oral instructions to the jury, and made oral explanations to the written instructions given to the jury.

The jury rendered the following verdict: "J. H. Crew v. G. B. Reed, James L. Dorsett and F. Dorsett, Jr. We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find verdict for plaintiff. Amount, $221.66 of note, without interest. C. H. Martin, foreman." The court rendered judgment on the verdict of the jury against all the defendants for the sum of $221.66.

On the 6th day of September, 1862, during the same term of said court, and two days after the entering of the judgment, the said James L. Dorsett, who was the only one of the defendants who had appeared or who had been served with process, made a motion for a new trial, and set down in his said motion, among others, the following reasons: There are seven causes assigned why a new trial should be granted, but it is necessary to notice only the following: 1. The verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence; 4. Because the court gave oral instructions and also oral explanations of his own written instructions; 7. And for other good and sufficient reasons.

This motion was accompanied by the affidavit of the said James L. Dorsett, for the purpose of supporting the same. This affidavit set forth the fact that the court gave the oral instructions above mentioned to the jury, and that the court also gave oral explanations, etc., etc.

This motion was overruled and exceptions taken. An appeal was prayed for, and it was ordered that the same be allowed by defendant filing his bill of exceptions together with his bond for $600, in twenty days. The bill of exceptions was duly preferred and signed in vacation. Also the bond was filed, and this case is now before us for our action.

As was remarked above, we decline considering all the reasons set down by the appellant in his motion for a new trial. We will advert to the error assigned on behalf of appellant, and on which he relies for the reversion of the judgment of the court below. But in doing this we will not consider in their order all the errors assigned, for the reason that we have not the authorities before us, which would enable us to treat each one of them in detail; neither does it become necessary to arrive at a just conclusion in determining our final action in the premises. We will, therefore, refer to the third, fifth and seventh errors assigned. They are as follows: 3d. The court erred in overruling the motion for new trial; 5th. The court erred in giving oral instructions and in explaining orally his written instructions; 7th. The court erred in receiving the verdict, and in rendering judgment for more than was claimed in the affidavit and declaration.

The evidence upon which the jury found their verdict is contained in the bill of exceptions, although, perhaps, the bill of exceptions is technically deficient in not stating that this was all the evidence offered in the trial of the case, and, if the court below had refused a new trial upon the ground that the evidence did not warrant the finding of the jury, we should not feel disposed to interfere, for the reason that it is the peculiar province of the jury to find the facts from the evidence, and where there is conflicting evidence on both sides of the case, the court will not disturb the verdict or grant a new trial, unless it is apparent that great injustice would be done the opposite party in refusing the same. It is manifest that there was evidence on both sides upon which the jury could make their finding. But the question arises, did the court below err in receiving the verdict of the jury in this case? We think that it did. The verdict is against all the defendants, or, at least, it would seem that the court below so considered it, for judgment was rendered against all the defendants. Was this proper? It does not appear that service was ever had on any one of them but James L. Dorsett; neither does it appear from the record that either of the other defendants ever appeared, either by himself or any other person, and answered to the complaint. The judgment is personal, and not in rem. The property of James L. Dorsett had been levied on in attachment, but it does not appear that any service had ever been made on Reed and Dorsett, Jun., by which they could be considered as before the court. The authorities are clear on this subject. This was an action of assumpsit on the note for $221, and which was signed by all the defendants in the court below. The writ of attachment was in aid of the action of assumpsit, but, unless the defendants had been legally served with process, no personal judgment could be rendered against them, unless they entered their appearance upon the trial, which would have been a waiving of the process. It must be remembered that in a proceeding in rem the judgment of the court only subjects the property attached to the payment of the defendant's debts, unless, as before observed, personal service has been had on the defendant, or other steps have been taken which are equivalent to the same. Under these circumstances, we think that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

5. The next error which we shall notice is No. 5, in the series set down in the appellant's brief, and is as follows: The court erred in giving oral instructions and by explaining orally his written instructions. If we had found nothing else wrong in the record of this case, this would be a fatal error upon which the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

By the statute of this territory (1st Sess. 282, § 28), we find the following provision: "The district court in all cases, both civil and criminal, shall only instruct the petit jury as to the law of the case, and such instruction shall be reduced to writing, and may be taken by the jury in their retirement and returned by them with their verdict," etc.

The court in this committed a palpable error. It will not do for appellee to say that we are not advised as to what these oral instructions were; that they may have been in favor of the defendant, etc. Nothing would reconcile this practice of the court but the express consent of the parties that the court might so instruct. We do not know what effect these oral instructions may have had on the mind of the jury, neither did it become necessary for the defendant to embody in his bill of exceptions these instructions. If the court proceeded to so instruct, in violation of an express statute, it was in the power of either party to take advantage of the error so committed by the court. We will not give a direct opinion as to what may be construed by this court as the consent of the parties, assuming that such a case was now before us involving that question. If the court should proceed to instruct the jury orally over the objection and protest of one of the parties, the other party sitting by and making no objection, then, in such a case, the particular circumstances might modify our ruling. But there is nothing of the kind here; the facts stand out clearly in the bill of exceptions, that the court in this instance did what it had no right to do on the hearing and trial of a suit.

We now proceed to the last error which we will notice in this connection.

7. That is as follows: "The court erred in receiving the verdict and in rendering judgment in this case for more than was claimed in the affidavit and declaration."

The note, which is mentioned in the verdict of the jury, is the same note mentioned in the affidavit and declaration on which this action was based. The verdict of the jury was clearly wrong, from the internal evidence which it bore on its face. The amount claimed in the affidavit was $221. No matter what might be claimed in the ad damnum. If it is clear that the jury only intended to find that the amount due the plaintiff was the face of the note, without interest, which we think is the case, there should have been no mistaking their intentions. The excess is but a small sum indeed, but it was the duty of the plaintiff and not the defendant to see that the verdict was corrected at the proper time, and when these facts were brought to the notice of the court, it became the duty of the court to send the jury back to their room for the purpose of returning a correct verdict. We do not remember an instance where the court refused to have the verdict of the jury corrected for the reason that the excess was a trifling sum. The plaintiff in this case claimed in his declaration the amount of the note sued on, with such other amount as the jury might find due him not exceeding $300.

The jury only found the amount of the note without interest, and fixed the sum at $221.66. How they could find the amount of sixty-six cents over and above the note, when the note was found to be due without interest, is not known to us. The verdict was clearly wrong from the statement contained in the body of the same. Therefore the verdict was wrong for two reasons; 1, the excess over the face of the note, and in the second place it was against all the defendants, or, if we are mistaken in this, then the court could not enter judgment against all of the defendants. The reason why is stated in the former part of this opinion. There are other errors assigned by appellant which are worthy of notice, but, for reasons above given, we cannot examine them in detail here. We think that the authorities cited by appellant, and many of those also by the appellee, bear us out in arriving at the conclusion to which we have come, that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, which is done accordingly, with costs, and this cause is remanded for further proceedings. Reversed.

INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY SHOULD BE WRITTEN and the court should not orally qualify or modify them: State v. Potter, 16 Kan. 316. A violation of this statutory requisite is substantial error: Bradway v. Waddell, 95 Ind. 173, citing the principal case.

TURNER v. HAHN.

TROVER — demand and refusal. In the action of trover, proof of demand and refusal is made for the purpose of showing a conversion of the property by defendant, and, when the plaintiff is able to show such fact by other evidence, he need not resort to such proof.

NEW TRIAL—verdict according to evidence. The verdict of the jury in this case was according to the evidence, and a new trial was denied.

PRACTICE—construction of a rule of court. A rule of court, which requires that affidavits in support of a motion shall be served by copy upon the opposite party twenty-four hours before the hearing, does not comprehend affidavits read at the hearing on behalf of the party who resists the motion.

JUROR—alienage of. A verdict will not be set aside on account of the alienage of one of the jurors to whom no objection was made at the trial.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

At the trial G. E. Guinn testified on behalf of the plaintiff, that on 9th of September, 1865, he sold and delivered to plaintiff seven head of beef cattle, one of which was a blue roan steer about four years old, which would weigh twelve hundred pounds gross, and six hundred pounds net, worth about $100. On the eleventh of September he understood the blue roan steer had broken out and was gone; that he inquired for the steer and noticed for him; that he purchased the steer of Gartin, a ranchman, in Boulder county about the 1st of August, 1865, and kept possession of him until he sold him to plaintiff; when he purchased the steer he was branded on left hip with letter F, and had his left ear cropt; witness branded him on left shoulder with the letter F. About the last of November, or first of December, 1865, witness saw the steer at defendant's slaughter-house in Central City; witness went with plaintiff to defendant's shop that night, and had a conversation with defendant about the steer; defendant said he purchased the steer 15th August, 1865, of Gartin, and that he branded all the cattle purchased of Gartin on the loins with the letter F. Plaintiff and defendant agreed to go the next morning and see the steer; witness and plaintiff went up the next day about 9 o'clock, A. M. Defendant said there was no need of his going, and told plaintiff he would not go; witness saw the hide and head of said steer in defendant's slaughter-house, and found the same brands on it; witness testified that it was the hide of the blue-roan steer; defendant purchased cattle of Gartin about two weeks after witness did; the steer was of a peculiar color ; never saw one before or since of such a color.

Defendant read the deposition of James B. Tourtellot, who testified that, on 6th of September, 1865, he took a steer from Gartin's ranch for defendant, and afterward turned him over to defendant ; that the steer was a brindle with staggy horns ; that on the 3d of September, 1865, Turner, the defendant, turned over to him to ranch, fourteen head of cattle, one of which was a roan or reddish roan steer, branded F on left hip, and F on left side between the hip and shoulder blade, pretty well up on the back ; that he returned the steer to defendant, in the latter part of September or first of October, 1865.

Thomas Peacock testified, on behalf of defendant, that Tourtellot delivered the roan steer spoken of in his deposition on the 16th of October, 1865 ; that the steer was taken to Blackhawk, and thence to the Elk meadow ranch to pasture ; that the steer was of a blue roan color, about four years old, staggy horns, weighed eight or nine hundred pounds gross ; was branded just behind left foreshoulder, pretty high upon the back with letter F, had a circle on left hip with letter in it ; could not tell what the letter was ; steer would dress about four hundred pounds ; next saw the steer on the Elk meadow ranch two weeks afterward ; did not see the steer again until I saw him at the slaughterhouse ; I suppose that is the time spoken of by Guinn ; knows it was the same steer delivered to defendant 16th October, 1865, by Tourtellot.

George Ritter, on behalf of defendant, testified, that on the 19th of October, 1865, he took four head of cattle to the Elk meadow ranch, and delivered them to Henry Ripley for defendant, the cattle were turned over to him by Thomas Peacock ; one was a blue roan steer, marked F on left hip, and F right back of shoulder, four or five inches from back bone ; he looked to be about four years old.

Henry Ripley, on behalf of defendant, testified, that he was the owner of the Elk Meadow ranch ; that on the 16th of October, 1865, he received from George Ritter four head of cattle to ranch and herd for defendant; that one was a roan steer; that on the 20th day of November, 1865, he drove the steer, together with other cattle, to defendant at Central City, and put the steer in defendant's close-pen at slaughter-house.

William Feld, on behalf of defendant, testified, that he saw the blue roan steer in the slaughter-pen, and that the steer, when killed, weighed four hundred and four pounds; that the steer was killed at defendant's slaughter-house at night, eight or ten o'clock; that he did not see any marks on the steer.

At the hearing of the motion for a new trial the counsel for defendant below read affidavits to show that Cyrille Harpin, one of the jurymen who sat at the trial, was not a citizen of the United States, and that he could not speak, write, read or understand the English language, except a few common and simple words, and that said Harpin was a citizen of Great Britain; that neither the defendant below nor his counsel had any knowledge of Harpin's alienage or of his ignorance of the English language until after the trial.

Counsel for plaintiff below offered affidavits to show that Harpin was well enough acquainted with the English language to converse therein, and that he did converse with his fellow jurors about the cause, and that they discovered in him no lack of understanding or of capacity to comprehend the same; that, during the progress of the trial, defendant's counsel was informed that Harpin was not a citizen.

To these affidavits counsel for defendant below objected, that copies had not been served upon him according to the following rule of court:

"In all motions, not being motions for continuance and not of course, twenty-four hours' notice of hearing shall be given, and such notice shall be in writing, and shall specify the objections and points raised by the motion, and, if the motion shall be founded upon affidavits, copies of such affidavits shall be furnished with the motion and notice."

The court allowed the affidavits to be read.

Mr. L. C. RECKWELL, for appellant.

Mr. S. B. HAHN, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an action of trover and conversion, in which there was judgment in favor of the appellee in the court below for the sum of $60 and costs. We are asked to reverse this judgment for several causes, the first of which is that improper instructions were given to the jury upon the trial in the district court. The objection to these instructions appears to be that they are so framed that the jury were at liberty to find for the appellee, in the absence of testimony showing a demand by him for the property, the value of which he sought to recover, and a refusal by the appellant to deliver it. Upon this point it is only necessary to say that, in actions of this kind, proof of demand and refusal is made for the purpose of showing a conversion of the property by the defendant, and, when the plaintiff is able to show such fact by other evidence, he need not resort to proof of demand and refusal. 1 Chitty's Plead. 157; Tompkins v. Hale, 3 Wend. 406.

In this case there was evidence tending to show that the appellant had killed the steer, the value of which the appellee was seeking to recover, and, if the jury believed this evidence, proof of demand and refusal was not at all necessary. It is also urged that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict; but we are unable to adopt the views of the appellant. We are entirely satisfied that the jury decided the case correctly. After the trial in the district court the appellant filed several affidavits showing that one Harpin, a juror who sat upon the trial, was an alien, and that he understood the English language but imperfectly; that the appellant and his counsel had no knowledge of these facts until after the trial. For this and other reasons, the appellant moved the district court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, which motion was denied. Upon the hearing of this motion the appellee produced the affidavit of one Geriaux, in which the deponent stated that during the trial of the cause he informed the counsel for appellant of the facts before mentioned, touching the alienage and ignorance of Harpin, and also the affidavits of six of the jurors who sat upon the trial, in which they deposed that Harpin, while in the jury room, conversed freely about the evidence, and appeared to understand it perfectly, and they discovered no incapacity in him. To the reading of these affidavits, presented by the appellee, the appellant objected, alleging that, under a rule of the court which is set out in the bill of exceptions, he should have been served with copies of the affidavits twenty-four hours before the hearing, but the court permitted them to be read. Obviously the rule applies only to affidavits designed to be read in support of a motion, and, as these affidavits were offered for the purpose of resisting a motion, the case is not within the terms of the rule. It is clear that Harpin was sufficiently acquainted with the English language to enable him to comprehend the evidence and act intelligently upon it, and it is equally clear that he was an alien. We are then to consider whether the fact that Harpin was an alien is sufficient to avoid the verdict, and we think that it is not. In the case of Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch, 297, it was objected that one of the jurors was not a resident of the county in which the cause was tried, and Chief Justice MARSHALL, speaking for the court, said "Whatever might have been the weight of this exception, if taken in time, the court cannot sustain it now, the exception ought to have been made before the juror was sworn." This language is fully applicable to the case under consideration. Parties have the right to interrogate persons who are called to sit as jurors, for the purpose of ascertaining their qualifications before they are sworn, and if this is not done the right to challenge is waived. Hollingsworth v. Duane, 4 Dall. 353; Greenup v. Stoker, 3 Gilm. 219.

We find no error in this record, and therefore the judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

JUROR — ALIENAGE — CHALLENGE. — Although alienage is a good ground of objection to a juror, if he is not challenged on this ground, but is allowed to be sworn, the objection is considered as waived (Jones v. People, 2 Colo. 354); and in such case the verdict will not be set aside for this reason: State v. Pritchard, 15 Nev. 95, both citing the principal case.

SMITH et al. v. CISSON.

PRACTICE — exception to ruling of court. Error cannot be assigned upon the ruling of the court in giving an instruction to the jury, unless an exception to such ruling was entered at the time it was made.

EVIDENCE as to identity of parties is for the jury. Whether witnesses who use the surnames of parties to the suit refer to the parties, or to some other persons of the same name, is a question for the jury. If there is a doubt as to the identity of a person named by a witness, it is easily solved upon cross-examination, and, if the party, in whose favor the doubt will operate, fails to apply the test, there is strong ground for believing that he does not desire to dissipate the doubt.

PRESUMPTION in support of judgment of court below. In an action against two defendants named Smith, the record did not disclose whether the parties were sued as copartners or otherwise. At the trial the defendants put in an account in which they used the name of "Smith Bro.," and a receipt in which they were styled "P. Smith & Co." Upon this evidence it will be presumed that the defendants were sued as copartners.

COPARTNERS are bound by the act of one. A contract by one of several copartners, in relation to the partnership business, is binding upon the firm.

NEW TRIAL — where evidence is conflicting. Where evidence is conflicting, and there is evidence upon which the verdict may stand, a new trial will not be granted, although another verdict might well have been given.

Appeal from District Court, Clear Creek County.

At the trial below counsel for appellant asked for an instruction to the jury which the court declined to give, but no exception was taken to the ruling of the court.

Appellee sued appellants before a justice of the peace, and filed an account for three months' rent of a blacksmith shop, amounting to $45, and for work done as a blacksmith, amounting to $19.25, and also for damages in respect to the non-fulfillment of a contract relating to the rent of a blacksmith shop and tools, amounting to $269.50; the defendants put in an account for board, cash and other items, amounting to $155; in this account the defendants were styled "Smith Bro." The defendants also put in a receipt, covering several small sums of money, in which the defendants were styled "P. Smith & Co." At the trial the plaintiff called Richard Rose who testified: I was called to witness a bargain between Mr. Smith and Cisson. Smith rented shop and tools to Cisson for $15 per month; Cisson to sharpen mining tools for Smith, and, as part of the consideration, to keep the shop open for the accommodation of the public, that the reputation of the shop might not go down. Cisson was to have the shop until the first of March; contract was made in the last of October or first of November, A. D. 1866; Cisson was to sharpen the mining tools of Smith; it was mentioned such tools as Mr. Smith or his brother might use prospecting or other mining tools. There was an account between Mr. Smith and Cisson, in which Mr. Smith owed Cisson $45, this was to be allowed Cisson or three months rent; can't say whether or not this was the balance due from Smith to Cisson; don't know about Smith taking the tools; I know some tools were brought into Mr. Smith's butcher shop.

John D. Harris testified, that he rented the shop to Smith; that in November or December he notified Smith that he wished to occupy the shop; Smith told him he wished he would put Cisson out. Witness stated that he found the shop locked, drew the staple, and put out the tools.

Frank De La Mar testified, that Cisson commenced to occupy the shop in September or October; about the time Cisson commenced occupying it, I heard Mr. Smith say that he had rented him the shop for five months; that the shop, tools, profit and all was worth $7 per day.

George Cisson, the plaintiff below, testified, that the items in his account were correct.

Peter J. Smith, one of the defendants below, gave testimony as to the state of accounts between the parties, and stated that, according to his books, the balance due him from Cisson was $41.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $73.56, and judgment was rendered on the verdict.

MESSRS. ROYLE & BUTLER, for appellants.

• MESSRS. POST & MORGAN, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The appellants seek to reverse this judgment because the court below refused to give an instruction asked by them, and because the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict. As to the first point, the appellants did not except to the ruling of the court in refusing to give the jury the instruction asked by them at the time such ruling was made, and, therefore, they cannot be heard. Armstrong v. Mock, 17 Ill. 166.

The witnesses who testified upon the trial below related the facts touching the renting of a blacksmith shop and other business transactions between Mr. Smith and Mr. Cisson, without giving the names of the parties more fully, and it is urged that it does not appear which one of the appellants was intended to be named by the witnesses, or indeed whether the witnesses intended to name either of the appellants.

We cannot doubt that the witnesses referred to one of the appellants when they spoke of Mr. Smith. Upon the stand witnesses use the language of ordinary conversation, and to require them to adopt a more perspicuous diction is neither practicable nor desirable. It is hard to believe that a witness may be produced in open court, and that he may there, in the presence of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, detail the circumstances of a business transaction between the plaintiff and a person of the surname of the defendant, without disclosing the fact that the defendant in the suit is not the person referred to by the witness, if such fact exists. Oftentimes the names of parties are used by witnesses without giving the full name, but in such way as to leave no doubt in the mind of the hearer as to the person designated by the witness. If there is doubt as to the identity of a person named by a witness, it is easily solved upon cross-examination, and, if the party in whose favor the doubt will operate fails to apply the test, there is strong ground for believing that he does not desire to dissipate the doubt. We think that the jury, in this cause, were at liberty to determine, as they did determine, that the witnesses, when speaking of Mr. Smith, referred to one of the appellants. A more difficult question is presented concerning the joint liability of the appellants to the appellee in this action.

The testimony refers to but one of the appellants, and unless the act of this one is binding upon the other, the verdict cannot be sustained. It must be borne in mind that this action was originally commenced before a justice of the peace, and there are no written pleadings from which we may learn the character of the suit. For aught that appears the appellants were charged as partners, in which case the joint liability would be established, prima facie, unless denied by plea in abatement, and it is not claimed that such plea was interposed. Warren v. Chambers et al., 12 Ill. 124.

Upon this point the witnesses give no light, but there is, in the bill of exceptions, an account and receipts which it is said the appellants presented and relied upon in the trial of the cause. In the account the appellants style themselves "Smith Bro.," and they charge the appellee an item of rent for a shop which appears to have been the blacksmith shop mentioned by the appellee's witnesses. The receipt also appears to have been given by the appellee to the appellants, to acknowledge payment of some of the items for which this suit was brought, and therein the appellants are styled "P. Smith & Co." One of the appellants, Peter J. Smith, having made the preliminary affidavit required by statute, testified in the cause respecting some of the items in the account. Now it appears from these papers that the appellants were seeking to establish a demand against the appellee in a copartnership name, and also to establish the payment by them, as copartners of a portion of the appellee's demand, and we think in this way they admitted, not only that they were charged in the suit as copartners, but also that they were in fact copartners in business. Macfarland et al. v. Lewis et al., 2 Scam. 344; Rymer v. Cook, cited in 22 Eng. Com. Law, 479, in note.

The copartnership being thus established, the contract of one was obligatory upon both of the appellants, and the joint liability is sufficiently shown ; as to the damages we see that the evidence is conflicting, and we think that another verdict might well have been given by the jury, but as there is evidence upon which this verdict may stand, we cannot disturb it.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs
Affirmed.

VERDICT — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE. — Where evidence is conflicting, and the verdict is not manifestly against the weight of evidence, the verdict will not be disturbed: Barker v. Hawley, 4 Colo. 327; Denver S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Driscoll, 12 Colo. 525.

MURDOCK v. TOWNSEND.

PRACTICE in supreme court. A defendant failed to join in error as required by rule of court, and the judgment was for that reason reversed.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

The chief justice did not participate in the decision.

GORSLINE, J. A rule having been entered in this cause requiring the defendant in error to join in error, and the said defendant having failed to conform to the requirements of said rule, the judgment in this cause must be reversed and cause remanded.

Reversed.

ANDERSON v. SLOAN.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — when necessary. A motion for a new trial, and a motion to vacate a judgment, and affidavits in support thereof should be preserved in the record by bill of exceptions.

SHERIFF'S RETURN — amendment of. A sheriff may amend his return to a summons by leave of the district court, after the record of the cause has been removed into this court.

PRACTICE — affidavits irregularly made. Affidavits sworn to before the attorney of the party making them should not be received.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. Q. CHARLES, for defendant in error.

The chief justice did not sit in this case.

GORSLINE, J. This was an action of trespass commenced by Sloan against Anderson and four others in the district court of Arapahoe county, but service of the summons was only had upon Anderson. The summons was returnable on the first Tuesday of December, 1865, being the first day of the December term, and was returned by the officer as served on Anderson, December 13, 1865. The cause was continued to the March term, at which term the default of the defendant was taken, and the plaintiff's damages assessed by a jury at $1,200; upon which final judgment was entered. At the same term the defendant Anderson moved the court for a new trial, and also to vacate the judgment for reasons given, and which motions were based upon affidavits. These motions were overruled. As the decision of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial, and the reasons assigned by the defendant for vacating the judgment, and also the affidavit presented are not preserved in a bill of exceptions, they form no part of the record, and cannot be considered in this court. Van Landingham v. Fellows et al., 1 Scam. 233. At the December term, 1866, of the district court, the plaintiff moved that the sheriff have leave to amend his return, so that it should appear that the summons was served on the 30th day of November, 1865, instead of December 13, 1865. This motion was granted, and the return was amended accordingly. The record, as amended, was returned into this court at the adjourned July term, 1867. It is urged that the district court erred in allowing the sheriff to amend his return after writ of error sued out from this court. We think not. The cases are numerous where the misprisions of officers are allowed to be amended a long time after judgment and even when they were out of office. Moore v. Purple, 3 Gilm. 149; Leonard et al. v. Hughill, 2 Scam. 361.

We conclude that there is no error in the record, and the judgment of the district court must be affirmed.

Several of the affidavits used on the hearing of the motions in the district court were sworn to before the attorney of the party making them. This practice is wrong, and the court should have rejected them.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed. Affirmed.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS, WHEN NECESSARY.—Papers not part of the record must be made such by bill of exceptions, to be considered on appeal (Wike v. Campbell, 5 Colo. 127); and rulings and exceptions not preserved in the bill of exceptions form no part of the record, and cannot be considered on appeal: Whitney v. Teichfuss, 11 Colo. 556.

AMENDMENTS TO SHERIFF'S RETURNS are allowed with great liberality: McClure v. Smith, 14 Colo. 301.

AFFIDAVITS SWORN TO BEFORE ATTORNEY of the party making them cannot be received in evidence: Martin v. Skekan, 2 Colo. 518.

FRANKLIN v. UNITED STATES.

CONSTRUCTION of section 8 of act of Congress of 1790 relating to crimes. The Territory of Colorado is not a place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States within the meaning of section 8 of the act of Congress of 1790. 1 Stat. at Large, 118.

JURISDICTION—averment as to, in indictment for murder under act of Congress
An indictment based upon section 8 of the act of Congress of 1790, in which it is alleged that the murder was committed "at the said county of Gilpin" without further description of the place, and without any averment as to the jurisdiction of the United States, is not sufficient.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

MR. JOHN W. REMINE, for plaintiff in error.

MR. GEORGE W. CHAMBERLAIN, United States District Attorney, for the government.

HALLETT, C. J. At the December term, 1864, of the district court of the first judicial district, sitting at Central City, Gilpin county, the plaintiff in error was indicted for murder, tried and convicted of that crime, and sentenced to be executed.

He prosecutes this writ of error to reverse the judgment of the district court, and, together with other causes, he assigns the following as error:

"The court erred in entertaining jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, the said first judicial district of Colorado Territory not being in the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States."

The indictment appears to be founded upon section 3 of "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved April 30, 1790, which is in the following words:

"If any person or persons shall, within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or any other place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States commit the crime of willful murder, such person or persons, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer death."

The principal question presented in this record is, whether the place where the crime was committed was, at the time of the offense, within the descriptive terms of this act, so as to give the district court jurisdiction of the offense. The indictment sets forth that the crime was committed "at the said county of Gilpin," without further description of the place, and without any averment as to the jurisdiction of the United States. If the act operates in the Territories in the same way as in the several States, and to no greater extent, in other words, if the act operates in this Territory only within forts, arsenals and other places where the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, in virtue of exclusive ownership, it seems to be necessary, under the act, to aver in the indictment and prove upon the trial, that the place where the crime is committed is within the descriptive terms of the statute. United States v. Cornell, 2 Mason, 62. As this indictment contains no averment whatever as to the jurisdiction of the United States it is fatally defective, unless the act recited has a more enlarged operation in this territory than in the several States. If, as has been urged, the entire territory is a place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States within the meaning of this act, it ought to be sufficient to allege that the crime was committed in that part of the territory which is within the jurisdiction of the particular court in which the indictment may be presented. If such is the meaning of the law, this, together with the seventh section of the same act, is the law of homicide in this territory, in force wherever the process of the court runs, and wherever the court has jurisdiction under any law, and, therefore, it is sufficient to allege that the crime was committed within the geographical limits which define the territory, over which the court has jurisdiction; in other words, within the county or counties within and for which the court is sitting. Therefore we must inquire whether this territory is a place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States within the meaning of the law mentioned. We may find an answer to this inquiry in the sixteenth section of the act establishing this territory, which declares "that the constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said territory of Colorado as elsewhere within the United States." Within the several States, section 8 of the act of 1790 provides for punishing murder, where committed in a fort, arsenal, dockyard or the like place, owned by the general government, and the above-mentioned section of the organic act declares it shall have the same force and effect in this territory. It may be suggested that the words "force and effect," used in the organic act, refer to the penal power of the law, and were not designed to limit its operation to places owned by the general government as in the several States. But a law is presumed to be effectual to accomplish its purposes, and therefore it was not necessary to declare what force and effect the act of 1790 should have in this territory, except for the purpose of limiting the places within which it should obtain. If, by the terms of the act, it is in force in the territory, its power is declared in the language of the act itself, and the limitation in the organic act, that it shall have the same force and effect as elsewhere within the United States, can refer only to the places in the territory within which it shall operate. If then, in obedience to the sixteenth section of the organic act, we give section 8 of the act of 1790 the same force and effect in this territory which it has elsewhere in the United States, we shall apply it to murder committed in forts, arsenals and the like places belonging to the United States and in the Indian country.

We may reach the same conclusion without referring to the sixteenth section of the Organic Act. In all its legislation, congress pursues the authority given in the constitution, and we may refer the section under consideration to the sixteenth clause of section 8, article 1 of that instrument. In that clause of the constitution, congress is invested with exclusive legislative authority over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of government of the United States, and like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards and other needful buildings.

The description of places in the act is nearly the same as in this clause. The words, "fort, arsenal, dock-yard and magazine," are found in the act and in the constitution, and the words, "other place or district of country," occurring in the act, but not in the constitution, were probably inserted out of abundant caution, or probably they refer to the district of Columbia, which, at the time of this enactment, had no existence but was in contemplation. Of these words, the Supreme Court in United States v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. 390, say : "Congress might have omitted in its enumeration some similar place within its exclusive jurisdiction, which was not comprehended by any of the terms employed, to which some other name might be given ; and, therefore, the words 'other place or district of country' were added." Beyond doubt, this law was enacted in execution of the power conferred in this clause of the constitution. Now there is nothing concerning the territories of the United States in this clause ; it refers only to the federal seat of government, and to forts, arsenals, etc. The power to govern the territories of the United States is not derived from this clause of the constitution ; that power is conferred by the clause of the constitution which enables congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States, or it arises out of the general right of sovereignty, which exists in the federal government. American Insurance Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 511. The law we are discussing is not more comprehensive than the clause of the constitution upon which it rests, and therefore this territory, as a territory, is not within its descriptive terms.

In several enactments, congress has shown its concurrence in this view. By act of June 30, 1834, section 25 (4 Stat. 733), it is declared :

“That so much of the laws of the United States, as provides for the punishment of crimes, committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in force in the Indian country, provided, the same shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian, against the person or property of another Indian.”

The Indian country at that time comprised the greater part of the national territory, and congress found it necessary to extend the section we are considering to that country. If the territory of the United States had been within the terms of the law, it would have been in force in the Indian country before the act of 1834, and that enactment would have been unnecessary. The ordinance of 1787, for the government of the North West Territory, establishing the first of the territorial governments, contains the following clauses :

“The governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to congress from time to time; which laws shall be of force in the district until the organization of the general assembly therein, unless disapproved by congress, but afterward the legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit.”

“For the prevention of crimes and injuries, the laws to be adopted shall have force in all parts of the district, and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the governor shall make proper divisions thereof, and he shall proceed from time to time, as circumstance may require, to lay out the parts of the district in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships; subject, however, to such alterations as may hereafter be made by the legislature."

Ample power was conferred upon the North West Territory to enact a full code of civil and criminal laws, subject only to the limitations contained in the ordinance itself. If the power should be abused, congress could disapprove the laws enacted, the right to do so being expressly reserved in the ordinance. By act of August 7, 1789 (1 Stat. 51), after the present constitution was adopted, congress continued this ordinance in force, but did not restrict the powers of the territorial government, and, therefore, those powers remained as before, with some changes not material to our present inquiry. This ordinance subsequently became the organic law of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Mississippi, and Alabama Territories, which were established after the act of 1790 was passed. The language of the ordinance above set forth, undoubtedly conferred authority to enact the law of homicide, and from this it sufficiently appears that congress did not propose to exercise that authority directly and by its own act. Congress certainly did not intend to confer upon these territories authority to do that which it purposed to do or had done itself, and which, being done by congress, could not be modified or in any manner affected by the territories. If the law under consideration was the law of homicide in Illinois and the other territories last named, why should congress confer upon those territories authority to legislate upon that subject? Any law enacted by either of those territories in virtue of such authority in that case, so far as it should correspond with the federal law, would have been unavailing, and so far as in conflict with the federal law, it would have been void because of its repugnance thereto. Indeed, we cannot conceive that congress would confer upon any territory authority to legislate upon any subject upon which it had previously spoken in such territory. The fact that authority is given to a territory to enact laws upon any subject is convincing proof that, in the opinion of congress, no federal law obtains in such territory upon such subject. From the fact that congress conferred upon Illinois and the other territories last named power to enact a law of homicide, we may fairly infer that, in the opinion of that body, the act of 1790 did not provide such law for the government of those territories.

Again, in an act respecting Florida Territory (4 Stat. 164) in defining the jurisdiction of the superior courts of that territory, it is declared that they "shall have and exercise original and exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses committed against the laws of said territory, where the punishment shall be death." In this country murder is commonly punished with death, and we do no violence to language when we say that that crime was referred to in the clause we have cited. If so, the law of homicide in that territory was provided, not by the act of 1790, but by act of the territory. It appears to us that congress has always acted in the belief that the territory of the United States is not a place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, within the meaning of the law under consideration. An examination of the laws of the United States respecting the territories discloses the theory upon which congress has always acted, which is, that in the exercise of its undoubted right to govern the territories, that body, deeming it inconvenient or inexpedient to provide municipal laws for the territories, directly and by its own act, erected territorial governments, and delegated to them authority to enact such laws. Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 20 How. 176. Usually all restrictions upon the powers of a territorial government are found in the organic law by which it is established, but sometimes, as in the law punishing bigamy in the territories, and the law prohibiting slavery and some other acts, this rule has not been followed. In every instance in which congress has provided a law for the government of the territories by its own act, the intention that such law shall operate within the territories is clearly expressed. Ample governmental powers being conferred upon the territories wherein congress withholds authority, or revokes the authority which it has before conferred, the intention so to do is plainly expressed.

Since the ordinance of 1787 was disused, the language in which legislative power has been conferred upon territories is similar to that found in our own act, which is :

“The legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.”

More comprehensive language than this could not have been used, and we cannot doubt that it was designed to confer as full authority as that used in the ordinance. Unquestionably the powers conferred upon territories recently established are as full and complete as were those of the territories established under the ordinance. As the power to legislate upon the subject of homicide was conferred by the ordinance, so also it is conferred by our own act, and this, as we have seen, excludes the notion that the law of homicide in this territory is to be found in the act of 1790. Whenever congress shall determine to enact municipal laws for the territories, upon any subject, we believe that as heretofore the intention so to do will be clearly expressed ; that congress has not yet entered upon this work is entirely certain. We can find no law of homicide provided by congress to be enforced in this territory ; whenever such law shall be enacted, it will be the duty of all officers of justice to obey and enforce its provisions.

The act of 1790 operates within forts, arsenals and like places within this territory, because such places are described in that act ; and in the Indian country, because it is there made effectual by the act of 1834, and also because the sixteenth section of our organic act declares it shall have the same force and effect in all these places as elsewhere within the United States, but we cannot say that the entire territory is a place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, as described therein. As the laws of congress can be better enforced than those of the territory, we would be glad to adopt a different view if it were possible to do so, but we cannot indulge our wishes or preferences in opposition to the law. It was said at the bar that, inasmuch as the greater part of this territory, including the county of Gilpin, was formerly Indian country, and at that time the act of 1790 was enforced therein, that act has remained in force notwithstanding the territory has ceased to be Indian country. It is not necessary to demonstrate the fallacy of this proposition. As the law attached because of the character of the territory, whenever the territory was divested of that character, it thereupon ceased to operate therein. It was also said that, at the time of the offense, Gilpin county was in fact in the Indian country. If so, the fact should have been averred in the indictment, and, in the absence of such averment, the court could not take jurisdiction upon that ground.

Because there is no averment in this indictment as to the jurisdiction of the United States in the place where the crime was committed, the judgment of the district court is reversed.

Reversed.

RESTRICTIONS ON TERRITORIAL POWERS are usually found in the organic law by which it is established, but sometimes, as in the case of laws punishing bigamy and slavery, this rule has not been followed: Keynolds v. People, 1 Colo. 181.

CASS v. DAVIS.

JURISDICTION of district and probate courts. In civil cases, where the debt or sum claimed does not exceed $2,000, district and probate courts are of concurrent jurisdiction.

STATUTE repugnant to Organic Act. Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7, of the act of 1865, relating to probate courts (4 Sess. 98), which provide for appeals from probate to district courts, are repugnant to the Organic Act, and therefore inoperative and void.

APPEAL from probate to district court. The supreme court alone has revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of probate courts, and an appeal will not lie from a judgment of a probate court to a district court.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

DAVIS obtained judgment against Cass in the probate court of Arapahoe county, and the latter appealed to the district court, where the appeal was dismissed. The action of the district court was assigned for error.

The chief justice did not participate in the decision.

Mr. J. Q. CHARLES, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for defendant in error.

The chief justice did not sit in this case.

GORSLINE, J. The only question involved in this case is, whether appeals can be taken from the probate to the district courts. The cause has been very elaborately and ably argued, and is one, as relating to the appellate jurisdiction of the district courts, of very general interest. By section 9 of the original Organic Act, it was provided, that the judicial power of the territory should be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace, and in the same section it is further provided "that the jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of the probate courts and of the justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law," with the proviso, that probate courts and justices of the peace shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy when the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute, or when the debt or sum claimed shall exceed $100. It also provided, that writs of error, bills of exceptions and appeal, should be allowed from the district court to the supreme court under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law. It is contended by the plaintiff in error, that by the clause giving jurisdiction to the several courts, and that clause in the Organic Act extending the legislative power to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the constitution of the United States and the Organic Act, that the legislature had the power to allow appeals from the probate to the district court. To this conclusion we can see no reasonable ground of objection. There was nothing in the letter or spirit of the act to prohibit it—it would have been a rightful subject of legislation, and there can be no doubt, but that the legislature, if it saw fit, could have conferred that jurisdiction upon the district courts. In the year 1862, the territorial legislature memorialized congress to increase the jurisdiction of the probate courts. In 1863, congress, in answer to this memorial, passed an amendment to the Organic Act, which effected a radical change in our judicial system, at least, so far as the jurisdiction of probate courts is concerned. By the third section of the amendment it is enacted, that the probate courts shall not have jurisdiction in any matter in controversy in cases where the debt or sum claimed shall exceed the sum of $2,000, and in the same section it is further enacted, that the supreme, district, and probate courts respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction, and authority for the redress of all wrongs committed against the laws of the territory, affecting persons or property.

It will be seen from these enactments that the district and probate courts have concurrent jurisdiction in all civil cases where the amount in controversy does not exceed the sum of $2,000, at least in those places where the legislature see proper to confer the jurisdiction upon them. It is said that under these amendments the legislature can provide for appeals from probate to district courts. Possibly it may be so, but can any one suppose that it was the intention of congress so to legislate that appeals could be taken from one court to another of concurrent jurisdiction? There may be such a judicial system in some of the States, but I know of none. Supposing that the legislature should confer the increased jurisdiction contemplated by the amendment to the Organic Act upon all of the probate courts in the territory, what would hinder the legislature from providing for appeals from the district courts to the probate courts in all cases when the amount in controversy did not exceed the sum of $2,000? The courts would have concurrent common-law and chancery jurisdiction, and I can perceive nothing to prevent the legislature from so providing if it thought proper, and yet I can hardly believe that it was the intention of congress to permit that appeals might be taken from a court of unlimited jurisdiction to one of a limited jurisdiction. It is further enacted, in the third amendment to the Organic Act, that writs of error, bills of exceptions and appeal, shall be allowed from the final decisions of the district and probate courts to the supreme court, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law. It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff in error that, because there are no negative words or words of prohibition in this clause, that there is nothing to prevent the legislature to provide for appeals in a manner or to courts different from that specified in the act.

But, in view of the extended jurisdiction conferred upon the probate courts in the same section, could such have been the intention of congress? The language of the act strikes me as equally strong and prohibitory, as if it read that writs of error and appeals should be allowed from the final decisions of the district and probate courts to the supreme court, and to no other. We have been referred to the cases of Jackson v. Kemble, 18 Ill. 580; Burns v. Henderson, 20 id. 264; and Harrison v. Doyle, 11 Wis. 263, as sustaining the doctrine that, when the constitutions of Illinois and Wisconsin had provided that the appellate jurisdiction should remain in one court, still it was competent for the legislature of those States to provide that appeals might be taken to another and different court. By the constitution of Illinois it is provided: "That the circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law and equity and in all cases of appeals from all inferior courts." By another section it provides: "That the jurisdiction of the county courts shall extend to all probate and such other jurisdiction as the general assembly may confer in civil cases." Under this last section of the constitution, the legislature enacted that all appeals from decisions of justices of the peace and police magistrates in Peoria county should be taken to the county court of that county.

In passing upon the cases referred to, the court say, that the word "shall," in the act of the legislature, should be construed to mean "may," in order that there should be no conflict between the act and the constitution, and then held, that, under the constitution and the law, appeals might be taken both to the circuit court and the county court of that county. It will be observed that, although the constitution conferred appellate jurisdiction on the circuit courts in all cases, still it also provided that the legislature might confer such jurisdiction upon the county courts as it deemed proper. One clause of the constitution was certainly as binding as the other, and the power given to the legislative assembly, to regulate the jurisdiction of county courts, was as great as that by which the jurisdiction of the circuit courts was provided for. I do not see that these authorities sustain the doctrine claimed for them.

The constitution of Wisconsin provides, that the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, and shall also have a general superintending control over all inferior courts. It also provides, that the circuit courts shall have appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals and a supervisory control over the same. In Harrison v. Doyle, above referred to, an appeal was taken from the county court of Milwaukee county to the supreme court, and it was urged, that the appeal should have been taken to the circuit court instead of the supreme court. The court held, that, as the constitution provided that the supreme court should have appellate jurisdiction co-extensive with the State, and the superintending control over all inferior courts, that the appeal was well taken. They held still further, that it was competent for the legislature to provide for the removal of causes by appeal from the county to the circuit court. Undoubtedly, if the legislature of that State had so provided, appeals could have been taken either to the circuit, or directly to the supreme Plaintiff moved to strike out the evidence of Wanless, which motion was sustained. The defendant asked the court to give to the jury the following instructions:

"1st. If the jury believe from all the evidence that the plaintiff in this case, while in the employment of Christian, conducted himself in such an improper manner in the discharge of his duties that Christian sustained damages on account thereof, these damages are a valid and good set-off against the demand of Tucker. 2d. A greater degree of caution and prudence was necessary on the part of Tucker in the discharge of his duties in such times and places as appear in the evidence in this case, than in ordinary times and places." And the instructions were not given.

Messrs. MILLER & MARKHAM, for appellant.

Mr. G. W. PURKINS, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The appellee sued the appellant before a justice of the peace, to recover the value of services by him rendered in driving a team for the appellant, and obtained a judgment for $87. The appellant appealed to the district court, in which another trial was had, resulting in a judgment in favor of the appellee for the same sum. We have reviewed the proceedings of the district court in this cause, and we find no error therein.

The evidence of Wanless was not pertinent to the issue, and the court very properly withdrew it from the consideration of the jury. The question proposed to Wanless assumed the existence of a fact not shown by the testimony previously introduced, and, if this were not so, we fail to discover any connection between the subject-matter of the inquiry and the issue, which was being tried. The instructions asked by the appellant could not have been applied to the evidence given to the jury, and the court rightly rejected them.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Messrs. PURKINS & COOK, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. GEO. F. CROOKER, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an action of assumpsit brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, to the March term, 1867, of the district court of Arapahoe county. The plaintiff below declared upon a bank check for the sum of $800, made by the defendant below on the 27th day of December, 1866. The plaintiff in error did not appear in the court below, and there was judgment against him by default for the amount of the check. It is said that the proceedings of the district court were erroneous, for the reason that the check upon which the judgment was rendered was dated December 27, 1867, was not due at the commencement of the suit, and was not correctly described in the declaration. The check given in evidence is not before us, and, therefore, we cannot consider the questions here raised. The copy attached to the declaration, and that inserted in the transcript by the clerk, form no part of the record, and there is no bill of exceptions. Martin v. Ahrensfels, 24 Ill. 188; Franey v. True, 26 id. 184.

The declaration describes a check due and payable at the commencement of the suit, and, as the contrary does not appear, we presume that the evidence supported the allegations of the declaration. The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — interest on promissory note. Upon a note payable in thirty days, "with ten per cent interest per month," interest was allowed at the rate specified, until maturity, and, after maturity, at the rate of ten per cent per annum.

MESSRS. JOHNSON & TELLER, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This action was brought upon a promissory note, of which the following is a copy :

"$95.27. Thirty days after date, I promise to pay A. S. Carpenter, or order, the sum of ninety-five dollars, 27-100, for value received, with ten per cent interest per month.

"B. O. RUSSELL,
"THOMAS SMITH."

Nevada, K. T., November, 26, 1860.

There was judgment below for the plaintiff, and the court in assessing the damages computed interest at ten per cent per month, from the date of the note until it fell due, and, after the note was due, at the rate of ten per cent per annum. This is assigned as error, the plaintiff alleging, that he is, by the terms of the note, entitled to interest at the rate therein specified, from the date of the note up to the time the judgment was entered. In the absence of any agreement, the legal rate of interest in this territory is ten per cent per annum, and, as the plaintiff claims a higher rate, namely, ten per cent per month, of course he rests his claim upon the language of the note.

We cannot distinguish this case from Brewster v. Wakefield, 22 How. (U. S.) 118. The Minnesota act referred to in that case is substantially the same as our own, except as to the rate of interest in the absence of agreement, and the facts in that case raised the question we are now considering. The supreme court, speaking of the notes upon which that action was founded, and which, as to the stipulation for interest, were the same as the note upon which this action is founded, say: "The contract being entirely silent as to interest, if the notes should not be punctually paid, the creditor is entitled to interest after that time by operation of law, and not by any provision in the contract." This lays down the correct rule adopted by the district court in computing the interest in this case, and no error was committed by that court.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

GORSLINE, J. This is a suit in equity commenced by bill filed in the probate court of Jefferson county, on the 25th day of November, 1864. By the Organic Act, and by a law of the territorial legislature, approved March 11, 1864, the probate court of Jefferson county was clothed with equity jurisdiction concurrent with that of the district court, where the debt or sum claimed did not exceed the sum of $2,000. A decree was rendered in favor of the complainant, agreeably to the prayer of the bill, on the 7th day of June, 1865. Various causes are assigned for error, but I think it necessary to notice but one. By an act of the legislature, approved February 8, 1865, the equity jurisdiction of the probate courts was taken away, except in certain cases therein specified. This case does not come within the limitation expressed, and after the passage of the act all proceedings in the probate court should have ceased, as its jurisdiction was gone. *Butler v. TODD et al. v. SIMONTON.

PRACTICE IN CHANCERY — bill to enforce vendor's lien — decree. A contract for the sale of land was made, but the land was not conveyed. Upon bill filed by the vendor to enforce a lien for the purchase-money, it was error to decree a sale of the land.

The proper practice in such case is to require the vendee to pay the money due upon the contract within a specified time, or in default thereof that he be foreclosed of all equity of redemption in the premises.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

The chief justice did not sit in this case.

Mr. J. Q. CHARLES, for appellant.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for appellee.

GORSLINE, J. The complainant in the court below, Thomas H. Simonton, filed his bill, in which it is stated that, on the 28th day of January, 1861, he entered into a written contract with the defendant Todd, by which he agreed to sell to Todd a tract of land situated in the counties of Arapahoe and Jefferson, and containing about 160 acres, for the sum of $1,200, which was to be paid on or before the 1st day of September, 1861, when the complainant was to execute to Todd a good and sufficient deed in fee simple for the premises, and Todd was to take immediate possession of the claim; that, on or about the 25th day of November, 1861, Todd, with intent to cheat and defraud the complainant, pretended to sell and convey said premises to the defendant, Albert Stout, and that Stout had full notice of the manner in which Todd had acquired possession of the premises and of the title of the complainant thereto. The bill further states, that the defendant Todd went into possession of the land, and remained in possession until he sold to Stout, when he took possession of the same. The bill further states, that the sum of $1,200, which was agreed to be paid for the purchase of said premises, has not been paid, but is still due. The bill prays, among other things, that the defendants be decreed to pay to complainant the amount found to be due him on the contract, or, in default thereof, that he be decreed to have a lien on the premises for said amount, and that, in default of the payment of the sum found to be due the complainant, the premises, or that portion situated in the county of Arapahoe, be sold under the order of the court, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the amount found due to complainant.

To this bill the defendants demurred, which demurrer was overruled; but, as the principal cause of demurrer is the same as the principal errors assigned, we will consider them together. The defendants answered, admitting most of the statements in the bill, but denying all knowledge on the part of Stout of the manner in which Todd had acquired possession of the claim, also denying that the complainant had any right or title to the premises, and admitting that the said sum of $1,200 had not been paid.

To this answer there was a replication, and proofs were taken before a master which we think unnecessary to notice. The decree of the district court was in accordance with the prayer of the bill, that the complainant have a lien on the premises, and that, in default of payment of the amount found due on the contract and the costs of suit, the premises be sold, and out of the proceeds of the sale the complainant's debt and the costs be paid, and the surplus, if any, be paid to the defendant Stout, and that the master should execute and deliver to the purchaser, at such sale, a good and sufficient conveyance of the premises which should operate to convey all the right, title and interest of the defendants in and to the same.

This decree, we think, was erroneous. The relation of the parties to this contract is analogous to that of equitable mortgagor and mortgagee, and there can be no doubt that a court of chancery has jurisdiction to relieve the vendor as well as the vendee. In a contract of this nature, the lien which the vendor has is in the nature of a mortgage. 1 Wash. on Real Prop. 540. As the title did not pass to the vendee by the contract, but remained in the vendor, there was really nothing to sell, and the purchaser at the master's sale would obtain nothing. The proper decree in such cases is, that the vendee pay the money due upon the contract in some time to be specified in the decree, or, in default thereof, that he be foreclosed of all equity of redemption in the premises. 5 Wis. 598. There were other questions touching the title to the premises which we have not examined, thinking, perhaps, that, as the tenure by which lands are held has been changed since the making of this contract, it has become unnecessary.

Decree reversed and cause remanded.

VENUE, CHANGE OF — sufficiency of petition. Where several counties are attached for judicial purposes, a petition for change of venue, founded upon prejudice of the inhabitants, must show that such prejudice exists in all of the counties so attached.

SAME — second application. A second application in the same cause, for change of venue, is addressed to the discretion of the court, and error cannot be assigned upon refusal to grant it.

JUROR — competency of. A juror having expressed himself strongly against the accused before trial, the fact was brought to the attention of the court upon motion for a new trial. Held, that a new trial should have been allowed.

INDICTMENT for murder upon which the prisoner was found guilty. The counties of Weld and Douglas were attached to the county of Arapahoe for judicial purposes. Previous to the trial in the court below, the prisoner moved for a change of venue, upon a petition setting up that the inhabitants of Arapahoe county were prejudiced against him, but no mention of the counties of Douglas and Weld was made in this petition. The motion was denied, and the prisoner then filed an amended petition, in which he alleged that the inhabitants of all the counties above named were prejudiced against him.

The motion for new trial was supported by the affidavit of Geo. Shallcross, of which the material part is given in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. PURKINS & COOK, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. V. D. MARKHAM, for defendants in error.

EYSTER, J. (after stating the facts). On his first assignment of error the plaintiff avers that there was error in the refusal of the court below to allow him a change of venue on his first petition and affidavit. Upon an examination of his petition, we find, that he sets out only, that there is such a prejudice in the minds of the people of Arapahoe County against him, that he cannot there expect a fair and impartial trial. If there had been then no other counties attached to Arapahoe county for judicial purposes, this petition and affidavit would have been sufficient, and it would have been error in the court below to have refused to grant it. But at that time the counties of Weld and Douglas were attached to the county of Arapahoe for judicial purposes and, in pursuance of law, jurors were drawn from those counties as well as from Arapahoe county to make up the panel of jurors, and although his petition complied with the letter of the law, we do not think it complied with its spirit, and we can see no error in the action of the court below in that behalf. The next assignment of error is, we think, equally groundless. After the refusal of the court below to allow a change of venue, on the first petition presented, for the grounds above stated, the plaintiff in error filed a second and amended petition for a change of venue, in which he supplied the omission of his former petition, by adding thereto the counties of Douglas and Weld, and alleged the existence of the prejudice complained of in his first petition. This was only an amendment of his first petition. A change of venue under our statute, when properly applied for, is a matter of right, and is of course. The second application was addressed to the discretion of the court, and, we think, was properly so addressed, and we can see no error in its refusal in this instance to grant the motion.

The third and last error is of a more important character. That the court below erred in denying the motion for a new trial, when it was shown that one of the jurors who sat upon the trial was biased and prejudiced against the plaintiff in error, and had formed and expressed an opinion of his guilt before he took his oath and seat as a juror.

This exception, under all the circumstances in this case, we think is a good one, and on it this judgment must be reversed. Trial by jury is of most ancient origin. It has always, in all ages and countries where it has been adopted and used, been esteemed and held to be one of the most cherished and carefully guarded rights of the people. In magna charta the right of trial by jury was as earnestly and as determinedly insisted upon as the great right of habeas corpus, and the people of England were no less jealous and watchful in guarding and protecting the purity of the jury box than they were determined and earnest in asserting it as a great popular right. It is, in the words of an eminent English author, "the palladium of the civil rights of the people," and it is the boast of her people that their parliaments and their courts have always directed their best efforts to maintain its purity. In our own land of boasted liberty, trial by jury is one of the great constitutional land-marks, and any violation of the purity of its sacred precincts is looked upon by all as a great crime. Common custom and the sanction of the law permits a party in a suit to have a juror solemnly sworn to make true answers to such questions as may be asked of him touching his competency as a juror; and, before he is permitted to be sworn as a juror in the particular cause, he is required, under the solemnity of an oath, to answer all such reasonable and proper questions as may be put to him touching his interest, bias or affection in the cause, as to the parties. If, upon such examination, it appears that the juror is, from any cause, under any influence of fear, favor or affection, or that he has in any way and on any cause made up an opinion as to the merits of the cause, he is justly and properly set aside by the court as an incompetent juror in that cause.

An examination of the facts complained of in this cause reveals to us that the juror, William Morgan (to whom objection was made), was in the neighborhood of the place where the homicide occurred at the time of its occurrence, and that he had heard from different parties a narration of the facts in the case. He declares that, from what he had heard of the transaction, he had formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. The juror, on being further interrogated, stated, that he thought he could give the prisoner a fair trial, and, to a further question, he answered that he could give the accused a fair and impartial trial without being influenced by that opinion. Whether the refusal to permit this juror, under such circumstances, to be set aside for cause, was error to reverse the judgment, we will not here decide, but, coupled with what was made apparent to the court on the motion for a new trial by the affidavit of Shallcross, we think that there was error in the court below in refusing to allow the plaintiff's motion. Shallcross swears that, on the morning of the day of the trial and before the jury were impaneled in the cause, "I heard William Morgan express strong conviction of the defendant's guilt; one of the expressions he used was this: 'I would hang the son of a bitch on the evidence I already have, unless stronger testimony than I have heard could be brought in his favor,' and numerous other sentiments of a like import that I cannot now remember."

Such expressions, we think, exhibit malignity and vindictiveness on the part of the juror toward the accused, inconsistent with the purity required in the jury box, and we think that when the defendant stood before the court with that uncontradicted affidavit in his hand, and from the verge of the grave appealed for a trial in his cause by an impartial jury, it was his right to be heard, and the refusal to grant him that right was such error as requires us to reverse the judgment of the court below, which is done, and the cause is remanded and a new trial awarded.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

HALLET, C. J., did not participate in the decision.

Mr. GEO. F. CROCKER, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. Q. CHARLES, for defendants in error.

GORSLINE, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted at the December term, 1865, of the district court of Arapahoe county, under section 48 of the Laws of 1861, on page 298, for an assault with intent to commit murder, which was embraced in the first count of the indictment, and also for an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to inflict a bodily injury, which was contained in two separate counts. The cause was tried at the same term before Justice Gale, then the presiding judge, and a jury. The defendant was convicted under the second and third counts, and acquitted under the first count. There were a great number of instructions asked for by the defendant (twenty-two in number), which could only have been intended to mystify and perplex the jury. This is a practice which cannot be too strongly condemned. We regret that we cannot affirm the judgment of the district court, for we think, from the evidence given on the trial, that the assault was an aggravated one, and without any considerable provocation, and that substantial justice was done.

But the bill of exceptions shows that, after the court had given instructions to the jury in writing, he further gave them some instructions orally. The statute of 1861, page 282, section 28, provides, "that the district court in all cases, both civil and criminal, shall only instruct the petit jury as to the law of the case, and such instructions shall be reduced to writing, and may be taken by the jury in their retirement.

This statute is mandatory, and we must submit to it so long as the legislature suffers it to remain a law. Ray v. Wooters, 19 Ill. 82. It is urged by the counsel for the plaintiff in error that the instructions were not given verbally to the jury, but that the court read to the jury from the statute the definition of malice. Even if that could obviate the difficulty, still the record does not so allege the fact to be, for it states that the instructions were given orally, and that the defendant below excepted for that reason. One object of the statute doubtless is that the jury may have all the instructions before them when they retire to consider their verdict, and in that view it can make but little difference whether instructions are given orally or read from a book, for, in either case, they would be equally liable to forget them.

The defendant below moved the court to arrest the judgment, because the indictment charged in the second and third counts that the assault was made feloniously, whereas by the statute such assault is only made a misdemeanor.

The statute does declare that such an assault shall be adjudged a high misdemeanor. It is said in the books that every felony includes a high misdemeanor, but probably the converse of the proposition would not be true. However, the word "feloniously" may be regarded as surplusage, and not vitiate the indictment. Hess v. State of Ohio, 5 Ham. 12.

FORD GOLD MINING CO. v. LANGFORD et al.

PRACTICE IN LIEN CASES. Under the Mechanics' Lien Act of 1864 (3d Sec. 102), all creditors interested in the premises to be charged may have their claims adjusted in one suit.

The better practice for creditors, who seek to establish a lien in a pending suit, is to file a bill in the nature of a cross-bill setting forth the facts respecting the lien in the same way as if the bill were original, and making the debtor and all other parties to the suit defendants therein.

In whatever way creditors, who are defendants in the bill, are allowed to assert their demands, they must observe the same strictness in pleading that is required of the party who institutes the suit.

If a defendant creditor sets up a lien in his answer, an opportunity should be afforded the debtor and all other parties to the suit to resist his demand.

If the debtor and the other parties fail to answer his allegations within the time fixed by the court, there should be an order taking the answer as confessed, and the subsequent proceedings should be the same as upon a bill.

ANSWERS INSUFFICIENT. The answers in this case are insufficient to support the decree in not showing, 1st. The time when the contracts were made; 2d. The kind of labor performed; 3d. The quantity of materials furnished; and they contain no prayer for relief.

ANSWER without oath. It may be doubtful whether complainants can deprive defendants of the benefit of their oaths in this proceeding. But if the oath is waived and the answer is put in without oath, there is no ground for complaint.

Although the sufficiency of the bill was not questioned, the decree was wholly reversed, in order that the district court might have full control of the cause.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

Messrs. REMINE & HULETT, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for defendants in error.

HALLETT, C. J. Langford, Marshall and the Lees commenced proceedings in the district court of Gilpin county to enforce a mechanics' lien upon certain property of the plaintiff in error. Under a charge that they had, or claimed to have, some interest in the premises or a lien thereon, several persons were made defendants in the bill with the plaintiff in error, and the oaths of defendants to their answers were waived. Some of the defendants answered under oath, and others without oath, responding to the allegations of the bill, and asserting liens upon the premises therein described. The bill was taken as confessed, and a decree was entered in favor of the complainants therein and in favor of those defendants who, in their answers, claimed liens upon the premises, establishing such liens.

It is assigned for error that there was no service upon the plaintiff in error in the court below, but this was not relied upon in argument, and we have not discovered any defect in the service.

Other questions are presented by the assignment of errors, but we shall notice those only which relate to the sufficiency of the pleadings.

This proceeding is founded upon the act of 1864, to create a lien in favor of mechanics and others in certain cases. By the twenty-fifth section of the act it appears that, in suits instituted under its provisions, all persons interested in the property charged with the lien may be made parties, and if they are not made parties, by the nineteenth section they may, on application to the court at any time before judgment, become parties. By the twenty-fourth section, creditors are allowed to contest each other's right as to the lien and as to the amount due, and, by the tenth section, lien creditors are to share pro rata in the proceeds of the property, and the court is to ascertain what amount shall be paid to each.

From these and other provisions of the act, it appears that all creditors who are interested in the premises to be charged with a lien may have their claims adjusted in one suit. The party who initiates the proceeding is required to commence by bill or petition containing a brief statement of the contract or agreement out of which the lien arises, a description of the premises subject to the lien, the amount claimed to be due, and all facts necessary to establish the lien under the act. In what way creditors, who are made defendants to the bill, or who become parties to the suit upon their own application, are to proceed to establish their demands, is not pointed out by the statute.

In the State of Illinois, under a statute containing provisions similar to those we are considering, it seems that lien creditors are allowed to assert their demands in a suit pending by answer and by what is singularly and, perhaps, inappropriately called a bill of interpleader. Power et al. v. McCord et al., 36 Ill. 214; Martin et al. v. Eversal et al., id. 222.

In whatever way lien creditors, who are made defendants in the bill, are allowed to assert their demands, it seems to us that they ought to be held to the same strictness in pleading that is required of the party who institutes the suit. All creditors ought to stand upon the same footing, and, whether they are complainants or defendants, they should establish their demands according to the statute. Perhaps the pleading adopted by a creditor who seeks to establish a lien in a pending suit is not material to the rights of the several parties in interest, but we think that much confusion may be avoided by requiring every such creditor to file a bill in the nature of a cross-bill, setting forth the facts respecting the lien in the same way as if the bill were original, and making the debtor and all other parties to the suit defendants therein. In this mode of proceeding an opportunity would be given the debtor and all other parties to contest the petitioner's right to recover, and this opportunity must be given in whatever way the claim is asserted. We are not prepared to say that a defendant, who is a lien creditor, may not present his lien in his answer, but if he do so, as to the lien, his answer must be substantially a bill. He must set forth the facts upon which he relies to establish his lien with the same particularity as if the proceedings had been instituted by him. He must require the debtor and the other parties to the suit to answer his answer, and he must regularly pray for the relief which he seeks. If the debtor and the other parties fail to answer his allegations within the time fixed by the court, there should be an order taking the answer in which the lien is set up as confessed, and the subsequent proceedings should be the same as upon a bill. In no other way can an opportunity be given the debtor and the other parties interested in the premises to resist the demand which the petitioner seeks to establish, and the right so to resist is secured to them by the statute and rests upon the principles of justice.

The defendants, who sought to establish liens in this action, have not, in their answers, stated sufficient facts to sustain the decree. In no instance is the time when the contract or agreement was made stated in the answer. In those cases in which the parties claim a lien for labor performed, there is a general allegation that labor was performed in erecting and constructing the mill. This is not sufficient. The court should be informed whether the party labored as carpenter, mason or otherwise, in order that it may be seen whether he is entitled to a lien. In the answer of Bell & Scott, the quantity of fire-brick clay and tile furnished by them is not stated. There is no prayer for relief in these answers. The parties ask that the court will protect their rights, but they do not ask that their liens may be established, that the amounts due them may be ascertained, or that the premises may be sold. Possibly a careful examination would reveal other defects in these answers, but it is unnecessary to look further. It does not appear that any opportunity was given the plaintiff in error to contest the liens set up in these answers. These defendants, who claimed liens, equally with the complainants in the bill, were seeking to establish demands against the plaintiff in error. Nominally defendants, they were, in fact, complainants, and should have been regarded as complainants in so far as their action was adverse to the plaintiff in error.

It is assigned for error, that some of the answers of defendants were put in without oath. Under this statute, it may be doubtful whether complainants, by waiving the oath of defendants to their answer, can deprive defendants of the benefit of their oath if the defendants put in their answer under oath. If complainants waive the oath, and defendants accept the waiver by putting in the answer without oath, it is difficult to perceive upon what principle the proceedings can be regarded as erroneous. By consent of parties, an answer may be put in without oath, but an order of the court should be obtained for that purpose. 1 Daniel's Ch. Prac. (3d Am. ed.) 748. No order of the court, allowing the defendants to answer without oath, was obtained in this cause, but, as the court received and acted upon the answers, probably we should not, for that reason alone, reverse the decree. What we have said upon this point applies to those portions of the answers only which are responsive to the complainant's bill. We have seen that, in so far as the answers relate to the liens of the defendants, they are in the nature of bills of complaint. Now the statute does not require that the bill shall be sworn to, and when the lien is set up in another pleading, there is no greater reason why the pleading should be under oath than when the lien is set up in a bill.

Because of the insufficiency of the answers in respect to the substantial allegations therein, this decree must be reversed. No question is made in the assignment of error as to the sufficiency of the bill, and we are asked to affirm the decree as to the complainants therein. We think that the cause should be fully under the control of the court below, that the rights of all parties may be adjusted, and therefore the decree is wholly reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to the views herein expressed.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in error, who was the plaintiff below, brought his action to the January term, 1865.

At that term, the defendants below appeared and moved the court to continue the case upon affidavit filed, which continuance was granted at the costs of the applicants. At the February term following, the plaintiffs in error filed a motion to dismiss the cause, which was overruled by the court. The case was then continued at the instance of the court. At the April term following, the attorneys of Jones came and withdrew their appearance, whereupon the attorney of Stevens took judgment for want of a plea, and the court proceeded to assess the damages without having summoned a jury for that purpose.

It is claimed by the plaintiffs in error, that the original writ having been signed by A. O. Patterson, as deputy to the county clerk, Carpenter, is void because no deputy was authorized to act in this behalf as clerk of the probate court. We do not think it necessary to inquire into this question, because whether the process was void or voidable only, inasmuch as the plaintiffs appeared in the cause and moved a continuance of the case, they must be held to have waived any irregularity in the process. The purpose of fact, complainants, and should have been regarded as complainants in so far as their action was adverse to the plaintiff in error.

It is assigned for error, that some of the answers of defendants were put in without oath. Under this statute, it may be doubtful whether complainants, by waiving the oath of defendants to their answer, can deprive defendants of the benefit of their oath if the defendants put in their answer under oath. If complainants waive the oath, and defendants accept the waiver by putting in the answer without oath, it is difficult to perceive upon what principle the proceedings can be regarded as erroneous. By consent of parties, an answer may be put in without oath, but an order of the court should be obtained for that purpose. 1 Daniel's Ch. Prac. (3d Am. ed.) 748. No order of the court, allowing the defendants to answer without oath, was obtained in this cause, but, as the court received and acted upon the answers, probably we should not, for that reason alone, reverse the decree. What we have said upon this point applies to those portions of the answers only which are responsive to the complainant's bill. We have seen that, in so far as the answers relate to the liens of the defendants, they are in the nature of bills of complaint. Now the statute does not require that the bill shall be sworn to, and when the lien is set up in another pleading, there is no greater reason why the pleading should be under oath than when the lien is set up in a bill.

Because of the insufficiency of the answers in respect to the substantial allegations therein, this decree must be reversed. No question is made in the assignment of error as to the sufficiency of the bill, and we are asked to affirm the decree as to the complainants therein. We think that the cause should be fully under the control of the court below, that the rights of all parties may be adjusted, and therefore the decree is wholly reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to the views herein expressed.

JONES et al. v. STEVENS.

PRACTICE — APPEARANCE cures defective summons. Defendants who appear and move a continuance of the cause waive defects in the summons.

PRACTICE — DAMAGES must be assessed by jury in certain cases. In an action of trespass to recover damages for diverting water from an irrigating ditch, if the defendants are defaulted, the damages must be assessed by a jury.

Error to Probate Court, Jefferson County.

HALLETT, C. J., did not participate in the decision.

Mr. J. B. SMITH and Mr. G. F. CROCKER, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for defendant in error.

Per CURIAM. The defendant in error, who was the plaintiff below, brought his action to the January term, 1865.

At that term, the defendants below appeared and moved the court to continue the case upon affidavit filed, which continuance was granted at the costs of the applicants. At the February term following, the plaintiffs in error filed a motion to dismiss the cause, which was overruled by the court. The case was then continued at the instance of the court. At the April term following, the attorneys of Jones came and withdrew their appearance, whereupon the attorney of Stevens took judgment for want of a plea, and the court proceeded to assess the damages without having summoned a jury for that purpose.

It is claimed by the plaintiffs in error, that the original writ having been signed by A. O. Patterson, as deputy to the county clerk, Carpenter, is void because no deputy was authorized to act in this behalf as clerk of the probate court. We do not think it necessary to inquire into this question, because whether the process was void or voidable only, inasmuch as the plaintiffs appeared in the cause and moved a continuance of the case, they must be held to have waived any irregularity in the process. The purpose of process, like that of a summons, is to bring the parties into court and advise them in brief of the nature of the proceedings against them. It is essential that objection be made to the process at the earliest time when they shall appear in court in response to the summons. If they can take any other steps in the cause, and claim afterward to object to the validity of the process, they can do so through all the stages of the cause up to the time of the verdict, until the error or irregularity will be cured by the verdict. Here they moved a continuance upon affidavit and it was allowed.

In the interval between the terms of the court, an alias summons might have been obtained, and the parties brought into court by process not liable to the objection insisted upon. The case in 6 Blackf. 557, appears to have been decided upon the ground that a voluntary appearance can be withdrawn at any time, a doctrine condemned by a majority of the court in Dana et al. v. Adams, 13 Ill. 693. In this case the appearance was withdrawn, and we are urged to presume that the withdrawal was with the leave of the court. But we incline to think that there was no leave of the court given in the premises, but that the court recorded the withdrawal as a faithful record of the proceedings, without either assenting or denying the right of withdrawal. The defendants below took all the responsibilities of their own act, and not having asked the leave of the court to withdraw their appearance, it must be presumed they did it at their own responsibility as to the consequences.

In the case of Easton et al. v. Altum, 1 Scam. 250, and authorities there cited, it is held, that whether the writ be void or not, the defendant took such steps that he was regularly in court whether there was process or not.

The next point claimed as error is, that the court proceeded after judgment, in default of a plea, to assess the plaintiff's damages without a venire for a jury. In all cases at common law, where judgment is entered upon default, a writ of inquiry was necessary to ascertain the measure of damages due to the party complainant. Our statute, section 6, acts of 1861, page 279, so changed the common-law rule as to permit the clerk to assess the damages in cases where the action is brought upon an instrument in writing for the payment of money only, and when the damages rest in computation. In this case the suit was brought to recover damages in an action of trespass on the case for obstructing and diverting a water-course or ditch from the lands of Isaac Stevens. The act of the legislative assembly of 1864, section 6, page 118, provides, that the probate courts shall be governed by the rules of practice prescribed for the district courts, and the rule of practice in the assessment of damages in the district court by the clerk is limited to cases where the action is brought upon a penal bond or an instrument of writing for the payment of money only, resting in computation.

But it is claimed that, by the tenth section of the act concerning probate courts and justices of the peace in certain counties (page 119, Sess. Laws of 1864), that no jurors shall be summoned to the terms of the probate courts as is required before the district courts, but that, in all cases, if either party shall demand a jury, a venire shall issue as in cases before justices of the peace.

We cannot think that this section can be construed to authorize the assessment of damages by the clerk or the court in any other cases except when the damages rest in computation as heretofore mentioned. It was obviously the duty of Stevens to demand a jury in a case where the clerk, or the court acting as its own clerk, could not assess the damages by the practice or rules of the common law. Stevens, not having demanded a jury, as he had a right to do, to assess the damages, and the court, without authority by statute or common law, having done so, is clearly error.

The probate court, by the terms of the amendatory act of 3d March, 1863, possessed full common-law jurisdiction. A venire to the sheriff to have a jury to assess the damages of Stevens, according to the practice of the courts of common law, was the true mode of procedure in this case, because the defendant, Jones, could not be taken to have

At the July term, 1866, of the district court, Bruce was defaulted, and, upon a subsequent day of the term, the damages were assessed by a jury and judgment entered against the defendants, without naming either of them, and the word "defendants" being in the plural number.

The first of the errors assigned questions the regularity of the verdict, alleging that it was given in another cause. The verdict set forth in the proceedings of the court, which we must regard as the true verdict, appears to have been given in the cause, and this is sufficient. The clerk has inserted in the transcript what he calls a full copy of the verdict, to which, evidently, the objection of the plaintiff in error is directed. This copy is in no way authenticated. The record gives the verdict and we cannot receive the copy for the purpose of contradicting the record.

It is also assigned for error that the court below had not jurisdiction of the person of Langley. There was no appearance by the defendants in that court, and we must therefore look at the return upon the summons to determine this question. It is difficult to ascertain from this return whether the sheriff served the summons upon both Langley and Bruce or upon either one of them. It is first stated that service was made upon both defendants, and to this are added the words "not found in my county," which seem to contradict what is before stated. An officer, to whom process is directed, is required to state clearly and explicitly the time and manner of executing it, and a return such as this, which leaves the mind in doubt as to what has been done by the officer, should not be received. Assuming, however, as the parties in this cause have assumed in argument, that this return shows service upon Bruce and that Langley was not found, is the judgment of the district court erroneous? It is said that this is to be regarded as a judgment against Bruce alone, but we are unable to assent to this proposition.

The judgment stands against the defendants, and we know of no rule of construction which will allow us to say that the word "defendants" includes but one. This judgment certainly stands against both of the defendants, and a judgment against two, when one only is served with process, is erroneous. Swift et al. v. Green et al., 20 Ill. 173. The weight of authority is against the doctrine laid down in some of the cases cited by defendants in error, that a judgment may be reversed in part and affirmed in part. Arnold et al. v. Sanford, 14 Johns. 417.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

CHENEY v. BARBER.

EVIDENCE — CONTRACT must be proved as laid. Where money was to be paid upon the sale of certain mining property, the plaintiff must show that the property has been sold before he can recover.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

THE action was assumpsit upon the following instrument:

“$600.

Four months after date, for value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay J. E. Barber, or order, six hundred dollars.

October 3d, 1863.

HAZEN CHENEY, Su'ty.”

“In consideration of the above sum, being without interest, we promise and agree that should William S. Rockwell, one of the signers hereto, effect a sale, at the east or elsewhere, of certain mining property on the Bobtail lode, and receive his pay therefor, that we will pay an additional six hundred dollars.

October 3d, 1863.

WILLIAM S. ROCKWELL.

HAZEN CHENEY, Su'ty.”

In the first count of the declaration, it was alleged that the property referred to in the second part of the agreement was sixty-six and two-thirds feet off the east end of claim No. 1, and twenty feet off the west end of claim No. 2, east of Discovery claim on the Bobtail lode, and that Rockwell had made sale of the property and received pay therefor.

In the second count it was alleged that the property referred to in the second part of the agreement was sixty-six and two-thirds feet off the east end of claim No. 1, east of Discovery claim on said Bobtail lode, and that Rockwell had sold it and received pay therefor. There was judgment for the plaintiff below against Cheney, who alone had been served with process.

Messrs. W. S. and L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The appellee declared for two sums of $600 each, one of which was payable if Rockwell should sell certain premises on the Bobtail lode, which are described in the declaration. There is no evidence that these premises were sold. One witness swears that Rockwell had property on the Bobtail lode to sell for several parties, and another testifies to an admission by appellant that some property on the Bobtail lode had been sold, but it does not appear that the premises described in the declaration were sold. The contract should have been proved as laid. The judgment of the district court is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

VARIANCE — ALLEGATION AND PROOF. — A contract must be proved as laid. Thus, where an express contract is declared on, the parties cannot abandon it and resort to an implied contract: Robinson C. M. Co. v. Johnson, 15 Colo. 284.

KINNEAR, Adm'r of STROPE, v. TUCKER et al.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — defective. If evidence, offered by a defendant to disprove the plaintiff's case, is excluded by the court, the bill of exceptions should contain the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff, in order that this court may determine the relevancy of the evidence so excluded.

PRESUMPTION in favor of judgment. It must be shown affirmatively that the district court erred; this court will not presume it.

Error to District Court, Jefferson County.

DEFENDANTS in error sued Strobe in the district court of Jefferson county, and declared specially upon a failure to return certain cattle, and added the common counts. Upon the trial below, Strobe offered in evidence certain orders and receipts for cattle, signed by one or both of the defendants in error. The evidence given on behalf of defendants in error in the court below was not embodied in the bill of exceptions.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. BRIGHT SMITH and GEORGE F. CROOKER, for defendants in error.

HALLETT, C. J. We are asked to reverse this judgment because the district court improperly excluded from the jury certain evidence offered by the defendant in that court. There is nothing in the bill of exceptions, except the evidence, which was offered and rejected.

As all the evidence given upon the trial below is not before us, we are unable to say whether the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions was properly excluded. It must be shown affirmatively that the court below erred; we cannot presume it. Ballance v. Leonard, 37 Ill. 43.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

ANTHONY v. ESTABROOK.

AGENT—what declarations will bind principal. Declarations of an agent are not admissible in evidence against his principal if made after the transaction to which they refer.

Where a horse was hired to go a journey and died on the way, declarations of the driver, who was the agent of the hirer, made after the death of the horse and after the driver had returned from the journey, are not admissible to charge the hirer.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

ACTION on the case to recover the value of a horse.

There was evidence to the effect that appellee kept a livery stable in Denver, and that appellant hired a team from him to be driven to Box Elder, a distance of nineteen miles from Denver, and return. That appellant put William T. Shortridge in charge of the team, who drove it to Living Springs, which was much farther from Denver than Box Elder.

Alexander Davidson, a witness introduced by appellee, testified to declaration made by Shortridge as follows: "He said they were a good team and that he lost one of the horses; that he died on the road side; he said he died this side of Living Springs, as he was returning from Living Springs.

Shortridge made this statement to me, I think, the second day after he went out with the team. It was after he got back. I do not know it was the same day he got back."

On cross-examination the witness stated: "Shortridge told me something about the horse taking sick and bloating up. He said he took all the care of the horse he could."

Duncan Merritt, a witness on behalf of appellee, testified: "I heard conversation between Mr. Shortridge, on his return, and plaintiff. Estabrook asked Shortridge how came the horse to die, and he told him Anthony told him it was a good team and to put them through, and Shortridge said he was drinking and it did not make any difference with him, that Anthony was responsible. Shortridge said he drove that evening to Living Springs. He said he left the horse on the side of the road dead as he started back."

The verdict was for the plaintiff below.

Mr. J. BRIGHT SMITH and Mr. GEORGE F. CROCKER, for appellant.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. It is clear that the declarations of an agent, if introduced for the purpose of binding his principal, must have been made at the time of the transaction to which they relate, and not afterward. Fairlee v. Hastings, 10 Vesey, 123; Corbin v. Adams, 6 Cush. 93; Luby v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 181.

It appears that Shortridge was employed to go a journey for appellant, for which purpose a team was hired by the latter from appellee. After an absence of two days, Shortridge returned with but one of the horses which he had taken away, saying that the missing horse had died on the road, and giving some incidents of the trip. Evidence of these declarations of Shortridge was admitted in the court below for the purpose of charging appellant, and, we think, improperly admitted. The horse died during the journey of Shortridge, and these declarations were not made until after his return, and therefore they were not contemporaneous with the loss of the horse to which they referred. With the death of the horse the liability of the appellant, if any exists, became fixed, and he is not to be charged upon any statements made by Shortridge after that event took place. The rule governing this question, and the principles upon which it rests, are so fully declared in the cases above cited that any discussion of it here would be out of place.

It is objected that the evidence does not support the declaration, inasmuch as it shows a hiring of two horses and a buggy, whereas the declaration speaks of the hiring of one horse only. It is to be observed that the third count of the declaration contains no mention of any hiring whatever, but in that count it is simply alleged that the defendant had the care of a certain other horse, etc. For aught that appears, the evidence was given under the third count, to which we perceive no objection. For the reason first stated, however, the judgment must be reversed, with costs, and the cause will be remanded.

PATON v. THE PEOPLE.

STATUTE INOPERATIVE. The thirteenth section of the act of 1861 (1 Sess. 71), concerning licenses, was never effectual for any purpose.

LICENSE, general law not affected by charter of Black Hawk. The act incorporating the city of Black Hawk, and conferring power upon the authorities of that city to license the sale of spirituous liquors (8 Sess. 238), does not affect the act of 1861 (1 Sess. 69) as amended, which confers like power upon the board of county commissioners.

LICENSES issued by city no defense to prosecution under general law. In an indictment, under the act of 1861 concerning licenses, for selling spirituous liquors without license within the limits of the city of Black Hawk, a license issued under the charter and ordinances of that city cannot be shown in defense.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

THE act of 1861, section 8 (1 Sess. 70), provides that the board of county commissioners may grant licenses to keep saloons, hotels, public houses or groceries upon conditions named, and section 12 defines a grocery to be a place where spirituous or vinous liquors are retailed by less quantities than one quart. Section 2 of the act of 1862 (2 Sess. 78) provides a penalty for carrying on the business named without such license. The act incorporating the city of Black Hawk (3 Sess. 233) contained, among other powers conferred on the city council, the following:

“SECTION 45. To license, restrain, regulate, prohibit and suppress tippling houses, gambling houses, bawdy houses and other disorderly houses, and the selling and giving away of any intoxicating or malt liquors by any person within the city, except by any person duly licensed.”

The thirteenth section of the act of 1861 (1 Sess. 71) was repealed by the act of 1866 (5 Sess. 66), and is as follows:

“SECTION 13. The president and trustees of incorporated towns shall have the exclusive privilege of granting licenses to saloons or groceries within their incorporated limits, and all sums of money which may be received for licenses granted as aforesaid, shall be paid into the county treasury.”

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL and Mr. E. T. WELLS, for appellant.

Mr. HUGH BUTLER, for the people.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE dissented.

HALLETT, C. J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Gilpin county for selling spirituous liquors in quantities of less than one quart without license, in violation of the act of 1861 concerning licenses, as amended by the acts of 1862 and 1866. It appears that the selling occurred in the city of Black Hawk, and, upon the trial in the court below, the matters charged in the indictment being admitted, the appellant sought to defend by showing that he held license to vend spirituous liquors, issued by the corporate authorities of that city. This evidence was rejected, and the ruling of the court is assigned for error.

We agree with the counsel for both parties, that the thirteenth section of the act of 1861 was never effectual for any purpose in this territory. Incorporated towns, having presidents and trustees, were never known to our laws, and that section was always insignificant. A license is defined to be a right given by some competent authority to do an act, which, without such authority, would be illegal, and to license one to do an act is simply to remove the legal restraint operating upon him respecting that act. By the act of 1861, the citizens of Gilpin county were placed under legal restraint in the matter of selling intoxicating liquors from which they could relieve themselves by obtaining license to sell from the board of commissioners of that county. This inhibition rested upon the citizens of Black Hawk equally with other citizens of the county. By the act of 1864, incorporating the city of Black Hawk, the corporate authorities of that city were invested with power to license, restrain, regulate, prohibit and suppress the selling and giving away of intoxicating and malt liquors within the city. The city authorities were not required to execute this power in any particular manner, or at all. They could suppress the sale of intoxicating drinks, or impose hard terms, or ignore the subject and leave the traffic open to all. The corporation was invested with discretionary power over the subject, and we are told that this is not consistent with the provisions of the act of 1861. We cannot adopt this view. It is difficult to believe that the legislative assembly, by conferring upon the city of Black Hawk power which might or might not be exerted by that city, intended to revoke the positive provisions of the act of 1861. If the act incorporating the city of Black Hawk displaced the act of 1861 as to that city, and the corporation should decline to exert its power, then the vending of intoxicating liquors would be open to all the turbulent and lawless not less than the order-loving, well-intentioned citizen. Again, the power to license is not declared to be exclusively vested in the city, and no reason is perceived why the restraint operating upon the citizen may not be removable in the discretion of two distinct bodies. If one can be restrained from selling intoxicating liquors until he shall obtain permission from the corporation of Black Hawk, he certainly may be additionally required to obtain permission from the county commissioners of Gilpin county. In another, and, perhaps, a broader view of this subject, we observe that the power to license the vending of merchandise is exercised mainly for the purpose of raising revenue. It is true that the granting of liquor licenses is made discretionary, doubtless with a view to enable the authorities to keep the traffic from bad hands, but, nevertheless, the payment of money is only required for revenue purposes. The granting license upon payment of a sum of money is one method of collecting taxes. License Tax Cases, 5 Wal. (U. S.) 463.

The act of 1861 enabled the county of Gilpin to collect certain revenue by licensing the sale of intoxicating drinks. By and by, in 1864, a new corporation was created within the county of Gilpin and called Black Hawk, to the existence of which revenue was necessary, and here again the power to license was conferred. The needs of the county of Gilpin were not diminished by erecting the city of Black Hawk, and we do not discover that the legislature intended to deprive the county of any of its revenue. The cases of Sloan v. The State, 8 Blackf. 361, and Harrison v. The State, 9 Mis. 526, support these views. The case of Woodward v. Turnbull, 3 Scam. 1, is in conflict with those last named, but Gardner v. The People, 20 Ill. 430, is distinguishable from the case under consideration. In that case, the city of Monmouth had not exercised the licensing power, and it was decided that the accused was amenable to the general law.

The court say, that the act incorporating the city of Monmouth gives the city the exclusive right to license the sale of spirituous liquors. Now, if the city had exclusive power to license the sale of spirituous liquors within the city, how could the county have any authority in the premises? If the city alone had power to license, it seems to us that the county could not, nor could any other body take cognizance of the subject. Yet the court thought that the accused was amenable to the general law. Again, the court say that if the city authorities should grant license, the holder would be protected from the penalty of the general law. But why? If the general law was operative within the city of Monmouth, would its operation be suspended by the action of the city authorities giving license pursuant to the charter and ordinances? It seems to us that the act of the city authorities could in no way affect the operation of the general law, and that law, if enforceable at all within the city, should be enforced without regard to the action of the city authorities. But we agree with that court that the general law was not repealed by the city charter, and the judgment was reversed upon another ground.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

LIQUOR LAWS — LICENSE. — Where the legislature confers exclusive authority on a municipality to issue licenses to sell liquor, the license is a clear defense to any prosecution for selling it: Hertzer v. People, 4 Colo. 47; Heinssen v. State, 14 Colo. 243. These cases are clearly distinguishable from the principal case, as there the authority was not exclusive.

APPEAL — not based upon bill of exceptions. An appeal may be prosecuted without bill of exceptions; imperfections in the latter cannot be alleged in support of a motion to dismiss.

APPEAL BOND — approval in vacation. An appeal bond cannot be approved in vacation without an order of court, and the approval of the clerk of the district court, given in vacation without such order, is inoperative.

APPEAL BOND — approval not amendable. The omission to procure the bond to be approved according to law cannot be supplied by amendment.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

UPON motion to dismiss the appeal,

Mr. L. B. FRANOE, in support of the motion.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, contra.

PER CURIAM. Appellees move to dismiss this appeal because of alleged imperfections in the bill of exceptions, and because the appeal bond was approved by the clerk of the court below in vacation, there being no order of that court authorizing such approval. Inasmuch as appellants were entitled to prosecute an appeal from the judgment of the district court, whether there was any exception to any of the proceedings in that court or not, we cannot, upon this motion, consider the first objection.

As to the appeal bond, we think that there should be an order of the district court directing the clerk to approve the bond. The statute (3 Sess. 116) declares that the clerk may approve the bond, provided the order allowing the appeal shall so direct. In this case, the order allowing the appeal contains no such direction, and the act of the clerk approving the bond, in the absence of such provision, is inoperative. Nor can appellants be allowed to file a new bond in this court under that provision of the statute which authorizes defective appeal bonds to be amended in the discretion of the court. This appeal bond is not defective, but appellants failed to obtain the approval of the bond by the district court as the law directs, and for this reason the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ORMAN et al. v. KEITH et al.

PRACTICE — when to file bill of exceptions. A bill of exceptions, filed in vacation, there being no order of court to authorize it, is no part of the record.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for Orman and Jewett, presented a transcript of the record and moved that the writ of error be made a supersedeas. The errors assigned referred to the evidence given at the trial below, and this evidence was contained in a bill of exceptions filed in vacation. There was no order of court authorizing the bill to be filed in vacation pursuant to the statute. 4 Sess. 92.

Per CURIAM. We think that a bill of exceptions should be filed in term time unless there is an order of court allowing it to be filed in vacation. In this case there was no such order and no bill of exceptions filed in term time, and therefore we cannot notice the errors assigned. The motion for supersedeas is denied. Motion denied.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—TIME FOR FILING.—A bill of exceptions cannot be filed after the term has passed, in the absence of an order for that purpose: Puckard v. Snellings, 3 Colo. 113.

POLLOCK et al. v. THE PEOPLE.

APPEAL—in quo warranto proceeding. Under the act of 1861 concerning proceedings in cases of quo warranto (1 Sess. 351), an appeal lies in all cases from the judgment of the district court to this court, upon such terms as the district court shall prescribe.

The district court may, in its discretion, allow an appeal without prescribing terms.

But if terms are prescribed, they must be such as relate to the subject-matter of the controversy.

APPEAL BOND without conditions. To require a bond to be given, without prescribing conditions to the bond, is ineffectual, and the case is to be regarded as an appeal allowed without terms.

In such case failure to execute a bond, as required by the order of the district court, cannot be alleged as ground for dismissing the appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

UPON motion to dismiss the appeals.

This was an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, against appellants for having usurped and intruded into the corporate offices of the city of Central. Separate appeals were prayed by the defendants below, and the appeals were allowed upon the defendants giving bonds in sums that were specified, but nothing was prescribed as to the conditions of such bonds.

Mr. WILLARD TELLER, in support of the motion.

Mr. E. WAKELEY and Mr. C. C. POST, contra.

HALLETT, C. J. The appellees move to dismiss this appeal because it was irregularly taken, not being allowed by law, and, if properly allowed, that appellants have not taken the necessary steps to perfect it. As to both points, it will be necessary to consider the first clause of the fifth section of the act concerning proceedings in cases of quo warranto (Stat. 1861, p. 352) which reads as follows:

"Appeals may be taken from the decision of the district court upon such terms as the said district court shall prescribe."

It is said, that if this clause be read in connection with the forty-first section of the Practice Act (Stat. 1861, p. 285) which provides for appeals where the judgment appealed from amounts to $20, exclusive of costs, or relates to a franchise or freehold, it will be seen that no appeal can be taken from the judgment of the district court respecting the title to an office in a case arising under the act from which the clause is taken, but such appeal can be taken only when the right to a franchise is involved.

Whether these sections ought or ought not to be construed together as acts in pari materia, seems to us not material, for, if we so construe them, we fail to deduce from them the conclusion that the clause of section 5, before recited, is restricted to cases respecting the right to a franchise. By section 41 of the practice act, an appeal is given from the judgment of the district court when the same relates to a franchise, and, therefore, there was an appeal in such cases, before the enactment of the act, concerning proceedings in cases of quo warranto; and if the clause, before recited, of section 5 of that act had never been incorporated therein, an appeal might, nevertheless, have been prosecuted from such judgments under the provisions of section 41 of the practice act. We are not at liberty to say that the clause of section 5, which we have given above, serves no purpose; that those are idle words adopted by the legislative assembly without any intention to alter or modify the law as it stood at the time of that enactment. It is presumable that the legislative assembly intended to enlarge the remedy by giving an appeal where none was given before.

Furthermore, this act concerning proceedings in cases of quo warranto relates to a special remedy applicable to certain classes of cases, and without any words of limitation, the legislative assembly have said that appeals may be taken from decisions of the district court under the act. The language of the clause giving the appeal is general, and we cannot apply it to one class of cases mentioned in the act and exclude another class of those cases from its operation. This construction appears to have been adopted without objection in the State of Illinois from whence we obtained this statute. It is the practice in that State to prosecute appeals in cases of this kind. Dickson v. The People, 17 Ill. 191; The People v. Ridgley et al., 21 id. 65; Donnelly v. The People, 11 id. 552.

As to the steps taken by the appellants to bring this cause into this court, we doubt whether we can consider any irregularity relating thereto. We have seen that the district court was empowered to prescribe the terms upon which the appeal should be taken. Undoubtedly the district court had the power to allow the appeal without the giving of a bond, the payment of costs, or the doing any other act by the appellants usually done in cases of this kind. The district court was authorized to prescribe the terms upon which the appeal should be taken, in other words, to declare whether any and what acts should be performed by the appellants before they should be permitted to bring the record into this court. It cannot be doubted that the terms thus to be prescribed are for the protection of the party who obtains the judgment from which the appeal is prosecuted. The district court cannot prescribe the doing of some act altogether disconnected from the suit as the condition upon which the appeal shall be allowed, but the terms given must relate to the subject-matter of the controversy. Now, in this case, the appellants prayed an appeal which was allowed upon the giving of bonds by the appellants, but nothing was prescribed by the district court as to the conditions of the bonds so to be given. The appellants were not required to prosecute their appeal effectually and without delay, to pay costs, to abide the judgment of the district court or of this court, or to do any other act before coming into this court. The district court required nothing of them except that they give bonds in certain sums.

Now the giving of bonds without conditions, or with conditions not prescribed by the court, was an ineffectual proceeding, and it is not material whether the appellants did or did not comply with the order of the court. The district court had no power to order the appellants to give bonds subject to no conditions, for, if such bonds would be valid, the appellants could relieve themselves of their obligation only by paying the entire penalties to the people. This cause stands as upon an appeal allowed by the district court without prescribing terms, and, as the act of that court, in allowing the appeal with or without terms, was discretionary, we cannot revise its action.

FREAS v. TOWNSEND.

PRACTION — APPEAL — when prayed for. An appeal from a district court to this court must be prayed for within three days after judgment is rendered.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

UPON motion to dismiss the appeal.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

Per CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment of the district court of Gilpin county, and is now before this court on a motion to quash the appeal, for the reason that the appeal was not prayed for in the court below in the time prescribed by the statute.

The appellee in this court, who was the plaintiff below, brought an action of assumpsit in the district court of Gilpin county against Lorenzo M. Freas. By agreement or stipulation the cause was tried by the court below without a jury; and the court, after hearing the evidence, rendered a judgment against the defendant, and in favor of the plaintiff. This judgment was rendered and entered of record on the 10th day of August, A. D. 1867, and on the same day the defendant, by his counsel, moved for a new trial and filed his reasons therefor. On the 17th day of August, A. D. 1867, this motion was argued and overruled by the court. The appellant then prayed for an appeal which was allowed by the court and the cause on that appeal was brought into this court. The appellee now moves the court to quash the appeal for the reason that it was not prayed for within the time prescribed by law.

The forty-first section of the act of the legislature, passed 1861 (Laws of 1861, page 285), allowing appeals, provides that the appeal be prayed for within three days after the time of rendering the judgment or decree. It is true that on the 10th of August, A. D. 1867, the day the judgment was entered, there was a motion for a new trial, but we think the defendant should at the same time, or within the three days from that time, have prayed for his appeal. There was nothing inconsistent in the two motions. This he did not do. He did not pray for the appeal until after the time allowed by law for such prayer: and the motion is sustained. The appeal is dismissed. Dismissed.

APPEAL, WHEN MUST BE PRAYED FOR. — An appeal prayed from the district court nine days after rendition of judgment was held not in time. A pending motion for vacation of judgment and a new trial does not relieve the party from the statutory requirement of praying an appeal within three days: Dusting v. Nelson, 6 Colo. 40.

SEARS v. ANDREWS et al.

VERDICT IN REPLEVIN — sufficiency. If the jury find the issues for the plaintiff, and assess their damages at $10, probably the verdict would not answer all issues in an action of replevin; but it is sufficient to determine some issues in that action, as, for instance, an issue joined upon plea of property in defendant or a stranger.

PRESUMPTION in support of proceedings of district court — verdict. Where there are no written pleadings, and the record does not disclose the issue tried, the verdict being sufficient as to some issues which may arise in that form of action, the court will presume that it is responsive to the issue which was tried.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

REPLEVIN by appellees against appellant before a justice of peace, and appeal to the district court. In the latter court, the jury returned the following: "We the jury in the above-entitled cause find for plaintiff and assess the damages at $10 (ten dollars)."

The court rendered judgment upon this verdict in favor of the plaintiffs below, for possession of the property, and for the damages and costs.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

Messrs. POST & MORGAN, for appellees.

HALLETT, C. J. The only question presented for our consideration in this case is the sufficiency of the verdict of the jury to sustain the judgment of the district court. The action was brought before a justice of the peace and removed into the district court by appeal. There are no written pleadings or other evidence of the issue tried in the record, and therefore we are unable to ascertain what that issue was. Probably this verdict would not answer all the issues which may arise in an action of replevin, but it seems to us to be responsive to some issues which may arise in that action. For instance, if the issue was upon a plea of property in the defendant or in a stranger, this verdict, though informal, is sufficient to show that the issue was found for the plaintiffs below and that damages for detaining the property were assessed at $10. "If a verdict can be concluded out of the findings to the point in issue, the court shall work and mould it into form according to the real justice of the case." Hawks v. Crofton, 2 Burr, 698. As the issue tried in the court below is not given, we are to presume that it was determined by this verdict, for all presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings. Hunt v. Bennett, 4 Greene (Iowa), 512, cited by appellant's counsel, is not in point, whatever may be said of it in the digests. It is not difficult to find cases in which verdicts less formal than this have been sustained. Jarrard v. Harper, 42 Ill. 457.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

SOPRIS v. TRUAX.

REPLEVIN — wrongful taking — demand and refusal. In replevin it is necessary to show a wrongful taking or detention of the property in controversy, and it is erroneous to instruct the jury that the only matter in dispute is the ownership of the property.

PLEADING IN REPLEVIN — fraud. The rule which requires that fraud be specially pleaded does not apply to the action of replevin.

INSTRUCTIONS — as to facts. Instructions to the jury should be confined to the law of the case, leaving the facts to be determined by the jury.

PRACTICE — motion to restore competency of witness. A motion for leave to file a new bond, in order to obtain the testimony of a surety in the original bond, should be based upon affidavit showing the materiality of the testimony which is to be obtained.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

THE instructions given at the trial, which are referred to in the opinion of the court, are as follows:

"1st. That the only matter in dispute in this case is the ownership of the property in question.

2d. That fraud can never be presumed; that fraud must not only be alleged in the pleadings in specific terms, but it must be proved, and the jury are instructed that there is no allegation of fraud in any of the pleadings that make up the issue to be tried in this case.

5th. That evidence, tending to show that James W. Truax was occasionally in possession of some of the property in dispute, or had used the same at different times, is not sufficient proof of ownership in him, particularly when there is evidence uncontradicted that the property belonged to the plaintiff."

The third instruction asked by the plaintiff in error, and refused by the court, is as follows:

"That unless the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff demanded the property from the defendant, mentioned in the second count of the declaration, they must find for the defendant on said second count."

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an action of replevin, the first count in the declaration being for taking, and the second count for detaining, the property in controversy. Upon the trial in the court below, there was no evidence whatever to show a taking of the property as alleged in the first count, or a detention as alleged in the second count. The evidence was directed to the question of the ownership of the property, and if it should be conceded that the plaintiff below established her title, she was, nevertheless, bound to demand the possession of the property before she commenced suit. Ingalls v. Bulkley, 13 Ill. 315.

The third instruction asked by the plaintiff in error and refused by the court should have been given, and the first instruction given for defendant in error should have been refused. The ownership of the property was not the only matter in dispute upon the trial of the cause. We are at a loss to determine what question of fraud arose upon the trial in the court below, to which the second instruction, given on behalf of the defendant in error, could be applied.

But, if there was such question, it was not correct to say that the pleadings must disclose it. The rule which requires fraud to be specially pleaded does not apply to the action of replevin. The instruction was calculated to mislead the jury and should not have been given.

By the fifth instruction for the plaintiff below, the jury were plainly told that certain evidence was not sufficient to establish a disputed fact, and this was followed by a declaration that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff below, upon the same point, was uncontradicted. It is generally known among members of the legal profession at this day, that the jury are the judges of the weight and sufficiency of testimony, and that the court must allow them to determine the facts in all cases. Nevertheless, we will direct attention to the twenty-eighth (28) section of our practice act, by which courts are confined to the law of the case when instructing juries, and to one authority upon this point. Bond et al. v. The People, 39 Ill. 26.

The defendant below desired to call one of his sureties upon the replevin bond as a witness in the cause, and moved the court for leave to file a new bond with a view to relieve the surety of incompetency because of his liability on the bond. This motion was not supported by affidavit, and therefore the court was not advised as to the materiality of the testimony of the surety, and error cannot be assigned upon the denial of the motion. We do not think it necessary to examine the testimony upon the trial in the court below and the objections thereto, as the judgment must be reversed for error in giving and refusing instructions.

The judgment of the probate court is reversed, with costs, and the case is remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

REPLEVIN—PLEADING FRAUD.—In replevin, fraud need not be specially pleaded: Benesch v. Wagener, 12 Colo. 638.

WORRALL v. HARE.

ABATEMENT plea in attachment cases. The plea traversing the facts set forth in an affidavit for attachment is a plea in abatement.

JUDGMENT upon such plea. Under the act of 1861 (1 Sess. 204) as amended by the act of 1864 (3 Sess. 43), if issue of fact joined upon such plea be found for the plaintiff, the judgment is quod recuperet.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER and Mr. I. N. WILCOXEN, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an attachment suit brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error to recover money due on a promissory note. The plaintiff in error traversed the facts set out in the affidavit upon which the attachment was issued, and upon the issue thus formed a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict for the defendant in error. The jury called to try this issue assessed damages against the plaintiff in error, and the court rendered judgment against him for the amount thereof. Some of the questions raised by the assignment of errors cannot be noticed, for the reason, that no bill of exceptions was taken upon the trial of the cause. It is claimed, however, that upon the trial of the issue joined upon the plea traversing the allegations of the affidavit, the jury improperly assessed damages against the plaintiff in error, and that the district court erred in entering final judgment upon the verdict, and this objection we will consider. The question is to be determined by the character of the plea, upon which issue was joined.

If it is a plea in abatement there was no error in rendering judgment quod recuperet upon the verdict of the jury for the plaintiff below. Myers et al. v. Hunter et al., 20 Ohio, 381.

The act upon which this suit is founded gave to defendants the right to traverse the allegations contained in the attachment affidavit, in the following words :

“That in case any plea in abatement traversing the facts in the affidavit shall be filed, and a trial shall be thereon had, if the issue shall be found for the defendant, the attachment shall be quashed and the property attached shall be released from such attachment and restored to the possession of the defendant, and the garnishees, if any, shall be discharged, but the writ of attachment in cases commenced by attachment, shall, nevertheless, stand as a summons and the cause shall proceed to trial and judgment, as if originally commenced by summons." 1 Sess. Laws, p. 204; 3 id. p. 43.

In another clause of the act, the officer, to whom the writ was directed, was required to serve the writ upon the defendant therein, and it has always been held here and elsewhere, so far as we are informed, that by such service, when made, the defendant was notified of the pendency of the suit, and the court obtained jurisdiction of his person. The writ of attachment, when served upon the defendant and levied upon his property, performed the office of a summons in bringing the defendant into court, and also the especial function of a writ of attachment in securing property for satisfying any judgment that might be obtained in the cause. By the terms of the clause above recited, the effect of the plea traversing the allegations in the affidavit, if sustained upon trial, was to abate the operation of the writ, so far as the property of the defendant and garnishees were affected by it, but it did not affect the writ in its office as a summons.

Whenever the plea was found to be true, the writ was diminished of its authority touching the property of the defendant, but, nevertheless, it was to stand as a summons, and the cause was to proceed to trial and judgment as if commenced by summons. The object and effect of the plea then was to lessen the operation of the writ, in part to abate it, and therefore we think the plea is properly called in the act, a plea in abatement.

In the clause before recited, all after the word "quashed" was added by the amendment of 1864. Of course before that amendment, when the verdict was for the defendant, the writ was quashed and the suit was at an end. As it stood prior to that amendment, the statute was the same upon this point as that of Illinois, and it was held, by the supreme court of that State, that the plea traversing the affidavit was a plea in abatement, and that upon the issue joined thereon the successful plaintiff was entitled to judgment quod recuperet. Boggs v. Bindskoff et al., 23 Ill. 67.

The amendment of 1864 diminished the power of the plea but did not change its character. It belonged to the class known as pleas in abatement prior to that amendment, and it remained in that class notwithstanding the amendment. The case of Leitensdorfer et al. v. Webb, 20 How. 176, is not an authority against the position here assumed. In that case, the statute upon which the proceeding was founded declares that, if the issue upon any material fact in the affidavit be found for the plaintiff, "the cause shall proceed." Now, if upon verdict for the plaintiff, judgment quod recuperet should be entered, the cause would be at an end, and could not, therefore, proceed as the statute requires. Under that statute, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff could only be respondeat ouster, because, if final judgment should be entered, the cause would not then proceed as the statute requires. Our statute is materially different. It contains no provision as to the course to be pursued when the issue upon the verity of the affidavit is found for the plaintiff, and therefore we are left to the common-law rule which subjects a defendant, who fails to maintain his plea in abatement, to a peremptory judgment, without giving him further opportunity to contest the plaintiff's right of action. Nor does it appear that the question now under consideration was before the court in that case. After the trial of the issue arising upon the affidavit in that case, the defendant, without objection, as it seems, from the plaintiff, pleaded in bar to the action, and a new issue was framed upon which a trial was had. The supreme court held, that the proceedings upon this latter trial only were before them for consideration, and in them no error was found.

Since the trial of this cause in the district court, the practice in cases of this kind has been regulated by statute, and therefore this case cannot become a precedent.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.
Affirmed.

CLAYTON v. SMITH.

PRACTICE—error may be assigned on agreed case. In a case heard on an agreed statement of facts, it is not necessary to move for a new trial in the court below :

Or to preserve the statement of facts in the record by bill of exceptions :

Or to except to the judgment of the court below :

CONSTRUCTION of revenue law of 1864. As to contracts made after the law of June 30, 1864 (18 Stat. at Large) was passed, the law will presume that the two and one-half per centum, mentioned in section 103 of that act, is included in the rate specified in the contract, and a carrier of goods for hire cannot recover the tax in addition to the contract price.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. J. BRIGHT SMITH and Mr. GEORGE F. CROOKER, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an agreed case, in which the defendant in error, who was also defendant in the court below, obtained judgment for costs. The record shows the stipulation or agreement of the parties and the judgment of the court, no bill of exceptions being taken by either party. We shall first notice some questions of practice presented by defendant in error. It is contended that error cannot be assigned upon the record, because,

1st. There was no motion for a new trial made in the court below.

2d. The parties' statement of facts is not preserved in the record by bill of exceptions.

3d. There was no exception to the judgment of the court below.

As to the first point, if the act of the district court is to be regarded as the trial of a cause by the court without a jury, we have heretofore decided that error may be assigned upon the judgment of the court in such cases, without a motion for new trial being made. But, in this case, no issue of fact was tried, such trial being rendered unnecessary by the agreement of the parties. The facts were not in dispute, but the parties were unable to agree as to the law arising upon the facts, and, therefore, they called upon the district court to assist them. In respect to the functions of the court, called into exercise by these parties, it was like the case of a demurrer to pleading, in which the demurrant admits the facts alleged against him, and demands the judgment of the court upon them, or, like a special verdict, in which the facts are stated, and the finding is for the plaintiff or defendant, according to the law arising upon those facts. We move for a new trial only when issues of fact have been determined, and, as there was no such issue in this case, such motion would have been irregular. As to the second and third points, the practice adopted in this case has been sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States, and we shall not look for other authority.

In the case of Stimpson v. Baltimore & Susquehanna R. R. Co., 10 How. 345, the question was, "whether, as this case is not brought up either upon express or specific exceptions to the rulings of the circuit court, nor upon any decision of that court, upon a special verdict found by the jury, but comes before us upon an agreed statement between the parties, this court can, in this form, take cognizance thereof?"

And this was resolved in the affirmative. In Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. 429, the practice respecting bills of exception, special verdicts and agreed cases, is elaborately discussed, and the practice pursued in the case at bar is fully approved. There are a great many cases in the reports of the supreme court in which this practice is recognized and approved, of which Munford v. Wardell, 6 Wal. 425, is the latest; and we regard the practice as settled in all the courts established by the federal government. The practice in this court should conform to the practice in the supreme court of the United States, as far as practicable, inasmuch as our proceedings may be reviewed in that court. The objections raised by defendant in error cannot be sustained, and, therefore, we proceed to examine the judgment of the court below.

By section 103 of an act to provide means for the support of the government, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864, congress levied a tax of two and one-half per centum upon the gross receipts of persons and corporations engaged in transporting passengers and property for hire, and added to the section the following: "Provided, that all such persons, companies and corporations shall have the right to add the duty or tax imposed hereby to their rates of fare, whenever their liability thereto may commence, any limitations which may exist by law or by agreement with any person or company, which may have paid, or be liable to pay, such fare, to the contrary notwithstanding."

In December, 1864, defendant in error delivered to plaintiff in error certain freight, at nine cents per pound; afterward he was taxed on receipt of the freight money the sum of $482.67 which tax he paid to the government.

The question is, whether, under the act above mentioned, defendant in error may add the amount of the tax paid by him to the contract price of nine cents per pound.

The doubt arises upon the proper construction of the clause given above; and we think it may be removed by careful consideration of the language of the law. In the first place it is to be observed, that the parties taxed have the right to add the duty or tax to their rates of fare; by which we understand that the carriers were authorized to increase their ordinary and customary charges for carrying by so much as would be necessary to meet this tax upon the gross amount received. This is not authority to collect two and one-half per centum upon the amount received in an isolated case, but rather an authority to advance the rates of fare, so that the aggregate amount received for all services performed by the parties as carriers shall be two and one-half per centum larger than before the passage of the act. It is to be observed, also, that this right of the carrier to re-imburse the tax paid from the pocket of his employer is to be exercised by adding to his rates of fare. He cannot collect the two and one-half per centum from his employer as a tax, but he may increase his rates of fare, so that the fare shall include the two and one-half per centum. Upon reading further we find that the carriers may add the tax to their rates of fare, "Whenever their liability thereto may commence, any limitations which may exist by law or by agreement," etc.

The tax is upon the gross receipts of the parties, from which it seems that they are not liable to the tax until the money actually comes into their hands. If, however, we say that the act authorizes carriers to add the tax to their rates of fare when their liability commences, and that liability does not arise until the fare has been paid, we shall involve ourselves in an irrational attempt to increase the fare after it has been extinguished by payment. In the nature of things the right to increase the fare by the amount of the tax must precede the payment of the fare. We conclude, therefore, that the words "whenever their liability thereto may commence" refer not to the receipt of the money by the carrier, but to some other time. At the time the act was passed, the price to be charged by many carriers for transporting passengers and property was regulated by law, while many others had entered into contracts which were yet unfulfilled. It was to these cases that the clause under consideration was intended to apply. The explanatory language with which the clause concludes is not susceptible of a different construction.

In construing contracts, we consider the law operative at the time of making the contract, upon the presumption that the parties themselves looked to that law as their rule of conduct. When, as in this case, the contract was made after the passage of the law, the presumption is that the parties had knowledge of the law, and availed themselves of its provisions. Now, the first part of the clause we are considering authorizes the carrier to add the tax to his rates of fare, and this must be done, if done at all, before the fare is fixed by the contract. As to contracts made before the enactment, this would not be true, because the carrier, not having been apprised of the tax at the time of making the contract, had no opportunity to protect himself by increasing his rates.

But, in contracts made subsequently to the enactment, the presumption is, that the carrier has advanced his rates so as to meet the tax. Indeed, he needed not the authority of an act of congress to enable him to increase his rates, except the rates were prescribed by law or limited by contract at the date of the act. After the carrier was informed of the tax, if his rates of fare were to be regulated by himself, he could, without the aid of this law, provide against the duty imposed upon him, and, if human experience is to be trusted, he needed no suggestion upon that point.

Therefore, as to voluntary agreements, it will be seen that the clause we are considering is significant only when applied to agreements existing at the date of the act.

In this case the contract was made in December, 1864, several months after the act of congress took effect. The law presumes that the defendant in error established his price for carrying the goods of the plaintiff in error with a view to the payment of the tax levied by congress, and therefore he cannot be permitted to collect the amount of the tax in addition to his charge of nine cents per pound. If he did not fix his rates high enough to cover the tax, he had the power to do so, and cannot complain of the omission.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, with costs, and judgment will be entered in this court in favor of the plaintiff in error and against the defendant in error for the sum of $482.67.

Assumpsit by defendant in error against plaintiff in error.

EYSTER, J. Quite a number of errors are assigned by the plaintiff in error. We do not wish to review the whole of them. It is enough to say, that the declaration in the case was in the Spanish language. It is not to be tolerated in this country, that judicial proceedings should be in any other than the adopted language of the nation. To argue this proposition would be useless, and for this reason, the judgment of the court below is reversed.

We cannot after an examination send this cause to the probate court for a new trial. The whole record and proceedings are so utterly at variance with the known rules of practice, that we feel compelled to order, that the entire proceeding be dismissed from the docket of the probate judge, and judgment will be so entered. Reversed.

ACT REPEALED. The act of 1864 (3 Sess. 102), relating to mechanic's liens, was repealed by the act of 1867 (6 Sess. 75) upon the same subject.

EFFECT of repeal of mechanic's lien law. Liens existing under the act of 1864 fell when that act was repealed, unless within the saving clause of the 28th section of the act of 1867.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — mechanic's lien. Liens established by the act of 1864 are not protected from legislative interference by the clause of the constitution of the United States which relates to the obligation of contracts.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

SECTION 28 of the act of 1867 (6 Sess. 81) is as follows:

"That 'An act creating a lien in favor of mechanics and others,' approved March 11, 1864, and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent with, or in conflict with, this act, be and the same are hereby repealed ; but nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to affect any proceeding now pending in any of the courts of this territory under the provisions of the act hereby repealed."

This act was approved January 11, 1867.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. A. MARSH, for defendants in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The plaintiffs in error seek to establish a mechanic's lien, upon certain premises of the defendant Grimes, under the act of 1864. That act was repealed by the act of 1867, and the principal question presented in this record is, concerning the effect of such repeal upon liens founded upon the act first mentioned. In the first place, it is contended that the legislative assembly, in repealing the act of 1864, did not intend to divest liens which arose under that act, upon the ground that the repealing act is substantially the same as the original act. It is true that many of the provisions of the first act are incorporated in the act of 1867, but these provisions relate mainly to proceedings for enforcing the lien, and not to the lien itself. The opening section of the two acts in which the lien is given differs in language and in substance. The act of 1864 prescribes the quantity of land to be affected by the lien, while the act of 1867 fixes no limit ; the former act gives a lien to sub-contractors, and requires a statement of the amount due, together with a description of the property, to be filed with the recorder of the county, points upon which the later act is silent. The former act contains no reference to lode mining claims, upon which a lien is given by the act of 1867. Perhaps other differences might be pointed out, but we think it is sufficient to show that there are substantial differences. When a law is re-enacted in the same language, or in language which is substantially the same, the new act taking effect simultaneously with the repeal of the old, we may well enough say that the law, though displaced and instantly replaced, has suffered no interruption. And this is what we understand the supreme court to say in Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450. But when the legislative assembly, upon a subject which has previously received its attention, frames a new law identical with the first in some features, but differing from it widely in others, and expressly repeals the first act, it would be an extraordinary exercise of judicial power to declare the first act in force notwithstanding such repeal. It is not sufficient that the repealed and repealing acts should have points of identity, but the latter must be substantially the same as the former. The repealing section of the act of 1867 contained a clause, "That nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to affect any proceeding now pending in any of the courts of this territory, under the provisions of the act hereby repealed." With this language before us, we are certainly at liberty to believe that the legislative assembly thought it necessary to protect parties, who had instituted proceedings under the act of 1864, from the effect of the repeal of that act. Now this is not at all consistent with the notion that the legislature designed that the act should remain in force as to all cases which arose under it, for "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." If a saving clause was necessary to protect those who had commenced proceedings under the act of 1864 from the effect of the repeal, why was it not necessary as to those who had not commenced such proceedings? We cannot answer this question in any way that will support the theory of the plaintiffs in error, that the legislature intended to continue the act as to cases which arose under it. As this is a question of intent, we may certainly look to the language of the act for the purpose of ascertaining the intention, and we think no one can read the twenty-eighth section of the act of 1867 without being convinced that the legislative assembly intended to repeal the act of 1864 to all intents and purposes, except as to cases in which proceedings to enforce the lien were pending in some court. It is also urged that liens founded upon the act of 1864 are contracts protected from hostile legislation by the constitution of the United States, and therefore the lien in this case was not in any way affected by the repeal of that act. It was said in Bronson v. Kinzie: "It is difficult, perhaps, to draw a line that would be applicable in all cases between legitimate alterations of the remedy and provisions which, in the form of remedy, impair the right;" and we have appreciated this difficulty in our efforts to arrive at a correct conclusion in this case. It is, indeed, "manifest that the obligation of a contract and the rights of a party under it may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether, or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing." Bearing in mind that "whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the State, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract," we proceed to inquire whether the act of 1864 gave a remedy, of which the legislative assembly could deprive the plaintiffs in error without impairing the obligation of the contract. In the first place, it is noticeable that the act does not establish contracts between parties, but gives a remedy upon contracts made without its aid. Its first words are: "Any person to whom a debt is due for labor performed or material furnished and actually used in the erection, construction, alteration or repair of any house, mill, building or structure." Now a debt cannot be due except upon a contract, express or implied, and, therefore, the act assumes the existence of a contract, but does not create it. Furthermore, the common law gives an action to recover the value of labor and material furnished, and, therefore, in every case of lien under the statute there was a perfect contract and a common-law remedy to enforce it independent of the statute. We are, then, authorized to say that the act of 1864 gave a new and additional remedy in a familiar class of cases. If we contrast this new remedy with the pre-existing common-law remedy, we shall find that the debtor was equally bound to pay his creditor under both of them ; in other words, the statute did not increase or diminish the obligation to pay previously resting upon the debtor. The statute enabled the creditor to appropriate the land upon which he labored, and placed his materials, together with the structure which he erected, to the payment of his debt, but it did not add to the legal liability of the debtor arising from the contract to pay his creditor. Both before and after the passage of the act, the common law gave to the creditor the right to resort to the property of the debtor for the purpose of satisfying his demand, so that, in this respect, the new remedy was not different from the old. But there was one, and but one, essential difference between the two remedies. Under the statute, a lien upon the property benefited by the labor and materials of the creditor arose contemporaneously with the contract, preventing alienation by the debtor to the prejudice of the creditor, and giving to the creditor a preference over all other creditors of the debtor who should subsequently acquire liens upon that property, while, by the law as it existed before the statute, no such lien was established until judgment was obtained. Now it is plain that the statute was important to the lien creditor only in case of a contest with the grantees or creditors of the debtor, and that it did not essentially change the relations between the debtor and creditor. The statute gave to the lien creditor a preference over the grantees and creditors of the debtor who had not, at the date of the contract, acquired a lien upon the property, but it did not subject the property of the debtor to the payment of the lien creditor's demand in any degree or manner more advantageous to the creditor than the general law. The statute did no more than prescribe a rule of priority and preference among creditors and incumbrancers, which was different from that given by the general law. Now we understand that legislative interference among the creditors and grantees of a debtor, which has the effect to postpone one for the benefit of another, is not prohibited by the constitution. It was said in Jackson v.

Lamphire, 3 Pet. 290, and repeated with approbation in McCracken v. Heyward, 2 How. 613: "It is within the undoubted power of State legislatures to pass recording acts by which the elder grantee shall be postponed to a younger, if the prior deed is not recorded within the limited time, and the power is the same whether the deed is dated before or after the passage of the recording act; though the effect of such a law is to render the prior deed fraudulent and void as against a subsequent purchaser, it is not a law impairing the obligation of contracts." The act of 1864 stands upon a similar principle. It postponed creditors and grantees of the debtor to the mechanic and material man, but it did not touch the obligations of the contract. In a struggle between creditors and grantees it might be decisive of the contest, but it did not affect the relation of debtor and creditor.

The counsel for plaintiffs in error has, with much industry and ability, drawn from the decisions of the supreme court many passages which appear to sustain his views. It must not be forgotten, however, that the language of each case was spoken with reference to the points before the court. We find, in the reports of that court, no case like the one under consideration. In Bronson v. Kinzie, no question arose between contesting claimants, and the law imposed new conditions and restrictions upon the sale of the mortgaged property for the benefit of the mortgagor. So, in McCracken v. Heyward, 2 How. 608, new conditions and restrictions were prescribed respecting the sale of property under judgments at law for the benefit of the debtor. In the case at bar, as we have seen, the act of 1864 established a preference between creditors and grantees, but did not affect the debtor. In Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, the statute alone gave the right and the remedy, and it was declared to be within the constitutional provision. If subject to repeal, the creditor's demand would have fallen with the statute, and nothing would have been left to him. In the case at bar, it was only the creditor's preference over other creditors and grantees of his debtor which rested upon the statute, and that, as we have seen, was within legislative control. As the act of 1864 established a rule respecting the administration and distribution of a debtor's property, we think it was not secured to the plaintiff in error by any constitutional provision. After it was repealed, a substantial remedy against the debtor Grimes, according to the course of justice as it existed at the time the contract was made, was left to the plaintiffs in error, and this was sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement. Cooley's Limitations, 286; Stocking v. Hunt, 3 Denio, 274; Conkey v. Hart, 14 N. Y. 22. The plaintiffs in error also aver that their lien has been restored by an act passed in the year 1868. It is not necessary to consider the effect of this restoring act, for the reason that it was not passed until long after these proceedings were commenced. At the time when this petition was filed, the act upon which it was founded was inoperative, and, therefore, the petition was properly dismissed. The decree of the district court is affirmed with costs.

MECHANICS' LIENS FALL WITH REPEAL of the statute upon which they are founded: Parrott v. Tucker Lumber Co. 2 Colo. 473.

CRANDALL v. STERLING GOLD MINING Co.

JUDICIAL NOTICE — laws of Kansas Territory. If the laws of the late territory of Kansas, relating to the descent of real estate, were at any time in force in this territory, they are to be judicially noticed, and need not be proved at the trial.

KANSAS TERRITORY, laws of, relating to descent of real estate. In November, 1860, there were three statutes in Kansas relating to the descent of real estate. By the first, the widow had one-half the real estate of her deceased husband, the other half going to the children of the marriage and of the husband. By the second, she had one-half in value of the realty to be set apart to her under the direction of the court. By the third, she was endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seized, of an estate of inheritance during coverture. She was required to elect between these acts within six months after the death of her husband.

ELECTION — effect of widow's failure to make. In ejectment by a widow claiming as heir to her deceased husband's estate, under the first of the acts mentioned, it did not appear that she had declared her election to take under that statute within the time prescribed. Held, that she could not recover.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The plaintiff alleges that her husband, in his life-time, was seized of an interest in a claim on the Bobtail Lode, in Gilpin county, to one-half of which she became entitled upon his death, which occurred in the month of November, 1860. She avers that, in November, 1860, the premises in controversy were within the limits of the late territory of Kansas, and that, by a law of that territory, upon the death of her husband she became entitled to the estate, which she now seeks to recover. Upon the trial in the court below, no evidence was offered to show that Kansas territory included within its boundaries the district of country now known as the county of Gilpin, and probably the district court was required to take judicial notice of that fact, if it exists. We shall not consider this interesting question, nor shall we consider another question of greater interest which relates to the force and effect of the laws of Kansas territory in a case of this kind. We shall pass these and other questions presented in this record, and place our decision upon ground which is entirely satisfactory to us.

Assuming, argumenti gratia, that the district of country now known as the county of Gilpin was, at the death of plaintiff's husband in November, 1860, in the territory of Kansas, and that the law of descent of that territory is to be applied to this case, we propose to inquire whether, by that law, the plaintiff is invested with any estate in the premises in controversy. Upon the trial in the court below, the plaintiff gave in evidence the law of Kansas territory, approved February 7, 1859, upon which she relies; another act, entitled "An act relating to dower," approved February 27, 1860, affecting that upon which the plaintiff relies, was not given in evidence, and, therefore, we must first ascertain whether we can consider the act of 1860 in connection with the former law. Upon this point it is to be observed that these laws are not foreign to our territory in the sense in which the laws of one State or territory are said to be foreign to every other State and territory. We say that laws are foreign when they emanate from a jurisdiction territorially distinct and separate from our own. As to the premises in controversy, the jurisdiction of the territory of Kansas was coincident with our own, but precedent in the order of time. If the plaintiff had sought her remedy immediately after the alleged devolution of this estate, the forum in which she would have appeared and the law governing the case were provided by the territory of Kansas, and, in that event, no proof of the law would have been required. Since then the forum has been changed, but, upon the theory of the plaintiff, the law remains the same. We are told that the law of descent of Kansas territory is to be applied to all cases that arose within her boundaries while she held dominion. If so, it is to be as fully and as generally applied to such cases as is our own law to cases arising within our territory since the organization thereof, and the first is as much a part of our general law as the last. With respect to the point under consideration, we may say that these Kansas laws, if effectual as claimed by the plaintiff, stand upon the same footing as those acts of our own assembly, which have been repealed, if rights have accrued under them, whenever those rights are questioned, they are the subject of judicial cognizance in the same manner as if still in force. The case of United States v. Turner et al., 11 How. 663, is instructive upon this point. In the district court of Louisiana a question arose concerning the validity of an instrument under the laws of Spain, in force in the province of Louisiana before the purchase, and counsel moved for an issue upon the points to be tried by a jury. This motion was denied, and the ruling was sanctioned by the supreme court in language which, with a change of names, may be applied to the point we are considering.

“The Spanish laws which formerly prevailed in Louisiana, and upon which the titles of land in that State depend, must be judicially noticed and expounded by the court like the laws affecting titles to real property in any other State. They are questions of law and not questions of fact, and are always so regarded and treated in the courts of Louisiana.”

The case of Henthorn v. Doe, 1 Blackf. 160, is equally to the point. There laws of Virginia, affecting title to real property in Indiana, were judicially recognized by the supreme court of the latter State in a decision which is very convincing upon this point. Upon reason and authority, therefore, we say, that if the law of descent of Kansas territory is to be applied to this case, it lies within the range of judicial information and need not be established by proof, and the act of 1860 is as fully known to us in a legal sense as that which was given in evidence upon the trial in the court below.

The second section of the act of 1860 mentions two acts which, together with the act of 1860, appear to have been in force at the time of the death of plaintiff's husband in November of that year. By the act under which plaintiff claims, which was the eldest of the three, a widow took one-half the real estate of her deceased husband, and the children of the marriage and of the husband took the remaining half. It seems that, under this act, partition of the property among the beneficiaries was not contemplated. Laws Kansas Ter. 1859, p. 565. By the second act the widow became the owner in fee of one-half in value of the realty, to be set apart to her under the direction of the court. Laws Kansas Ter. 1859, p. 381. By the third act, which we have referred to as the act of 1860, the widow was “endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband or any other person to his use was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage to which she shall not have relinquished her right of dower, in the manner prescribed by law, to hold and enjoy during her natural life." Laws Kansas Ter. 1860, p. 110.

These several distinct and widely different estates were offered to widows by the laws of Kansas territory, but it was necessary that she should elect between them. If the statute was silent as to election there could be little doubt as to the intention of the law, for obviously the widow could not be allowed to hold under all these acts and thus absorb the estate, leaving nothing for the children. But the statute was not silent upon this point. In the second section of the act of 1860, it was enacted as follows:

"Every widow, within six months from the death of her husband, may, as she may prefer, use for her benefit either the provisions of this act or those of an act entitled, 'An act concerning descent and distributions.' Approved February 8, 1859, or an act entitled, 'An act to protect the rights of married women, and in relation to the liabilities incident to the married contract relation.' Approved February 7, 1859."

We learn from this that the widow could have the benefit of but one of the acts, making provision for her out of the estate of her deceased husband, and that six months were allowed her to determine which of the several acts she would invoke. Under these statutes upon the death of a husband intestate nothing could be done toward vesting his estate in the heirs until the widow should choose between the several laws designed for her use. The widow had only an inchoate right prior to election, for until then the law, ignorant whether she would have a dower estate or an estate in fee, could not operate in her behalf. In justice to the children of the marriage and of the deceased husband the widow ought to have been and was required to make her election at an early day. Moved by such considerations doubtless the legislature of Kansas territory declared that the widow should elect between the several acts, securing to her an interest in her husband's estate within the six months succeeding his death, and this wise limitation is to be enforced for the repose of estates and because it is the legislative will.

Under statutes and at the common law it has often been decided that a widow failing to elect between dower and a devise shall be held to have accepted the devise. Pratt v. Felton, 4 Cush. 175.

But this is upon the ground that a will is effectual unless expressly renounced. It needs no invocation to awaken its transmitting power, but bestows its gift unasked, unless the beneficiary expressly decline it. Not so however here, for the statute of 1860 requires that the widow shall be active in declaring her preference. If we say that in case of non-election she shall have an estate under one of the acts to which we have referred, how shall we choose between the several statutes? We are unable to do it. No one of these statutes could become efficient until its aid was invoked.

If the plaintiff here passively allowed the six months succeeding her husband's death to pass without manifesting by word or act her desire to hold under either one of these acts, she must suffer the loss resulting from her laches. We find no evidence in the record showing that the plaintiff, within the time prescribed by the act of 1860, elected to take the estate she now claims under the act of February 7, 1859. Perhaps the bringing of a suit would show an election, but if so, this suit was not brought until 1866, long after the law, weary of the plaintiff's delay, had turned to other representatives of her deceased husband.

In the absence of evidence upon this point, we think the judgment of the district court was correctly given for the defendant.

The judgment of the district court affirmed, with costs.

MALONEY v. GRIMES.

ATTACHMENT—distributing proceeds of attached property among creditors.

The twenty-sixth section of the attachment act provides for pro rata distribution of the proceeds of attached property among creditors who have sued out writs returnable, and returned to the same term of court.

Where several creditors attached the same property, under writs returnable to different terms of court, the rule of precedence, as modified by statute, requires that they should be classified with reference to the terms of court to which their writs are returnable, and gives preference to the several classes according to priority of service.

If property is attached in several contemporaneous proceedings, whether commenced to the same term or to different terms, and whether the property be sold under process issued in one or all of the suits, the proceeds of the property should be distributed among the several creditors according to the foregoing rules.

SALE OF ATTACHED PROPERTY — effect of, upon contemporaneous liens. Where several attachment writs were commenced to different terms of court, and all the suits were levied upon the same property, and all the suits were pending at the same time, and the property was sold under judgments obtained in the suits first commenced: Held, that all the creditors were entitled to share in the proceeds of the sale, and the liens of the several attachments upon the attached property were divested by the sale.

SALE OF PROPERTY upon redemption by judgment creditor does not inure to the benefit of other creditors. An attaching creditor, having obtained judgment redeemed from a sale made under a judgment obtained in another attachment suit, and caused the premises to be re-sold pursuant to sections 14 and 15, chapter 48, Revised Statutes: Held, that other creditors, who had commenced suit by attachment to the same term with the redeeming creditor, were not entitled to share in the proceeds of such re-sale.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

An agreed case was submitted to the district court as follows:

“Previous to April term, A. D. 1867, of said court two writs of attachment were issued in favor of Woodbury & Co. and John Tierney, respectively, against the Mammoth Gold Mining Co. of Colorado, both returnable and returned to said term, and both levied upon certain real estate of said corporation. At July term, 1867, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs in each of these causes.

“September 30, 1867, the premises attached were sold upon special execution issued on these two judgments, and Woodbury and Co. became the purchasers. All these proceedings were regular. Previous to July term, A. D. 1867, divers writs of attachment issued against the same Mammoth Gold Mining Co., one in favor of Wm. Moller and one in favor of said Dennis Maloney, all returnable to the July term of said court, 1867, all of which were returned to that term levied upon the said real estate before attached at suit of Woodbury & Co. and Tierney. The writ issued in favor of Moller was served upon the agent of the corporation defendant, that in favor of the appellant was returned 'not found' and service by publication was made.

"At the October term of court Moller recovered judgment for $39,485.36 damages and Maloney for $205 damages; said judgments still are in full force and unsatisfied. March 30, 1868, the time allowed to the said Mammoth Gold Mining Co. to redeem the lands sold under the executions of Woodbury & Co. and Tierney from such sale having expired, and no such redemption having been made, Moller sued out his special execution upon his judgment and redeemed the premises and afterward procured the appellee to sell the premises on his aforesaid execution. All these proceedings were regular. At the sale on Moller's execution, the premises were sold for the sum of $20,000, of which, after deducting $2,520, paid by Moller to redeem from such prior sale, and the costs on the execution, there remains in the hands of said sheriff the sum of $17,121.93. That it shall be submitted to the district court to determine whether said sum of $17,121.93 ought to be paid by the sheriff to Moller upon and in satisfaction of his execution, or whether the whole sum of $20,000, after deducting the redemption-money paid by Moller, ought to be distributed among all the creditors of the corporation, who recovered judgments against said corporation in actions commenced by writs of attachment, returned and returnable to the July term, 1867, of said court. Either party may appeal from any final order made by the district court in pursuance of this stipulation to the supreme court without filing bond, and the supreme court may determine the same questions," etc.

June 26, 1868, appellant applied to the district court for a rule on the clerk to make assessment of the amount due him out of the moneys in the hands of the sheriff, as appears by the stipulation heretofore filed, and that the sheriff, defendant, etc., be required to pay to him the amount so assessed. This motion was denied, and the sheriff was ordered to pay the moneys in his hands to Moller.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for appellant.

MESSRS. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. Appellant's claim to share in the fund in the hands of appellee is based upon the twenty-sixth section of the attachment act. Laws of 1861, p. 210. That section provides for pro rata distribution of the proceeds of attached property among creditors who have sued out writs returnable and returned to the same term of court, and levied the same upon such property. It will be observed that this section extends to cases in which the writs are returnable and returned to the same term of court, thus leaving the cases in which the writs are not so returnable to the operation of the general rule, which is, that creditors are entitled to satisfaction out of the proceeds of attached property in the order in point of time in which their writs are levied. Drake on Attachment (2d. ed.), § 231. The effect of the section is to place upon an equal footing all attaching creditors who come into court at the same term ; but no provision is made respecting cases in which the writs are returnable to different terms. When several creditors attach the same property under writs returnable to different terms of court, the rule of precedence, as modified by the statute, requires that they should be classified with reference to the terms of court to which their writs are returnable, and gives preference to the several classes according to priority of service. In this view while the creditors, Woodbury and Tierney, who sued at the April term, 1867, of the district court, were upon an equal footing, their lien upon the property attached was superior to the lien of those creditors, of whom appellant was one, who sued at the July term, 1867, of the court. All the creditors, however, attached the same property, and all of them were entitled to satisfaction out of it, if the proceeds should be sufficient to pay all. In this state of law and fact we plainly see what were the rights of the several creditors respecting the fund realized from the sale of the attached property. In the State of Illinois, under a similar statute, it is the practice to hold the proceeds of attached property for distribution among the creditors according to their several rights. Warren v. Iscarian Community, 16 Ill. 114. This seems to be a convenient if not necessary rule, saving the expense of numerous sales, preventing confusion of title as to the property sold, and securing to creditors a just distribution of the fund. Under this rule it is not material whether attached property is sold under process issued in one or another or all of several contemporaneous attachment proceedings, the effect of the sale being to transfer the lien of the attachments from the property to the fund obtained therefrom. However the sale may be made, when the money is brought into court it will be applied to the payment of the several judgments, according to the rule of preference and distribution to which I have referred. Here then were several attachment suits commenced to the April and July terms of court, in the year 1867, the writs being levied upon the same property, and all of the suits pending at the same time. The property was sold, and, as we have seen, all of the creditors, including Moller and the appellant, whose suits were pending contemporaneously, were entitled to share in the proceeds. Woodbury and Tierney were upon equal terms, but, in virtue of the prior service of their writs, they were entitled to be first paid in full. Moller, the appellant and the other creditors who sued at the July term of court, were upon equal terms, but having brought their suits to a term of court, subsequent to a term at which Woodbury and Tierney sued, their liens were subordinate to the liens of the creditors last named.

By the sale of the property the proceedings became fruitful, and the remedy which the creditors sought was obtained. The right to participate in the proceeds of the attached property was then enjoyed by the appellant, if any thing remained after paying the Woodbury and Tierney judgments, and if nothing was received by him it was because the proceeds were not greater than the sum of the Woodbury and Tierney judgments, and not from any defect in the law. It matters not that the property was sold upon execution issued upon the judgments of Woodbury and Tierney, the other suits were pending at the time of sale, and all were entitled to participate in the proceeds, giving to each his due share and preference as fixed by law. The appellant, having once enjoyed the right to share in the proceeds of the attached property, cannot again claim that right. With the sale of the property and the distribution of the fund, the attachment proceedings as such ended. If the appellant obtained judgment in personam, he may collect it in any way known to the law, but his right so to proceed is secured by the judgment rather than the attachment. Probably one who has obtained judgment in rem may redeem the property affected by his judgment from another sale, but if so, the right is secured to him as a judgment creditor, not by the attachment as such. But it is not necessary to decide this point, inasmuch as no question is made touching the regularity of Moller's proceedings, and we are now only concerned with the distribution of the funds received from the sale of the property under his execution.

It appears to be unnecessary to advert to the doctrine often recognized by the supreme court of the State of Illinois, that a redeeming creditor, or the purchaser at the sale made after redemption, is subrogated to the rights of the first purchaser. McLagan v. Brown, 11 Ill. 519; Johnson et al. v. Baker, 38 id. 98; Blair et al. v. Chamberlain et al., 39 id. 521; Massey v. Westcott et al., 40 id. 160.

It is difficult to harmonize Turney et al. v. Young, 22 Ill. 255, with the foregoing cases, but if it is opposed to them it must be regarded as overruled by later decisions. If, according to this doctrine, the purchaser at the sale after redemption acquired a right beginning with the sale under the Woodbury and Tierney judgments, certainly the right of the appellant to satisfaction from the property was extinguished by the sale last mentioned. In conclusion, it is well to notice that the statute under which the creditor Moller redeemed, and upon which his claim to the money obtained upon sale of the property under his execution is founded (Laws 1861, p. 267, § 15), is not at all ambiguous. The right to redeem is given to "any judgment creditor," without reference to the character of his judgment or the manner in which it was obtained, and whether it is or is not a lien upon the estate to be redeemed. The sole qualification necessary to the right of redeeming is, that the party claiming such right shall be the judgment creditor of the debtor who owned the estate which he seeks to redeem. It is also declared that if the property redeemed shall sell for more than the redemption money and interest, "the excess, over and above the amount of the same, shall be applied as a credit on the execution under which the redemption shall have been made."

If in any case it should be adjudged that there was a charge upon the estate redeemed under this plain declaration of the statute, it is doubtful whether the money obtained by sale after redemption could be applied to the satisfaction of such charge. I am inclined to think that the law holds out to every judgment creditor the inducement to redeem, that he shall have in satisfaction of his judgment whatever he can obtain over and above the amount of his disbursements upon another sale of the property. But as before stated, appellant's right to satisfy his judgment out of the property attached by him arose and was enjoyed upon the first sale thereof and cannot be asserted again.

Therefore the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

POSSESSION—illegal award—evidence. A certificate of a county clerk, to the effect that a controversy relating to a mule was submitted to him by agreement of parties, and that the property was awarded to the defendant, cannot be given in evidence to show that the possession of the defendant was lawful.

DEMAND AND REFUSAL in replevin—evidence. In an action of replevin it appeared that plaintiff demanded the property from the defendant the day before the suit was commenced, and the defendant agreed to take the property to a place named on the following day. On the following day the suit was commenced and the defendant contested it at every step. Held, that there was sufficient evidence of demand and refusal.

It is not necessary that a defendant in replevin should expressly refuse to comply with a demand for property. If he neglect to deliver it and contest the suit, he cannot, after verdict, be permitted to say that he intended to avoid litigation, by surrendering the property before suit.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

At the trial, J. W. Mosby testified on behalf of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff demanded the property from the defendant, at Boulder, before the commencement of the suit; the defendant had the mule in his possession at that time; the mule belonged to plaintiff; the demand was made the day before this suit was commenced.

On cross-examination, the witness testified that plaintiff had possession of the mule and used it in 1865; the mule left in January or February, 1865. I next saw it in defendant's possession; plaintiff told defendant it was his mule and he had fetched a witness to prove it; plaintiff left the mule, and defendant agreed to bring it to Boulder City that evening or next day; defendant took the mule to Boulder the next day; he did not deliver it to plaintiff.

George R. Strouse testified that he knew the mule and that it belonged to plaintiff.

The defendant offered a transcript from the records of Boulder county, which consisted of a subpoena issued by James Hubbard, a justice of the peace, directed to a constable, commanding him to summon three persons named to testify concerning the description and value of certain property taken up as "estrays" by defendant below. An affidavit, by defendant below, respecting certain property taken up by him as "estrays," among which was one brown mule, also the report of certain appraisers as to the value of the property taken up by defendant below; also a certificate of the county clerk of Boulder county, as follows:

N. M. HOWARD. }

"The above entitled cause coming on to be heard before the county clerk of Boulder county, Col. ter., this 17th day of June, A. D. 1867. By agreement of the parties to have the title of one brown mare mule branded on left shoulder with figure (5), taken up by N. M. Howard, and now claimed by Jessy Sherwood, adjusted.

"Whereupon, after hearing the evidence of both parties, it was decided against the said Sherwood, and the property in controversy was not the property of said Sherwood, and that he was not entitled to the possession thereof, but that the said N. M. Howard was entitled to the possession thereof.

"W. A. CORSON,
"County clerk of Boulder county, C. T."

Plaintiff objected to these papers, and the court excluded them.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE did not participate in the decision.

Mr. G. BERKLEY, Mr. G. W. CHAMBERLIN, and J. F. BOSTWICK, for appellant.

HALLETT, C. J. Upon the trial in the court below, a transcript of the record of Boulder county, showing that upon a hearing before the clerk of that county, the property in controversy was awarded to appellant, was offered as evidence, and, upon objection by appellee, excluded from the jury. It is contended that this paper should have been admitted for the purpose of showing that appellant's possession of the mule was lawful, and that such possession would only become unlawful upon demand made after the award made by the county clerk, and a refusal by appellant to deliver the property. The argument is founded upon the assumption that appellee agreed with appellant to submit the matters in controversy to the decision of the county clerk. There is no evidence of any such agreement and therefore the argument fails. It is true, that it is stated in the transcript that the clerk proceeded upon the agreement of the parties, but it is not necessary to say that this is not sufficient. As there is no evidence of any authority in the clerk to decide the controversy the paper was properly excluded. There are other objections to the transcript, but it is not necessary to dwell upon them.

It is also urged that the evidence in the court below was not sufficient to show a demand and refusal. Upon this point there was evidence tending to prove that appellee demanded the property the day before the suit was commenced, and that appellant agreed to take it to Boulder the next day. In accordance with this agreement the mule was taken to Boulder on the following day, when appellee replevied it. Respecting the demand there seems to be no question, and if we connect the evidence with the acts of appellant, as shown by the record, the refusal will be no less clear. When appellant arrived at Boulder on the day the suit was brought, he did not surrender the property to appellee, but, upon service of the writ, he gave bond and retained possession of it and contested the suit at every step. If he had delivered the property at that time, even if the writ had been in the hands of the officer, the controversy would have been reduced to a question of costs. Upon this point the acts of appellant are as convincing as the most positive testimony. He had the opportunity to comply with appellee's demand for the property, and he declined to accept it. If he took the property to Boulder, for the purpose of surrendering it to appellee, he could have done so, and the fact that he did not deliver it was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that he had no intention to give it up without litigation. It is not necessary that a defendant in replevin should expressly refuse to comply with a demand for property. If he neglect to deliver it and contest the suit, he cannot, after verdict, be permitted to say that he intended to avoid litigation by surrendering the property before suit. Other errors assigned have not been mentioned in the argument, and we think it unnecessary to notice them.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

SMITH v. THE PEOPLE.

RECORD — COMMON LAW — how constituted. At common law the testimony of witnesses, the opinions of the court upon questions of evidence, the charge of the court to the jury, and other incidents attending the trial of a cause, did not appear in the record.

RECORD — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — statute of Westminster. The statute of Westminster which gave the bill of exception had no application to criminal causes.

RECORD — bill of exceptions in criminal cause. A statute of this territory (4 Sess. 92) makes it the duty of a judge to sign and seal a bill of exceptions in a criminal cause, when tendered to him, and provides that such bill of exceptions shall be filed by the clerk and shall become a part of the record of such cause.

RECORD OF EXCEPTIONS — how made. Exceptions to the rulings, opinions and decisions of the court form no part of the record until they are reduced to writing and signed and sealed by the judge.

And if no exception to the ruling or decision of the court is taken at the trial, the ruling or decision cannot be put on record.

ERROR — must appear of record. And error cannot be assigned as to matters not of record.

ERROR — instructions not excepted to. Where no exceptions were taken to the ruling of the court as expressed in the instructions to the jury, error cannot be assigned as to such ruling.

VERDICT OF GUILTY — sufficiency. Upon an indictment for murder a verdict of guilty is a conviction of the offense charged in the indictment.

NEW TRIAL — verdict supported by evidence. Where the prisoner went to the house of deceased with R. and after some words with deceased the prisoner knocked him down, and thereupon R. put a rope around deceased's neck and strangled him to death, and the prisoner and R. carried deceased's body some distance from the house where the homicide was committed and threw it into a running shaft, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the evidence is not sufficient to support a verdict.

HOMICIDE — INTENT — unlawful act. If two or more persons combine to do an unlawful act, and in the prosecution of the unlawful design death ensue to any, the killing will be murder as to all of the participants in the unlawful purpose.

The prisoner having made a violent assault upon deceased and having assisted in carrying away and concealing deceased's body, even if the killing was done by another, the prisoner must be regarded as aiding, abetting and assisting in the perpetration of the crime.

NEW TRIAL — newly-discovered evidence. A new trial will not be granted to enable the prisoner to obtain evidence which does not tend to excuse or mitigate the crime.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

THE plaintiff in error was indicted for the murder of Wm. Hamblin, and the jury found him guilty. At the trial the evidence was as follows :

John Y. Glendenin testified : In February last I was called by Sheriff Grimes to attend a coroner's inquest upon the body of William Hamblin. I went over with others and found the man in a shaft ; we got the body out of the shaft ; there was a rope around the neck and another around one of the wrists ; I cut the rope off with a knife ; there were gashes on Hamblin's head. We examined in the house and found a pool of blood by the door, and this stick (here the witness identified the stick) ; there was hair on one of these knots and the stick was colored by blood. The place where the body was found and the house are in Gilpin county.

Joseph Harper testified : I was down the road between here and the gate and saw some men gathered together, and they were talking about this murder, etc. The prisoner and several men were there ; some of the men asked the prisoner questions ; they asked him what made him do such a horrible deed, and what he hit him with ? the prisoner said he got mad and hit him with the stool he was sitting on and knocked him down. He said he was likely to get up again and he hit him with a chunk of wood and knocked him down again. The murder occurred a night or two before this conversation ; the prisoner said that in struggling around Hamblin made such a fuss that they put a string around his neck and another around his arm, and hauled him off and put him in a shaft. Both of them hauled him up the hill, one started with him and the other gathered hold and helped. The prisoner said he was sorry that he did it. He said that he knocked Hamblin down twice; there was considerable chat there which I do not now recollect; no threats toward the prisoner were made; we were sitting on a wood pile at the time of the conversation, and the prisoner said that the name of the man who helped him was Robert Reynolds.

Cross-examination: There were about five men present at the conversation with defendant; Mr. Brown, the officer, was there; I don't recollect the others who were present; I remember only Brown and the prisoner; I then supposed that defendant was a prisoner and in charge of the officer; I cannot tell what was said before I came there; they were about sitting down when I came in sight; I do not know whether or not I heard all of the conversation; I am sure the prisoner said he got mad and hit Hamblin with a stool; he referred to himself as the person who got mad; he said something about a chair I think, but I did not hear him say that Hamblin struck him with a chair; I understood that this man struck Hamblin two blows, and Bob Reynolds struck the third blow. I cannot say that the prisoner stated which of them started to drag Hamblin's body to the shaft; he said one started and the other took hold and helped drag Hamblin to the shaft; the prisoner said that he and Bob Reynolds put Hamblin in the shaft.

John C. Bruce testified: I knew William Hamblin in his life-time; he lived in Chase Gulch and he was a milkman; I saw his body just after it was taken from the shaft; the shaft is twenty or thirty yards from the house, in a southeasterly direction. I think it is a little up hill from the house to the shaft; Hamblin's pockets were turned wrong side out when I saw him.

Dr. R. G. Adudell testified: I practice medicine and surgery; I saw the body of William Hamblin in the shaft before it was taken out; the feet were invisible from the top ; from the position in which Hamblin lay in the shaft, I supposed he was thrown in by two persons ; if he had been thrown in by one person the body would have gone out of sight ; I don't remember whether the body lay on the side or upon the face ; the body of Hamblin was taken out of the shaft ; there was a ragged wound on the top of the forehead, a rope around the neck very tight, and another rope around the wrist ; the rope around the neck was very tight, it was buried in the neck about two-thirds its width ; in carrying the body from the house to the shaft, some places it was carried clear of the ground and others it was allowed to drag upon the ground ; Hamblin might have been dead twelve or fifteen hours when we came there ; there was still warmth in the stove in the house when we came there ; the fire had not burned down ; I think Hamblin was still alive when the rope was put around his neck ; he came to his death by strangulation ; the blow on the head would knock him down.

Cross-examination : I think that the body of Hamblin was dropped into the shaft, not thrown down ; the position of the body showed this ; if the body had been thrown in it would have been doubled up more ; I think Hamblin died of strangulation produced by the rope around his neck ; I am inclined to believe he was dead before he was taken from the house ; I think Hamblin was taken to the shaft by two persons ; I did not see any signs of his being dragged by one person, but he might have been dragged by one person near the door ; the marks on the ground were of the hips dragging and not the limbs ; there were no marks of the heels upon the ground ; the appearances were of the body being carried by one person at the head and another at the feet, and the hips sometimes dragging on the ground ; I did not see in or about the house any rope of the kind which was around Hamblin's neck ; the rope around the neck was of a different twist from that in the house ; it had evidently been brought there.

Hinds testified : I was upon the coroner's inquest touching Hamblin's death ; before the body was brought up from the shaft we could see it; it lay upon the back; the body had moved very little from where it first struck; I saw the body when it was hoisted from the shaft; the pockets were turned wrong side out; there were two cords around Hamblin's neck; one of the cords was tied very tightly and the other one loosely; there was no rope about the house like the one that was tight on the neck; there was rope in the house like the one that was loose on the neck; there was water on the stove in the house which was warm; there were gashes on Hamblin's head that could have been made with this stick (referring to the stick mentioned by Mr. Glendenin, in his testimony).

Samuel Merrick testified: I live between Smith's Rancho and Clear Creek, four miles below Black Hawk. The next morning after the killing of Hamblin, two men stopped at my house and got breakfast, and this man here (the prisoner) looks like one of them; they came soon after it was light; I had just got up in the morning.

Cross-examination: This man looks very much like one of the men that stopped there that morning for breakfast; he is of the same build, I suppose that he is one of the men.

John C. Bruce, re-called, testified: I think I have seen the defendant down by Fitzpatrick's mill, in Black Hawk. He was with another colored man. They went off up Chase's Gulch. I saw them about half-past five or six o'clock one Saturday night before the killing of Hamblin. Hamblin was killed on Sunday, and this was the Saturday night before that.

Cross-examination: I know this man's countenance, and I think he is the same man I saw near Fitzpatrick's mill.

Chelton M. Grimes testified: I am the sheriff of Gilpin county; I have had the defendant in my charge since about the middle of February last. We have talked frequently about the murder of Hamblin. I never made any threats against the prisoner or held out any inducements to him to get a confession. The prisoner said that he got into a bad scrape, that it was Reynolds' fault, and that Reynolds got him to go there with him. The prisoner said that Hamblin used words that he did not like and then he struck Hamblin with a chair ; that then Bob struck Hamblin, and then he threw something at Hamblin ; I think it was a stick of stove wood, and hit Hamblin on the shoulder and Hamblin fell down. That Bob then hit Hamblin on the head with a stick of stove wood, and Hamblin commenced groaning and making a noise, and Bob put the rope around Hamblin's neck to prevent him from making the noise. The prisoner said that, when Bob put the rope around Hamblin's neck, he told Bob that was wrong, and asked him how he would like to be served that way. Bob said it made no difference, he was dead any how.

He said that Bob put the rope around Hamblin's wrist and asked him to help take Hamblin to the shaft and throw him in. The prisoner said he refused to help Bob at first ; that Bob dragged Hamblin out of the house and then he, the prisoner, helped until they got to the shaft, and then Bob threw Hamblin into the shaft. The prisoner said that Bob went down to the house and he went down to the cabin below and stayed there until nearly morning, and then Bob came down and they started off together. He said they went down near the Child's House, at foot of Gny Hill, and stopped in the woods and counseled for awhile, and finally went down to the Child's House, where they had been stopping before. The prisoner said he was very sorry for it ; that he had never done any thing like it before. Bob said that he was not sorry ; that he had done the like before many a time. The prisoner said they were stopping at the Child's House before the murder ; that they left the Child's House the evening of the murder and came up to Hamblin's. The prisoner said they left the Child's House to come up to see Mr. Pickle to get some money he was owing them for wood and to go to Hamblin's and get some blankets Hamblin had of theirs ; that they did not see Mr. Pickle ; that when they got opposite Mr. Pickle's house Bob didn't want to go there, but wanted to go up to Hamblin's ; that they went to Hamblin's about dark and stayed there some time—several hours—before any difficulty commenced. The prisoner could not tell what time he left Hamblin's house ; it was some time in the night ; he supposed about eleven o'clock. This conversation occurred about the first opportunity the prisoner had to talk to me after he was put in jail ; the prisoner was very anxious to talk to me. I think the first conversation I had with him was before the coroner's inquest was held. I guess it was the first evening after he was brought in ; on going in the jail the prisoner was frightened at the crowd around the jail, but he seemed content when I told him that he was in no danger there in the jail, that the crowd couldn't get in there. I do not think the conversation was long after the prisoner was put in jail. After Robert Reynolds was put in he made about the same statement as the defendant. The defendant said Bob locked the door of Hamblin's house and threw the key away, and Bob said the same ; they described the place where the key was thrown, and Mr. Hamblin, the brother of the deceased, afterward found it there. I have talked with the prisoner about the matter frequently, and there has been nothing like a denial of guilt on his part until within a few days.

Cross-examined : At the time of the first conversation with the prisoner there was no excitement out of doors. There was a crowd around the door when the prisoner was put in jail, but they went away soon, and at the time of the conversation there was none there. The conversation was two or three hours after the crowd had left ; the defendant did not seem to be excited. The defendant said that they were disputing with Hamblin about blankets ; that Hamblin refused to give them the blankets, and he struck Hamblin with the stool ; that Hamblin struck back and then Bob joined in the fight. I think he said Hamblin ordered them out of doors. Defendant did not speak of time passing between the time Bob got Hamblin out of doors and the time they hauled him off to the shaft ; defendant said that Bob threw Hamblin into the shaft. I think defendant said that he stepped out of the door where so much blood was, while the body was there. Defendant did not say that Bob used threats to compel him to help haul the body of Hamblin away ; it seemed that Hamblin and the defendant disputed altogether, and Bob had nothing to say until the fight began; they talked quietly for some time before the difficulty arose. Within the last few days the defendant has said that Bob was guilty, and he, the defendant, was not guilty.

Re-direct : Bob Reynolds was arrested and brought in four or five days after the defendant was arrested.

A portion of the charge which was given to the jury was as follows :

"In no view which can be taken of the evidence in this cause is the accused guilty of manslaughter ; if not guilty of the crime charged in the indictment, he is not guilty of any crime whatsoever under the law."

No exception was taken to any portion of the charge. The counsel for plaintiff in error contended that this instruction was erroneous. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and a motion for new trial being made and overruled, the plaintiff in error excepted to the ruling of the court upon that motion. Upon the hearing of the motion for new trial, certain affidavits were read as follows :

"THE PEOPLE OF THE TERRITORY OF COLORADO }
v.
GEORGE SMITH. }

George Smith, being first duly sworn, says he has heard the affidavit of Clara Brown read and knows its contents, that he was not aware of the existence of any such testimony as that contained in the said affidavit until after his trial; that he did the best he could to prepare for his trial, and told his counsel and others for what purpose he went to the house of William Hamblin, and that such purpose was to get his blankets; that he had no knowledge that said Hamblin intended to keep said blankets until he arrived there, and that he had no knowledge whatever that said Hamblin had declared his intention so to do until after the trial of the cause; that he revealed his own case to his counsel and made every effort possible in his circumstances to prepare for his defense; that his failure to discover the evidence contained in the affidavit of Clara Brown is not the result of his negligence, but that such failure is to be attributed to the fact that the same never was divulged to any one until after his trial.

THE PEOPLE OF THE TERRITORY OF COLORADO }
v.
GEORGE SMITH. }

Clara Brown, being first duly sworn, says she is a resident of Gilpin county, and knew William Hamblin during his life-time; that on the Thursday morning previous to the Saturday on which he was killed, said Hamblin was at her house in Central City in said county; that on said morning she had a conversation with him, said Hamblin, in respect to some colored men that had been stopping over with him in a cabin, and had been chopping wood; that said Hamblin complained that said colored men had used him badly, had taken away his pistol and some cups and plates belonging to him; but that he, Hamblin, had then in his possession some blankets belonging to them, enough to make him whole in respect to the property taken away by them; that she never told this conversation to said George Smith or his counsel before the trial of said cause, and that she never supposed the same could ever have any thing to do with the trial of said Smith until after the trial, and she had heard what said Smith had said as to going to the house of said Hamblin to get his blankets.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER and Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. I. N. WILCOXEN and Mr. C. C. Post, for the people.

GORSLINE, J. The plaintiff in error, George Smith, was indicted at the May term, 1868, of the district court of Gilpin county, for the murder of William Hamblin. He was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and was tried at the same term, the chief justice presiding. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner sued out a writ of error from this court. There were no exceptions taken at the trial to the decisions of the court in admitting or rejecting testimony, or to the instructions given to the jury in behalf of the people, or to the refusal by the court to give instructions asked for by the prisoner. The only exception taken was to the decision of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial interposed by the prisoner.

The argument of the case in this court was not confined to the exception taken as mentioned above, but extended to a discussion of such instructions given by the court below, as the counsel for the prisoner conceived to be erroneous, and to the refusal to give other instructions asked for by the prisoner. We permitted this, reserving the right to consider whether we could, in accordance with the law, regard matters which were not contained in the record before us.

It becomes us then to determine on this presentation of the case the appellate jurisdiction of this court, and to ascertain whether agreeably to the forms of law we can decide upon matters, which in no legal manner have been submitted for our consideration. At common law a writ of error only carried to the superior court such matters as appeared of record. The testimony of witnesses, the opinions of the court upon questions of evidence, the charge of the court and other incidents attending the trial of a cause never appeared upon the record, and therefore were never removable by writ of error. This rule being extended as well to criminal as to civil cases it followed, as a necessary sequence, that a person convicted of crime, although many errors might have intervened in the course of the trial, was remediless except by an appeal to the consideration of the same court in which such errors occurred.

To remedy this evil the statute of Westminster 2d, 13 Edward I, chapter 31, was enacted, which gave the bill of exceptions. It was considered in England, however, and so adjudged, that this statute, although general and unrestricted in its phraseology and terms, had no application to criminal causes. This statute has been substantially enacted in this territory, and we suspect in most of the States of the Union. In some of them, however, the courts being of the opinion that the statute did not apply to criminal cases, the legislatures of the respective States were compelled to extend the law specifically to that class of cases. In Pennsylvania, for instance, the original statute of Westminster 2d was passed in 1792, yet the court entertaining the opinion that it did not apply to criminal cases, persons under conviction for crime had no redress until the year 1860, when a law was passed which gave defendants, under indictment for murder or voluntary manslaughter, the right to except to the decision of the court upon any point of evidence or law, which exception should be made a part of the record as in civil cases. Thus it will be seen that in that State, previous to 1860, a defendant convicted of murder, notwithstanding errors very dangerous to him might have been committed during the progress of the trial, had no remedy whatever, except perhaps a motion for a new trial, addressed to the same court in which the error occurred. Our statute (Laws 1865, page 92) makes it the duty of the judge before whom any case shall be tried in the district court to sign and seal a bill of exceptions when tendered to him, and provides that such bill of exceptions, when allowed, signed and sealed by the judge, shall be filed by the clerk, and shall become a part of the record of such cause. It follows, then, that exceptions to the "rulings, opinions and decisions" of the court, as expressed in the statute, form no part of the record until they are reduced to writing and signed and sealed by the judge; much less can it be said that the proceedings on the trial of a case form a part of the record of such case, when no exceptions whatever were taken to the same. The question now arises, whether this court can, we will not say with propriety, but according to uniform and established rules of law, take cognizance of such proceedings as occurred in the progress of the trial, which do not come before us in any approved or legal manner. To this question there can in our opinion be but one answer. We should wander very far from the line of our duty if we should assume to determine matters which do not appear in the record before us. The evil consequences of such a precedent would greatly outweigh any good or favorable result which could be derived in a particular case, however important it might be. It would be contrary to the law as we understand it from the nearly uniform decisions of the courts, and we are bound to decide according to law. By doing so we should undertake to review points first made in this court, and not taken in the court below or made a part of the record of the case.

In the case of Hopkins v. The Commonwealth, 50 Penn. 9, which was also an indictment for murder, the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, with great emphasis inquires, in regard to a point to which no exception had been taken at the trial, if it would not be an impertinent interference with the established course of administering criminal law to obtrude a discussion of the point which was suggested by counsel in the argument. And the court, in that case, held, that they could not legally inquire whether that part of the charge of the court below, to which no exception had been taken, was correct or otherwise. The courts of this country, which proceed according to the course of the common law, have been nearly uniform in their decisions upon this question. There is one remarkable exception, which we will presently notice. The supreme court of the United States has expressed but one language, and has always held that objections to instructions given, or to the refusal to give instructions asked, can only be taken advantage of and preserved by bill of exceptions. Pomeroy's Lessee v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Wall. 592; Thompson v. Riggs, 5 id. 663. The latter case is somewhat remarkable in this, that the counsel for the defendant in error waived the objection that there was no proper bill of exceptions to raise the principal question involved in the case. Notwithstanding this waiver, the court declined to discuss it on the ground that the record was not properly before them. Justice CLIFFORD, in rendering the opinion of the court, says: "Settled practice in this court is, that neither the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence, or in giving or refusing instructions, can be brought here for revision in any other mode than by a regular bill of exceptions." And, in relation to the practice generally, he further says: "Instructions requested or given rest in parol, and do not, in the practice of this court, or in any other court where the common law prevails, become a part of the record unless made so by a regular bill of exceptions, sealed by the judge who presides at the trial." The instructions which are given or refused, or whatever else may transpire, ore tenus, during the trial, become no part of the record, any more than do the arguments of counsel, until exceptions to the same are signed and sealed by the judge, when, upon filing the same with the clerk, according to the statute, they form a part of the record. There is a decision, however, in conflict with the opinion we have announced herein, and, we believe, also opposed to the uniform decisions of the courts of common laws in this country and in England. It is in the case of Falk v. The People, reported in 42 Ill. 331. The question arose upon an instruction given by the circuit court, to which no exception was taken. In the opinion of the court, which upon this point contained no argument, and we suspect that court could find neither reason, argument or authority to sustain the extraordinary decision which they made, we find the following inquiry: "Suppose all the instructions given by a court to a jury in a capital case are wrong, that they do not announce correct legal principles, or, being correct, are inapplicable to the case, and no exceptions are taken to them, would it be the duty of an appellate court, under such circumstances, when the record shows the prisoner has been illegally condemned by misapplication of the law to his case, and he asks a review of the proceedings, that such court, in the face of the record, should pronounce the sentence of death upon him?" Now, with great deference, we say that what is implied by this inquiry is a begging of the whole question. It assumes that, in some manner, not by the record, for as we have seen, the only way to make an instruction a part of the record is by exception signed and sealed, but perhaps by street rumor, by a newspaper report, or by what some person may have told the court, they are informed that a certain instruction was given. The court evidently makes a point that it is a capital case. In Shorter v. The People, 2 N. Y. 193, which was an indictment for murder, the court, certainly one of as high authority as that of Illinois, speaking through Justice BRONSON, one of the ablest judges who ever adorned the bench of that State, says: "The law concerning bills of exceptions is the same in criminal as in civil cases," and further says: "We should not allow our feelings to draw us into the making of a bad precedent." In the case of Gill v. The People, decided at the same term as Falk v. The People, and reported in the same volume, which was an indictment for an assault with intent to kill, the court absolutely refused to review the proceedings in the circuit court, because they were not preserved by bill of exceptions, and they had no record before them. It will be seen, therefore, that the supreme court of Illinois, in the case of Falk v. The People, not only contradicted their former decisions but ignored the cases of Hopkins v. The Commonwealth, Shorter v. The People, Thompson v. Riggs, and, we may add, the opinions of respectable courts everywhere. It may be thought that we can consider this case as upon an agreed statement of facts. This cannot be for two reasons. First, the transcript sent up by the clerk of the district court does not contain, nor does it pretend to contain the facts, but it does purport to contain the evidence, which consists of the testimony of witnesses. Second, Because the rulings and opinions of the district court cannot be reviewed in this manner; it can only be done by bill of exceptions. Pomeroy's Lessee v. State Bank, 1 Wall. 592. It is alleged as error that the verdict of the jury was informal and insufficient. The verdict was in these words: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty." Under the indictment in this case the jury might have found the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and it is urged that they should have specified in their verdict of what offense they convicted him. We are referred, in support of this proposition, to the case of the State v. Dowd, 19 Conn. 387, and McGee v. The State, 8 Mo. 495. It will be found upon examination, however, that these decisions were given under peculiar statutes of those States. In Connecticut the statute prescribed that the jury, if they should find the defendant guilty, should ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder in the first or second degree. The court, in its opinion, states that this is a positive provision of the statute, without any exception or qualification. And so in Missouri the statute provided that, "Upon the trial of any indictment for any offense, where by law there may be conviction of different degrees of such offense, the jury, if they convict the defendant, shall specify in their verdict of what degree of offense they find the defendant guilty." These statutes seem to be imperative, and the courts of those States were compelled to yield obedience to them. We have no statute upon the subject, and our practice has conformed to the general practice of courts in those States where they have no peculiar statutes with reference to the matter.

Mr. Bishop, in his very excellent work on criminal procedure, vol. 2, sec. 627, says: "That a general verdict of guilty convicts the prisoner of all matters which are well charged against him in the indictment." So are the cases of The People v. Marsh, 6 Cal. 542; Bond et al. v. The People, 39 Ill. 26, and numerous others which might be cited. We are of the opinion that this verdict is sufficient in form. The prisoner made a motion in the court below for a new trial, on the ground, among other things, that the verdict was against the law and the evidence, and also because of newly-discovered evidence. This brings up the question as to whether there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict. It seems, from the evidence, that the prisoner and Robert Reynolds, both colored men, were at the cabin of Hamblin on the night of the affray, which resulted in his death. For what purpose they were there, is not disclosed. The evidence consisted mainly of the confessions of the prisoner; some made immediately after his arrest, and some at different times while he was in prison previous to his trial. The first were made in the presence of Joseph Harper, a witness, who testified to them, and who says that the prisoner on being asked why he did such a horrible deed, and what he hit the deceased with, replied that he got mad and hit him with the stool he was sitting on, and knocked him down; that the deceased was likely to get up again, and he hit him with a chunk of wood and knocked him down again; that, in struggling round, Hamblin made such a fuss that they put a string around his neck and another around his arm, and hauled him off and put him in a shaft; that the prisoner struck the deceased two blows, and Reynolds struck him once, and that they dragged him to the shaft and put him in. The confessions made by the prisoner to Mr. Grimes, the sheriff, after he was confined in jail, vary in some respects from the foregoing. He admits having commenced the affray by hitting the deceased with the stool and the piece of wood, but says that Bob put the rope around his neck; that he remonstrated with him for so doing, and that Bob replied that it would make no difference, for he was dead anyhow. He also, in these conversations with the sheriff, admitted that he and Reynolds dragged the body to the shaft, and Reynolds threw it in; that Reynolds went back to the house, and he to a cabin below, where they remained until nearly morning, when they went together to the Childs' House at the foot of Guy Hill; that the dispute was between Hamblin and the prisoner about some blankets, and Bob had nothing to say until after the fight commenced. The prisoner also stated that Bob locked the door and threw the key away, describing the place where it was thrown.

Such were mainly the confessions made by the prisoner. The body of the deceased was found in a shaft as proven, some twenty or thirty yards from the house; when found, there was a rope tied tightly around the neck so as to be imbedded in the flesh; another rope, also, loosely drawn around the neck, and another around the wrist were discovered ; his pockets were turned wrong side out ; there was a pool of blood near the door, and a stick was found colored with blood ; there were gashes on the head of the deceased, and the surgeon testified that they were made by blows sufficient to knock him down ; the key of the house was found in the place designated by the prisoner. The surgeon also testified that the death was caused by strangulation. Such were the main facts upon which the jury found the verdict of guilty, and the question is, whether upon this evidence the jury were warranted in their conclusion, or whether the verdict should be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Murder is defined in our statute to be the unlawful killing of a human being in the peace of the people with malice aforethought, either express or implied. Express malice is that deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature, which is manifested by external circumstances capable of proof. Malice shall be implied where no considerable provocation appears, or where all the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart. These are statutory definitions (Laws of 1861, page 292) and are similar to the common law. We presume that if Reynolds and the prisoner had been tried together, there could have been but little question as to the correctness or justice of the verdict. We also presume that if the confession of the prisoner, as narrated by the witness Harper, stood alone, disconnected from that made to the witness Grimes, there could no lawyer be found, who would question it. In Rex v. Shaw, 6 Carr. & Payne, 480, the prisoner confessed that he and the deceased quarreled ; that the deceased struck him and the prisoner knocked him down ; he got up and the prisoner knocked him down again and kicked him, and then put a rope around his neck and dragged him into the ditch. This case only differs from the one at bar in this, that only two participated in the fight and the deceased struck the first blow, certainly under greater provocation than is proven to have existed in this case. "But," said PATTERSON, Justice, "if two persons fight, and one of them overpowers the other and knocks him down and then puts a rope around his neck and strangles him, that is murder. The act is so willful and deliberate that nothing can justify it." There can be no doubt, we think, that this proposition is correct, and we might cite many more cases of similar purport, if we did not deem it entirely unnecessary. Now the confessions made to Sheriff Grimes stand upon a basis a little different. In those statements the prisoner asserted that Reynolds put the rope around the neck of the deceased against his remonstrances. His statements, however, in regard to the rest of the affray are substantially the same as those related by the witness Harper. It was contended in argument that, although the prisoner commenced the affray, yet the act by which the killing was effected was performed by Reynolds, and therefore he and not the prisoner was the one guilty of murder. We do not believe such to be the law. If two persons combine to do an unlawful act and death ensue, it is considered by writers on criminal law and by the decisions of the courts to be murder as to both of the participants. Here the prisoner, without any provocation which appears in proof, with a stool and with a chunk of wood, knocked the deceased down twice, once at least hitting him on the head, and after his confederate Reynolds had tied the rope around his neck, the prisoner assisted to drag the body some forty or fifty yards to a place of concealment. If this was not murder on the part of the prisoner, we think it cannot be denied that he did stand by and "aid, abet and assist" in the perpetration of the crime. The principle is well stated in the case of Brennan et al. v. The People, 15 Ill. 511. The court say: "The prisoners may be guilty of murder; although they neither took part in the killing nor assented to any arrangement having for its object the death of Story. It is sufficient that they combined with those committing the deed to do an unlawful act, such as to beat or rob Story, and that he was killed in the attempt to execute the common purpose."

VOL. I.—18

The motion for a new trial was further made on the ground of newly-discovered evidence after the trial and verdict, and was supported by the affidavit of Clara Brown. We cannot conceive that what she states in her affidavit could have made any possible difference in the result. Certainly none in favor of the prisoner. If any thing, it would have told against him, as exposing a motive on the part of these men in being at the cabin of Hamblin, from which the jury might well have inferred a malicious intent.

The prosecution might well have admitted every thing stated in the affidavit as true without any injury to its cause. We believe, therefore, on this whole record, that the prisoner, upon the law and evidence, is guilty of the murder of William Hamblin, and that the jury, in rendering a verdict of guilty, arrived at a correct conclusion.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was presented by counsel for the prisoner, and, at an adjourned session of the court in January following, the petition was denied.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE was not present at that session, and the opinion of the court was drawn up by HALLETT, C. J. The plaintiff in error asks a rehearing in this cause, mainly upon the ground that the opinion of the court is erroneous upon the question of practice respecting exceptions to instructions given in the court below. This point was very fully considered in the opinion of the court, and we have re-examined it with such care and attention as we are able to command. It is urged that the authorities cited in the opinion of the court are not to be regarded in this territory, for the reason that, in the States from whence they are taken, it is the practice to charge juries orally, while our statute requires such charges to be reduced to writing. In the first place, it is to be observed that it was always the practice in civil cases, and in criminal cases where exceptions were allowed, to write down the part of the charge objected to, and the statute has simply changed the time for putting the charge into writing and provided that the whole shall be written out, whether objected to or not. We do not perceive that the objection and exception to the ruling of the court, which was always necessary, is, by the statute, rendered unnecessary. The obvious intention of the statute was to prevent mistake or misapprehension respecting the language used by the court, by requiring that the charge should be put into writing, and there is nothing to show that it was intended that the instructions, when written down, should become part of the record. It is not provided that the instructions shall be authenticated in any way whatever, or that they shall be filed among the papers in the cause. It is true that the judge is required to signify his approval by writing the word "given" in the margin of the instructions, and his disapproval by the word "refused," but this is so obviously designed as a mark of distinction rather than of authentication, that we think it not necessary to comment upon it.

• We cannot lightly assume that it was intended to incorporate the instructions into the record without any authentication whatever. The mere filing of a paper in a cause is not alone sufficient to make it a part of the record. In McKinney v. The People, 2 Gilm. 551, the rule upon this point was stated as follows :

"In a criminal case, after the caption stating time and place of holding the court, the record should consist of the indictment as found by the grand jury, the arraignment of the accused, his plea, the impaneling of the traverse jury, their verdict, and the judgment of the court. This, in general, is all the record need state. If, during the progress of the prosecution, motions are made and overruled, the facts can be preserved by a special entry on the record, or by bill of exceptions. In one or the other of these ways it is necessary to preserve every fact that the prisoner may deem essential to his rights, and a fair and regular trial."

We believe this to be good law, although the same court seems to have adopted a different rule in Falk v. The People. According to this rule, instructions do not become a part of the record unless made so by bill of exceptions.

Again, the language of the statute of 1865, respecting exceptions in criminal cases, seems to leave no doubt as to the necessity of an exception upon every point reserved for the consideration of a court of review. That statute is as follows:

“In all cases in the district court where either party shall except to any ruling, decision or opinion of the court, and shall reduce such exception or exceptions to writing, it shall be the duty of the judge to allow the same, and to sign and seal the same. * * * And when such bill of exceptions is so allowed, and signed and sealed by the judge, * * * it shall thereupon be filed by the clerk, and shall become a part of the record in such cause.”

It will be noticed that the statute does not declare that the ruling of the court alone, however certified, shall become part of the record. It is only when such ruling is accompanied by an exception, and is properly certified, that it gains the legal quality necessary to its admission to the record. Bouvier defines an exception to be, “the statement in writing of the objection made by a party in a cause to a decision of the court on a point of law, which, in confirmation of its accuracy, is signed and sealed by the judge or court who made the decision.”

From this, it appears that three things are comprised in an exception; the ruling of the court, the objection thereto, and the authentication. The objection of the party appears to be quite as indispensable as either of the other qualities, and we know of no ground upon which it can be said to be unnecessary. It is one of the essential elements of an exception, and the exception cannot exist without it. In Falk v. The People, the supreme court of Illinois assumes that the record shows the instructions, which is the very point in controversy. How can the record show the instruction when the exception for which the statute calls, and which is the essential condition upon which they are to be entered of record, is wanting? For ourselves, we must continue to say that we cannot thus interpret the law. It is written that exceptions to the rulings of inferior courts shall be entered of record, and shall be open for review in this court, and we cannot say otherwise, even if we would. What is here said will furnish an answer also to the suggestion, that the instructions being found in the bill of exceptions are the subject of judicial cognizance in this court. We have here the certificate of the judge who tried the cause as to these instructions, but in the absence of any exception to them we are not judicially informed of their character. The modern practice of putting all the exceptions taken throughout the whole course of a cause into a single bill has not changed the rule that each exception stands upon its own merit. The circumstance that a ruling to which no exception has been taken is incorporated in the same bill with another ruling to which an exception has been taken, cannot affect the status of the former. Each must stand or fall by itself. It was also urged that the judge of the district court should have entered exceptions in behalf of the accused, or, at all events, that it ought to be assumed that all exceptions were taken at the proper time. We are acquainted with the ancient maxim, adopted in the days when persons charged with crime were not allowed the assistance of counsel, which declares that a judge shall be counsel for the prisoner, but we doubt whether it has ever been carried so far as to require the judge to object to his own ruling. We may say, with Foster :

“In capital cases the court is so far of counsel with the prisoner that he should not suffer him to consent to any thing manifestly wrong, and to his own prejudice,” but this is not saying that the court is bound to object to every thing that is done in the progress of the cause. A proper respect for the maxim would doubtless restrain the judge from misapplying or misinterpreting the law. But if, after stating the law as judge, he should be required as counsel for the accused to state an objection to his ruling, he would appear to be in an exceedingly perplexing situation. One who is bound to lay down the law correctly, and immediately show himself wrong by stating a valid objection to it, is certainly in need of an ingenious mind. If a judge believes a ruling to be erroneous he ought not to make it, and if he believes it to be correct, he cannot state a valid objection to it. The statute provides that the party shall except to the ruling of the court, which is sufficiently explicit and free from ambiguity. There are authorities also which hold strong language upon this point. In Clem v. The Commonwealth, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 10, which was a capital case we find the following language :

“It is insisted on behalf of the appellant that the circuit court committed errors to his prejudice in admitting important evidence against him. It does not appear from the record, however, that any exceptions were taken to any of the evidence offered by the Commonwealth and permitted to go to the jury, and for this reason, even if it appeared that improper evidence had been admitted upon the trial, the appellant could not avail himself of such error as a ground of reversal.”

So also in 1 Bishop's Crim. Law, § 843, it is said : “If the defendant permits illegal testimony to be given to the jury, as shown by his making no objection to it, he cannot afterward claim any privilege on account of its admission.” The rule is here stated with reference to testimony, but it is the same in respect to instructions, as we may learn from the case of Hopkins v. Commonwealth, cited in our opinion in this cause. If a superior court is required to assume that objection has been made to an instruction or to testimony upon a trial in an inferior court, or if a judge upon a trial of a capital cause is bound to interpose an objection when none is made by the prisoner, these authorities are strangely silent upon those points. Upon a careful examination of the opinion drawn up by our brother Gorsline, we are again compelled to express our concurrence therein, and we are constrained to add that we do so under a profound sense of the responsibility resting upon us, as the minister of the law, listening to the last appeal of a wretched man who is about to take his place upon the gallows.

In this connection we will briefly allude to the instructions given upon the trial below for the purpose of freeing the case from any suspicion of illegality that may be cast upon it. We have not lost sight of the fact that these instructions are not before us in a way which will enable us to pronounce a judicial opinion upon them, but we desire to make some observations for the purpose of showing that the instructions are not, as has been claimed, wholly unsupported by the law. The case of The People v. King, 27 Cal. 507, was an indictment for murder, and upon the trial in the district court an instruction was given which, as will be seen, was substantially the same as the one of which complaint is made in the case at bar. We give the remarks of the court at length :

“It is next claimed that the court erred in giving the following instruction : ‘In the case that is now being submitted to you, there is no evidence on any points or matters given in proof which reduce the crime charged in the indictment to manslaughter ; if the defendant be found guilty, therefore, you cannot consider the question of manslaughter upon the evidence in this cause.’ This instruction is not a little obscure, and if it was given as represented in the transcript, it is quite possible that the jury may have found some difficulty in determining its exact meaning. The record does not contain the evidence, or any part thereof, and we cannot, therefore, read the instructions in the light of the testimony in view of which it was given, but are forced to determine its meaning by its own terms. If there was any evidence before the jury tending, however slightly, to reduce the homicide to the grade of manslaughter, this instruction was erroneous. If the expression ‘there is no evidence on any points or matters given in proof’ is to be understood as admitting that there were ‘points and matters given in proof’ which, if true, would reduce the offense to manslaughter, but declaring the evidence as to such points or matters to be insufficient to warrant the jury in finding them to be true, it was erroneous, because it assumed to pass upon the weight of evidence which, under our constitution, is left entirely to the jury, and in regard to which the judge, contrary to the rule of common law, is not allowed to express an opinion. On the other hand, if there was a total absence of all testimony as to such facts and circumstances as would, under the law, reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter, and the instruction is to be understood as declaring such to be the case, then it was not erroneous, because judges, although not allowed to charge juries with respect to matters of fact, may state the testimony and declare the law (sec. 17, art. VI of the Constitution). At common law a judge is allowed to express his opinion as to the weight of evidence. Commonwealth v. Child, 10 Pick. 252. In this respect the constitutional provision referred to was intended to change the rule so as to leave the weight of the evidence entirely to the jury; but judges may still, as formerly, state what facts are in evidence and what are not; or in other words, they may state the evidence pro and con. in view of which the existence of certain facts is affirmed or denied, which includes the right to state to the jury, that there is no evidence as to particular facts or issues, when such is the case; counsel for defendant seems to have understood the judge as instructing the jury that there was no evidence as to facts, which, under the law, would reduce the offense charged to manslaughter, and to have excepted to the instruction upon that ground, so understood, there being no evidence of the character in question, the instruction was not erroneous."

So, also, in The People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 207, the court say:

"It is neither necessary nor proper for the court, on the trial of an indictment for murder, to give an extended or any definition of murder in the second degree, unless there is evidence in the case tending to prove that the crime was or may have been of that grade in the given instance. Instructions are always to be given with reference to the facts proved before the jury. * * * The circumstance that counsel conducted the defense on the theory of murder in the second degree, assuming that he did so, did not in itself make it necessary that the court should deal with the case in an aspect which it did not in fact present."

The constitution of the State of California, like our statute, restrains courts from charging juries respecting matters of fact, and therefore these decisions are in point. It is true that the constitution of that State expressly declares that the courts may state the testimony, but as our statute is silent upon that point, and courts were always, by the common-law practice, allowed to state the testimony, we may safely affirm that the law is the same in this territory. We learn from these decisions that it is not error to withdraw from the consideration of the jury a crime concerning which there is no evidence before them. Whether there is any evidence at all to prove a fact charged is always a question for the court, but the sufficiency of evidence to prove the facts charged must be determined by the jury. If, in a case of felonious homicide, the evidence shows the killing to have been deliberate and intentional, there is no question of manslaughter presented, and therefore no reason for submitting that question to the jury. To require the jury in such a case to pass upon the question of manslaughter would be as unreasonable and absurd as to instruct them respecting the crime of larceny. So in the case of the State v. Mill, 3 Nev. 444. The court instructed the jury that they must find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first or second degree or not guilty; thus taking from them the right to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and the supreme court of that State say: "If it was proper, under such a state of facts, to charge the jury they might, in their discretion, find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, it was equally proper to charge they might find him guilty of an assault to commit murder, or even guilty of a simple assault, for both of these are crimes of which a party under our statute may be convicted upon an indictment for murder; yet in a case where a party was beyond all question slain, and another party indicted for the murder, it would seem ridiculous to charge the jury that they might find the defendant guilty of a simple assault."

We agree, that if the evidence tends to prove a case of manslaughter, or if, upon the evidence, there is any doubt whatever as to the grade of the crime, the question of manslaughter ought to be submitted to the jury; but when all the evidence tends to prove murder, if it proves any thing, it cannot be wrong to say to the jury that the only question before them is, whether the accused is guilty of that crime. It is true that in the case at bar the question of manslaughter was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, but there was no evidence whatever tending to establish that crime. To adopt the language used in The People v. Byrnes: "We consider that all the evidence tended to prove murder * * * * , and it is certain that there is none having the slightest tendency to the contrary."

The evidence in this case shows that the deceased, after being twice knocked down upon the floor of his isolated cabin by the blows of the plaintiff in error, was strangled to death by the latter's companion in the terrible crime. The combat was commenced by the plaintiff in error, so far as we know, without provocation, and after he had reduced his victim to a condition of helplessness, the cause of death was applied by this man and his associate, or by his associate alone. The guilty pair then bore away the body of deceased and threw it into a neighboring mining shaft, and together fled from the scene of the tragedy. According to the statement of one witness, the prisoner protested against the act of Reynolds in tying the rope around the neck of deceased, but if the jury accepted this as true we cannot say that it tended to reduce the crime to manslaughter. The only effect of it would be to deny on the part of the prisoner any participation in the killing. The statute declares, that "in cases of voluntary manslaughter there must be a serious and highly provoking injury inflicted upon the person killing, sufficient to excite an irresistible passion in a reasonable person, or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury upon the person killing. The killing must be the result of that sudden violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible. And again, the killing being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or to justify or excuse the homicide, will devolve on the accused unless the proof on the part of the prosecution sufficiently manifests that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the accused was justified or excused in committing the homicide."

With the law and the evidence in this case before us, we are unable to perceive that there was any question of manslaughter arising in the case. The accused must be guilty of murder if he is guilty of any thing, and we have already said that we entertain no doubt as to his guilt. We deplore the necessity which rests upon us to declare this conclusion and we would gladly avert the dreadful doom of the wretched man, who now invokes our aid, if it were possible to do so, but we have a duty to perform as officers of the law which cannot be controlled by any feeling of sympathy for the prisoner, and it is in the discharge of that duty that we now declare that the petition for rehearing must be denied.

Petition denied.

ARMOR v. FISK.

PLEADING — performance of condition precedent. In an action upon contract to pay two sums of money, the first, when a certain suit is defeated; the second, when the title to certain property is perfected, it is necessary to aver and prove performance of these conditions, or to excuse the failure. But a condition impossible to be performed need not be noticed, and if, at the date of the contract, no suit was pending as set forth in the contract, the payee could not be required to show that he had defeated such suit, and he may recover the sum payable upon such condition, upon a count for an account stated.

EVIDENCE of pendency of suit. Whether a suit was pending as described in the contract at the time therein mentioned, was provable by the records of the court in which it was alleged to be pending.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

FIRST count in the declaration was indebitatus assumpsit.

"For certain quartz lode mining claims, lode claims, gulch claims, quartz mill claims, water mill claims, mill claims, water power, water privilege, flumes, buildings, stamp mills, water mills, tools and machinery, more particularly described as follows, to wit: Mining claims number (1) one, (5) five and the undivided half of number (6) six, on the Fisk lode, east from discovery. Also, claims number (1) one, and (2) two, on the Gregory extension lode, number (1) one being the discovery claim, and running (200) two hundred feet from the upper or north-east end of said discovery claim along said lode south-west to a point below the base of a large rock, and about fourteen feet south-west of a certain shaft sunk on said claim, and known as the shaft of Charles W. Fisk. Also claim number (4) four, on the Simmons lode, adjoining the Black Hawk Mill Company's claim on the south-west end, and running thence south-west along said lode (100) one hundred feet. Also two gulch claims, commencing at or near the road in front of Davenport's saloon, and running down two hundred feet in the direction of the Gregory lode. All of the above-described property lying and being in Gregory mining district, county of Gilpin, and territory of Colorado. Also the mill claims, water power and flumes, situated therein, commencing at a point on North Clear creek below the old toll road gulch and twenty (20) feet below what is generally known as the old Newland Arastra bed, and running from said creek eight hundred and fifty (850) feet. Also all of the quartz mill, with all the tools, machinery and appurtenances of every description and kind thereunto belonging, situate on said water claims, and generally known as the Fisk mill property; and all the buildings and hereditaments on said claims, and situate in Enterprise Mining District, Gilpin county, Colorado territory."

In the second count the property was differently described, but no special agreement was mentioned.

The money counts were added.

The defendant pleaded the general issue, payment and a set-off.

At the trial, Fisk proved a conveyance from himself to Armor of the property mentioned in the declaration, and also gave in evidence the following agreement :

“ ARMOR, JOHN }

(Seal.)

"JOHN ARMOR.

"CHARLES W. FISK."

This agreement bore a certificate of acknowledgment from a notary public.

The plaintiff below also introduced a written instrument, as follows :

"BLACK HAWK, Colorado, April 5, 1864.

"I promise to pay to Charles W. Fisk two thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars, and also pay two thousand one hundred and eighty dollars, the amount of a note given by Charles W. Fisk to one John Shumer, about March 10th, 1864, being amount of principal and interest due on said note when the same shall become due, provided the said C. W. Fisk shall successfully defend a suit now pending in the district court of Gilpin county, wherein Benjamin F. Smith and Dan. S. Parmalee are plaintiffs, and Chas. W. Fisk is defendant, and shall obtain a writ of restitution from said court and be put in possession of a certain shaft on the Gregory extension lode (about the possession of which the suit is pending), and generally known as the shaft of said Fisk, and I also agree to pay all costs that may accrue upon said suit, or upon any suit for title to said property after the April term of said district court, leaving a balance due to C. W. Fisk on property John Armor purchased by me from him of five thousand dollars after the amounts mentioned above are paid ; said five thousand dollars ($5,000) to be paid when the title to said property is all cleared, as mentioned in a certain bond from said Armor to said Fisk, bearing date about December 20th, 1862, and also a certain agreement between said Armor and said Fisk bearing date November 11th, A. D. 1863, and on record.

"JOHN ARMOR."

The defendant below introduced a written instrument, as follows :

"Received, Black Hawk, Colorado, April 5th, 1864, of John Armor, ten thousand dollars ($10,000) in part payment for my interest in certain property in Gilpin county, Colorado territory, which I agreed with said Armor, on November 11th, A. D. 1863, that he should sell, and for which interest I was to receive twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) as payment in full as per said agreement. I have also received of said Armor his obligation to pay me two thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars ($2,820) when I shall obtain a writ of restitution from the district court of Gilpin county to the possession of certain property on the Gregory extension lode, more fully described in said obligation and in the agreement above referred to ; and I have also received from the said Armor his obligation to pay a certain note given by me to John Shumer about March 10th, 1864, for two thousand dollars, due in three months from date, with interest at the rate of three per cent per month, upon which note said Armor is security. Now, if the said Armor shall pay the sum of two thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars ($2,820), above specified, and also the amount of the note to Shumer when the same shall become due, which would be, in principal and interest, $2,180, then there would be due to me, as balance in full of the twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) above spoken of, five thousand dollars ($5,000), to be paid according to the conditions of a certain bond given me by said Armor, December 20th, 1862, and also the conditions of a certain agreement made between said Armor and myself, on November 11th, 1863.

"CHAS. W. FISK."

There was a large amount of evidence not referred to in the opinion of the court, and therefore it is not inserted here.

The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and judgment for the plaintiff for $3,337, and costs.

Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER, for appellant.

Mr. JOHN W. REMINE and Mr. E. T. WELLS, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. In the investigation of this case we have not found it necessary to consider all the objections to the record made by the appellant. The rights of the parties are established by the two papers of date April 5, 1864, and the agreement of November 11, 1863, to which reference is made in those papers, and we shall confine the discussion to those instruments. We learn from the agreement of November 11, 1863, that the appellee was jointly interested with the appellant in certain property described therein, which the latter held by deed from the former; if the appellant should sell the property he covenanted to pay to the appellee $20,000, less any indebtedness of the appellee to him, and upon the condition that the appellee should successfully prosecute a certain suit or suits in which the property was involved, and "legally clear the premises hereinafter described of all persons claiming or occupying the same, so that the said John Armor should have and enjoy the quiet and peaceable possession of all the property hereinafter described, so as to vest absolutely in the said Armor the title to all of said property, both at law and in equity."

By the writings of April 5, 1864, it appears that the sale referred to in the agreement had been effected, and the agreement was modified in some important particulars. The appellee then acknowledged that he had received $10,000 of the $20,000 mentioned in the agreement, and the balance of $10,000 was divided into two equal parts, and separate conditions attached to each of the parts. First, the sum of $5,000 was payable "provided the said C. W. Fisk shall successfully defend a suit now pending in the district court of Gilpin county wherein Benjamin F. Smith and Dan. S. Parmalee are plaintiffs and Chas. W. Fisk is defendant, and shall obtain a writ of restitution from said court and be put in possession of a certain shaft on the Gregory extension lode (about the possession of which the suit is pending), and generally known as the shaft of said Fisk."

Second, the sum of $5,000 was payable "when the title to said property is all cleared, as mentioned in a certain bond from said Armor to said Fisk, bearing date about December 20, 1862, and also in a certain agreement between said Armor and said Fisk, bearing date November 11, 1863, and on record."

Appellant claims that this last clause is changed so as to include all the conditions specified in the agreement by the paper of April 5, 1864, signed by the appellee. It is true that this writing of the appellee states that the last $5,000 is payable upon the conditions of the bond and agreement, and this standing alone would of course include all of those conditions, but the paper given by appellant mentions only the title to the property, and as he was the party upon whom the obligation to pay was placed, we may presume that he selected his language with care.

Again, the condition respecting the Smith and Parmalee suit, mentioned in the agreement, was made applicable to the first $5,000 by the writings of April 5, and if the same condition was to be applied to the second sum of $5,000 the purpose of dividing the sum of $10,000 into two parts, as was done by those writings, is not apparent. It would seem, also, that the indebtedness and advances which occupied so large a space in the agreement of 1863, and was evidently the subject of much anxiety on the part of the appellant, had been extinguished before the writings of April 5 were drawn. The appellant makes no mention of it in the obligation signed by him, but he obliges himself to pay costs which should thereafter accrue in defending or securing the title to the property. This obligation to pay costs is not at all consistent with the notion that advances previously made were yet in arrear. It is plain that the first $5,000 was payable upon the successful issue of the Smith and Parmalee suit, and the second upon perfecting the title to the property in the appellant, and securing to him the possession thereof. The appellant, having doubts as to the soundness of the title to the property, retained $10,000 of the purchase-money to secure himself against eventual loss. As the issue of the Smith and Parmalee suit, if favorable to the appellee, would in some measure demonstrate his right to the property, the appellant was willing to pay one-half the amount upon the successful termination of that controversy ; the remaining one-half of the $10,000 was to abide the result of a more comprehensive scrutiny of the title, with a view to supply defects therein if any should be found. Now here were acts to be done by the appellee before he could call upon the appellant for payment, and if it were possible to perform these acts, the appellee should have averred in his declaration and proved upon the trial performance, or an excuse for the non-performance of them. In Campbell v. Jones, 6 Term R. 570, Lord Kenyon says: "If one thing is to be done by a plaintiff, before his right of action accrues on the defendant's covenant, it should be averred in the declaration that that thing was done."

So, also, in 1 Chitty's Pl. 321, we find the doctrine laid down as follows :

"But when the consideration of the defendant's contract was executory, or his performance was to depend upon some act to be done or forborne by the plaintiff, or on some other event, the plaintiff must aver the fulfillment of such condition precedent, whether it were in the affirmative or negative, or to be performed or observed by him or by the defendant, or by any other person, or must show some excuse for the non-performance."

In the declaration in this cause we find only the common counts, and of course there is no averment of performance, or of excuse for the non-performance of the conditions precedent, mentioned in the writings of April 5, 1864, and this upon the supposition that there is no inherent impossibility in performing those conditions is decisive of the question respecting their admissibility as evidence under the declaration. Our attention has been called to that numerous class of cases where, upon sale of goods, or performance of labor under special contract, the plaintiff, although unable to comply strictly with his contract, and therefore unable to support a special count upon it, has, nevertheless, been allowed to recover the value of his goods or services under common counts, and an attempt has been made to show that this case may stand upon the doctrine of those cases.

If the appellee had contracted to sell property to the appellant, and had conveyed the property, but not in the time or manner specified in his contract, and the appellant had accepted the property, the analogy between those cases and this case would be easily traced, and we should have no difficulty in applying the rule laid down in those cases. But the present is not like those cases. Here was property sold, and part of the purchase-money paid, the vendee, with the consent of the vendor, withholding the balance of the purchase-money until the title to the property should be established, which is a payment to be made upon condition and not the substantial performance of a contract. We conclude, therefore, that the writings of April 5, 1864, were not admissible under any count in the declaration, unless, indeed, the conditions mentioned in those writings were impossible of performance. As to the second of those conditions respecting the title, we cannot perceive any inherent impossibility in regard to its fulfillment, nor has any such impossibility been suggested. As to the first of those conditions respecting the Smith and Parmalee suit, it is said that there was no such suit pending in the district court of Gilpin county, at the date April 5, 1864, and if that fact appeared, it seems to us the condition would be impossible. If no suit existed, certainly the appellee could not resist successfully, nor could he obtain a writ of restitution therein. If the appellee had contracted to procure

Smith and Parmalee to institute a suit against him in the district court of Gilpin county, and to defeat the suit thus instituted; he would be held to his contract. But here the undertaking is to defeat a certain suit pending in a certain court; and if there is no suit pending in that court, it is like the case given in the books, of one who should contract to go to Rome in a day, inherently impossible to be performed.

In Worsley v. Wood, 6 Term R. 718, Lord Kenyon declares that, "If there be a condition precedent to do an impossible thing, the obligation becomes single."

And the same doctrine is found in Bacon's Abridgment, title Condition N. Under this rule, if the condition respecting the Smith and Parmalee suit was impossible, the first $5,000, mentioned in the writings of April 5, was payable unconditionally and presently after the making of the instrument. In the words of Lord Kenyon, the obligation was single, and there was no condition to be performed or excused and no necessity for any averment of performance or of excuse for the non-performance. The sum of money, being payable absolutely, might be recovered upon a count for an account stated. However, we find in the record no evidence tending to show the non-existence of the Smith and Parmalee suit, and for the want of such evidence the judgment must be reversed. The fact, if it exists, was provable by the records of the court of the date April 5, 1864, and those records, or a copy thereof, should have been introduced. Pitcher v. King, 1 Carr & Kir. 655 (47 E. C. L. R. 655); 1 Greenl. Ev., § 507. It is not necessary to consider further the admissibility of the evidence given in the court below, nor is it necessary to express any opinion as to the weight of the evidence. In conclusion, we desire to express our satisfaction with the manner in which this case was prepared for hearing in this court. The abstracts, prepared by counsel for appellant, present the parts of the record to which the attention of the court is directed in a full and perspicuous manner, and thereby the labors of the court have been very much lightened. The duty of preparing abstracts of the record in this court is usually so imperfectly performed, that the abstracts are of no service whatever to the members of the court. We hope that the commendable practice inaugurated by the counsel for appellant may be very generally observed.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF ARAPAHOE CO.
v. KOONS et al.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE — meaning of the word "stationery." Blanks used by a clerk of a district court are not stationery within the meaning of section 28, chapter 21, Revised Statutes, and the county is not liable for them.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE statute (Rev. Stat. 172), so far as it relates to the subject considered, is as follows :

"SEC. 28. The board of commissioners of their respective counties shall, at the expense of the county, * * * provide suitable books and stationery for the use of each of the county officers of their county."

Mr. Justice EYSTER dissented.

Mr. V. D. MARKHAM, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. G. W. MILLER and Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for defendants in error.

GORSLINE, J. This case comes before us on an agreed statement of facts, and the only question to be determined is, whether the county is liable for blanks furnished to the clerk of the district court to be used in his office. The statute provides, that the several boards of county commissioners shall provide suitable books and stationery for the use of the county officers of their county. If these blanks, used by the clerk of the district court, come within the definition and meaning of "stationery," then the judgment of the district court should be affirmed. Stationery is defined to be such articles as are usually sold by stationers, as paper, ink, quills and the like. We might go further and say that such blanks as are used by the public generally, as blank deeds, mortgages and the like, could well be included in the meaning of the term. It must be different, however, as to those blanks which are intended for and used only by one person in the county, for they are valueless to all others. Such blanks are not usually kept by stationers, for the public have no use for them. They are printed solely for the use of one person, and the public has no use for or interest in them. It is, doubtless, convenient, and facilitates business, for the clerk to have these blanks, but the question is, whether the law has provided that the county shall pay for them. We think it has not, and, therefore, that the judgment of the district court should be reversed. We are aware that the question has been decided differently by the supreme court, of Illinois (County of Knox v. Arms, 22 Ill. 175), but we fail to see the force of the argument advanced by that court, unless the long practice of the court in auditing such bills of its clerks had sanctioned the construction which the court gave to the statute.

The judgment of the district court is reversed.

RECORDS OF PROBATE COURTS. A mere minute or memorandum of a proceeding is not a record.

An entry in the following form: "Judgment given by default by order of the court," is not a judgment.

JUDGMENT—what shall be regarded as final. Where the court below has awarded execution, this court will entertain a writ of error to reverse the judgment, although the record of such judgment is defective.

JUDGMENT—defective in form. There may be error in the form or substance of a judgment, as well as in the proceedings preliminary to it.

VOL. I. — 21

Error to Probate Court, Las Animas County.

Mr. W. F. STONE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. G. W. PURKINS, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The transcript of the record filed in this court contains informal memoranda of the proceedings of the probate court in the manner usually adopted by justices of the peace, together with copies of papers filed in that court. It is not in the form used by courts of record, and, indeed, is so unlike a record that it is difficult to apply that name to it. The statute gives to probate courts the character of courts of record, and declares that they shall be governed by the rules of practice and proceeding prescribed by law for district courts. In the words of Mr. Justice BLACKSTONE, "A court of record is that where the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled in parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony; which rolls are called the record of the court, and are of such high and super-eminent authority that their truth is not to be called in question."

In these days the parchment is discarded, but records still retain their character as a judicial memorial of "high and super-eminent authority." The importance of uniformity and perspicuity in the language of records was early appreciated, and great care was taken in selecting it. It is to be regretted that the same care has not always been observed, and that the familiar forms which have been sanctioned by long usage should be disregarded. The law overlooks many mistakes, omissions and ambiguities in records, when they do not affect the sense of the matter recorded, but we are not prepared to say that the approved forms in which the orders and judgments of courts are usually entered may be entirely ignored. A mere minute or memorandum of a proceeding is not a record. Leveringe v. Dayton, 4 Wash. C. C. 698.

And we have nothing more than memoranda in this transcript. For instance, the entry which is said to be a judgment is as follows: "Judgment given by default by order of the court," following which is a statement that the plaintiff below filed a note of a certain amount.

There is no statement that any sum of money was recovered by one party from the other, or that any thing was considered or adjudged by the court, or indeed any thing that is essential to a judgment. And yet it seems that execution was issued out of the probate court against the property of the plaintiff in error to collect the amount for which this entry is supposed to stand as a judgment. And here we approach the consideration of the motion to dismiss the writ of error for want of a sufficient record. The rule which limits the appellate jurisdiction of this court to cases in which final judgment has been rendered is supposed to apply to this case, inasmuch as no judgment appears in the transcript, and yet, if we dismiss the writ, there appears to be nothing to prevent the defendant in error from obtaining another execution out of the probate court; in our judgment the rule referred to does not apply to cases of this kind, for the reason that the court of original jurisdiction has decided that final judgment has been rendered. It is true that we do not find any such opinion in express terms, but execution has been awarded by that court, which cannot be done except upon final judgment. There would be great hardship in denying to one whose property has been taken in execution the right to test the validity of the judgment upon which the execution issued. If the judgment is defective or void, that is the very fact which he wishes to establish in a court of errors in order to prevent his adversary from selling his property under it. There may be error in the form or substance of a judgment as well as in the proceedings preliminary to the judgment. Martin v. Barnhardt, 39 Ill. 12. The motion to dismiss must be denied, and from what we have said of the record it will be apparent that the judgment, such as it is, must be set aside and the cause remanded with directions to the probate court to permit the plaintiff in error to plead to the action. Even if the judgment was perfect in form, there is no record preliminary to it, upon which it could stand. In the present condition of the probate courts we trust that counsel in this and other cases before those courts will make some effort to conform the records to the rules of practice by which such records are to be tested. The question respecting the right to change of venue will probably receive the attention of the legislative assembly at an early day, and therefore we think it not necessary to consider it.

The judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause remanded.

JURISDICTION of probate court to try appeals. One who appeals from the judgment of a justice of the peace to a probate court, and goes to trial in the latter court without objection, cannot question its appellate jurisdiction.

TRIAL—before the court. If neither party demand a jury, a probate court may try an issue of fact without a jury.

Error to Probate Court, Jefferson County.

HALLETT, C. J., did not sit in this case.

MESSRS. BROWNE & MECHLING, for plaintiff.

MR. ALFRED SAYRE, for defendant.

GORSLINE, J. The defendant in error, John N. McCord, sued the plaintiff in error before a justice of the peace, and on the 3d day of April, 1865, recovered the sum of $49.50 damages, and costs taxed at $33.60. The defendant below then appealed to the probate court of Jefferson county, and filed his appeal bond. The appeal was tried at the June term of the probate court, and the defendant in error recovered a judgment for the sum of $125.90 and costs of suit, to reverse which judgment this writ of error is brought. The principal errors assigned are, that the probate court had no appellate jurisdiction from justices of the peace, and that the probate judge assessed the damages without the intervention of a jury. We think it unnecessary to discuss the question whether the law conferring appellate jurisdiction upon the probate courts has been repealed or not, for in this case the plaintiff in error not only submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the probate court, but by taking the appeal thrust himself into the jurisdiction. It cannot be, nor is it denied, but that the probate court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and by the parties voluntarily appearing and going to trial they waived all objections as to jurisdiction of the parties. County of Randolph v. Ralls, 18 Ill. 29. The cases referred to in the brief of the plaintiff in error are a class of cases where the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and are therefore unlike the one at bar. As to the other error assigned and above referred to, we fail to see upon what ground it is based. The statutes cited refer to cases where a default has been taken, and the cause is referred in some cases to the clerk, and in others to a jury to assess the damages. No such state of facts exist here, for the record shows that both parties appeared, and the cause was tried by the probate judge, as by law he could properly, neither party having demanded a jury. It was not an assessment of damages, but a trial of the merits on an issue made. There were some other errors assigned which were not argued, and which we suspect are not relied upon. The judgment of the probate court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

GOOD v. MARTIN.

PROMISSORY NOTE — party indorsing at the time it is made, may become maker

If a party put his name on the back of a note at the time it is made, as surety for the maker and for his accommodation, to give him credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note.

BURDEN OF PROOF — as to when note was indorsed. Prima facie. One whose name is upon the back of a note is to be regarded as an indorser, and if the plaintiff would charge him as maker, the burden of proof is upon him to show that the party to be charged signed his name at the time the note was made, as surety for the maker and for his accommodation, or that the indorser participated in the consideration. Where there was no express agreement between the parties, and the indorser did not participate in the consideration, and it does not appear that he wrote his name on the back of the note before it came to the hands of the payee, the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict.

In order to charge the indorser of the note as maker, it was necessary to show specifically that he put his name upon the back of the note before it was delivered to the payee.

PRESUMPTION arising from indorsement at time note is made. If one put his name on the back of a note at the time it is made and make no statement of his intention in so doing, he is presumed to have done so as the surety of the maker and for his accommodation, and to give him credit with the payee.

WITNESS — competency of payee, in action against indorser, as maker. In an action by the assignee of a note against one whose name appears on the back of the note, charging him as maker, the payee of the note is a competent witness.

PRACTICE — pleadings not to be given to the jury. It is not good practice to allow the jury to take the declaration to their room when they retire to consider of their verdict.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE did not participate in the decision of this cause.

Messrs. J. BRIGHT SMITH & E. L. SMITH, for appellant.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The principal question presented in this record has been the subject of much judicial discussion in the courts of this country, resulting in a difference of opinion, which is exceedingly perplexing. All the courts agree that a liability is incurred by one who, being a stranger to a note, puts his name upon the back of it at the time it is made; but whether he should be regarded as maker, guarantor or indorser, is the point of difference. 2 Parsons' Notes and Bills, 119.

This difference of opinion arises only in cases in which the parties have omitted to express their contract, and have left it to the law to imply a contract upon the naked signature appearing upon the back of the note. Because the signature is upon the back of the note, it is difficult to say that the party intended to become a maker, and because the signature was put upon the note at its inception, and before it gained the legal quality imparted to it by delivery, it is difficult to say that the party intended to assume the liability of indorser only.

We are glad to find that we have been relieved of the labor of deducing a rule from the mass of conflicting authority upon this point by the court which has revisory jurisdiction of our proceedings. The case of Rey et al. v. Simpson, 22 How. 341, was an action upon a promissory note against three parties, two of whom had indorsed the note at its inception, and the point under consideration was fully presented and passed upon by the court. "When a promissory note, made payable to a particular person or order, as in this case, is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time the transaction took place. If he put his name on the back of the note at the time it was made, as surety for the maker and for his accommodation, to give him credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note. On the other hand, if his indorsement is subsequent to the making of the note, and he puts his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as a guarantor. But, if the note was intended for discount, and he put his name on the back of it with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until it was indorsed by the payee, he would be liable then only as a second indorser in the commercial sense, and, as such, would be clearly entitled to the privileges which belong to such indorsers."

And again, "They placed their names there at the inception of the note, not as a collateral undertaking, but as joint promisors with the maker, and are as much affected by the consideration paid by the plaintiff and as clearly liable in the character of original promisors as they would have been if they had signed their names under the name of the other defendant upon the inside of the instrument."

This is, undoubtedly, the law of this territory and of every other territory of the United States, notwithstanding a different rule may have been adopted in some of the States.

We learn from this case that, in order to charge one, whose name is upon the back of a note, as maker, it must appear that the name was placed upon the back of the note at its inception, and that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing the circumstances attending the signing. Prima facie, one whose name is upon the back of a note is to be regarded as an indorser, and if the plaintiff, in an action upon the note, would charge him as maker, the burden of proof is upon him to show that the party to be charged signed his name at the time the note was made, in the language of Rey v. Simpson, "as surety for the maker and for his accommodation, to give him credit with the payee, or that he participated in the consideration for which the note was given." If there is evidence of an express agreement between the parties, of course that will control, but if the plaintiff relies upon the mere act of signing the note upon the back, unaccompanied by any agreement or declaration of intention, then it becomes important to know precisely when the signing took place.

The authorities are explicit upon the point that the signature must be attached at the time the note is made, in order to affect the signor with the liability of maker, by which we understand that the act must be done while the note is in fieri, yet in the hands of the maker, and before it has come to the hands of the payee.

If one put his name upon the back of a note while it is in the hands of the maker, from this act alone it may be presumed that he did so with intent to serve the maker by becoming surety for him ; but if he put his name upon the back of the same note after it has passed into the hands of the payee, we cannot determine from this act alone whether he intended to serve the maker or the payee. Upon looking into the evidence in this cause, we do not find any thing tending to show an express agreement on the part of the appellant with any of the parties, nor does it appear that he shared in the consideration of the note. It seems that the appellee relied upon evidence tending to prove that appellant wrote his name upon the back of the note at its inception. The only witness called (Davidson, the payee of the note), testified that Cheney, Shepard, appellant and himself were present at the making of the note, and that the names were all on it, including, as we understand him, his own, at the time he delivered it to the appellee. We are not informed whether the appellant signed his name upon the back of the note before or after it came into the hands of Davidson, the payee, and, as we have seen, this is material. All the original parties to the note were present at the making of it, and for aught that appears the note may have been delivered to Davidson, and accepted by him, before the appellant became a party to it. If such were the fact, the work of creation was complete when it was delivered to the payee, and no one could become a maker by subsequently indorsing it in blank. It is true that the witness testifies that he would not deliver certain money until the appellant had indorsed a pre-existing note, but who were the parties to that note, and whether the note upon which the action was brought was given in renewal of the other, he does not state. We do not see that the testimony respecting the money is connected with the note here in suit. It is true, also, that he testifies that he cautioned the appellant against putting his name on the note, which shows that the appellant did not sign upon his request, but he also testifies that he was but the nominal payee, his name being inserted by mistake for that of the appellee. If the note was in the hands of Davidson at the time of the indorsement by appellant, the latter may have acted upon the request of the appellee, or he may reasonably have believed that he was to stand between the payee and the appellee as second indorser. But, if he signed after the note was delivered to Davidson, a better reason for withholding from him the character of maker, is found in the fact that at the time he signed, the contract was fully completed, and it cannot be said that he participated in making it, or that the act of signing stands upon the consideration of the note. We hold that, in order to charge the appellant as maker of the note, it was necessary to show specifically that he put his name upon the back before it was delivered to the payee, and if this appear to be a rigid application of the rules laid down in Rey v. Simpson, we say as was said in Clapp v. Rice, 18 Gray, 403, that the doctrine which holds a party who has put his name upon the back of a note liable as maker, is somewhat anomalous, and is not to be extended beyond adjudged cases.

The counsel for appellant insists that, in testifying that he had no interest in the note, and that his name was inserted as payee by mistake, Davidson negatived the condition prescribed in the rule given by the supreme court, to the effect that appellant must have signed for the purpose of giving the makers, Cheney and Shephard, credit with the payee Davidson. As to this it is to be observed that the language of the supreme court is used for the purpose of indicating the possible motives which may have operated upon the mind of the party at the time he put his signature upon the back of the note, and is a statement of the presumption of the law rather than the subject of proof. If one put his name on the back of a note at the time it is made and make no statement of his intention in so doing, he is presumed to have done so as the surety of the maker and for his accommodation, and to give him credit with the payee. If it be said that this presumption is rebutted by the testimony of Davidson, it may be answered that his name was inserted as payee by mistake, the party who was beneficially interested being the appellee. If the appellant signed for the purpose of giving Cheney and Shephard credit with the appellee, and his name was omitted from the note by mistake, Davidson being inserted in its stead, it will not be contended that the want of interest on the part of the latter would relieve the appellant of liability. Objection was made to the competency of Davidson as a witness, upon the ground that he as first indorser was liable to appellant as second indorser. As a recovery must be had against appellant as maker of the note, if at all, in this action we fail to perceive the force of the objection. Upon the point that the jury were allowed to take the declaration with them to their jury room, we think it necessary at this time only to say that it is a practice not to be sanctioned. The pleadings in a cause are for the consideration of the parties and the court and not for the jury. The court below should have granted a new trial because of the insufficiency of the evidence to charge the appellant as maker of the note and for this cause the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PROMISSORY NOTE—INDORSEMENT BEFORE DELIVERY.—The indorser of a note before delivery to the payee, for the accommodation of the maker, and to give him credit with the payee, is liable as a joint maker of the note: Best v. Hopple, 3 Colo. 139; Kiskadden v. Allen, 7 Colo. 208. This doctrine is re-affirmed on a second appeal of the principal case: Good v. Martin, 2 Colo. 220.

HAX et al. v. LEIS.

PRACTICE—computation of time. In computing the time allowed by the district court for filing an appeal bond, the day on which the order was made is to be excluded.

Appeal bond must be filed within the time allowed by the district court.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. G. W. PURKINS, for appellants.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellee.

GORSLINE, J. This is a motion by the appellee to dismiss the appeal for the reason that the appeal bond was not filed within the time limited by the district court. The order was made on the 18th day of December, that the bond should be filed within thirty days. The bond was filed on the 18th day of January following. The rule in the computation of time is, that one day shall be included and one excluded, and the day on which an order is made, as in this case, is the one to be excluded. In computing the time by this rule, the thirty days expired on the 17th day of January, and the bond was therefore filed too late. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. Dismissed.

IN COMPUTING TIME allowed by the district court for filing an appeal bond, the day on which the order was made is to be excluded: Evans v. Bowers, 13 Colo. 514.

CRARY v. BARBER.

SERVICE OF PROCESS must be shown by the record. The record must show that the defendant was duly notified of the proceedings against him, or that he appeared in the district court.

SERVICE OF ATTACHMENT — how made. The statute regulating the service of writs of attachment requires the sheriff to read the writ to the defendant named therein, or to deliver to him a true copy thereof, and personal service cannot be obtained except in one of these ways.

In serving a writ of attachment a sheriff cannot substitute his own language for that of the writ, or cull from the writ such facts as he believes to be material for the information of the defendant, but the language of the writ must be used.

A return to a writ of attachment — That the name of the plaintiff, the amount claimed, and when and where the defendant was to answer the complaint of the plaintiff was read to the defendant, is not sufficient.

NOTICE BY PUBLICATION — what is sufficient. Where the statute requires that notice of the pendency of an attachment suit shall be published in a newspaper for four weeks, it is not sufficient to publish such notice for twenty days.

APPEARANCE for the purpose of objecting to the service of process. If a defendant file written objections to the manner of serving process and limit his appearance to the purpose of the motion, this is not a general appearance in the cause.

APPEARANCE — what amounts to. An order of court which sets out that the parties came by their attorneys, and on plaintiff's motion leave was granted to amend the sheriff's return and the declaration and the cause was continued, does not show a general appearance in the cause by the defendant.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE did not participate in the decision.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for defendants in error.

HALLET, C. J. The motion to dismiss the writ of error has not been argued, and, perceiving no reason for allowing it, we proceed at once to consider the errors assigned. The plaintiff in error claims that he was not served with process or otherwise legally notified of the pendency of suit in the court below. If this is true, the judgment must be reversed, inasmuch as a court has not authority to render judgment without notice to the party to be charged thereby. Nor can we indulge in a presumption that the plaintiff in error was duly notified of the proceedings against him, or that he appeared in the district court in the absence of record evidence of that fact. Rany et al. v. The Governor, 4 Blackf. 2; Anderson v. Brown, 9 Mo. 638.

There were several writs issued out of the district court, all of which were returned non inventus as to the defendant named therein except one, to which the sheriff returned, that the defendant had accepted service and subsequently modified his return as follows: "I do further return that the service made on said defendant, Beebe D. Crary, was made by reading to said Beebe D. Crary the name of the plaintiff in said writ and the amount claimed, and when and where the said defendant was to answer the complaint of the plaintiff."

The statute regulating the service of writs of attachment requires the sheriff to read the writ to the defendant named therein, or to deliver to him a true copy thereof, and it is not contended that personal service can be obtained except in one of these ways. It is said, however, that the sheriff complied with the statute substantially by reading to the plaintiff in error the material facts contained in the writ, but we cannot agree to this. The sheriff said nothing to the plaintiff in error of the ground upon which the attachment issued, the filing of the affidavit and bond and other facts set forth in the writ. But if the contents of the writ had been fully stated to the plaintiff in error, the language of the writ must have been used or the service would not be effectual. The law prescribes the form of the writ, and commands the sheriff to read it, or furnish a copy of it, and this duty must be faithfully performed. We cannot permit a sheriff to substitute his own language for that of the writ, or to cull from the writ such facts as he believes to be material for the information of the defendant named therein and communicate them to him. The law provides for communicating to the defendant in the writ the language of the writ and the whole of it, trusting to his intelligence to comprehend its meaning, and without this there is no service. The principle upon which this point must be decided has been frequently recognized by the courts, and we do not think it necessary to discuss it at length. Maher v. Bull, 26 Ill. 348; Chickering v. Failes, id. 519; Halsey v. Hurd et al., 6 McLean, 14.

A notice of the pendency of the suit was published in a newspaper for twenty days, but as the statute requires such notices to be published for four weeks, it was not claimed upon the argument that such publication was in any way effectual.

The transcript of the record contains a motion filed in the district court by the plaintiff in error, which probably ought not to be noticed, since it has not been preserved in the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise. Pomeroy's Lessee v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Wal. (U. S.) 592; McDonald v. Arnout, 14 Ill. 58; Douglas v. Park et al., 43 id. 146.

If, however, it is claimed that we have cognizance of it, we do not perceive that by filing written objections to the manner of serving the process, the plaintiff in error entered his appearance to the action, especially as he limited his appearance to the purpose of the motion. Malcolm v. Rogers, 1 Cow. 1; Nye v. Liscomb, 21 Pick. 263.

There is an entry in the record as follows :

"This day came the said parties by their attorneys, and on motion of plaintiff, it is considered by the court that the sheriff have leave to amend his return on the writ in this cause, and that said plaintiff have leave to amend his declaration, and that this cause stand continued to the next term of this court."

The question is presented whether such an appearance by the plaintiff in error is shown in this order, as warranted the court in entering judgment against him. It seems that the several orders, here incorporated in one, were made at the instance of the defendant in error. The plaintiff in error, although present at the time the order was entered, asked no relief, but remained a silent spectator of the proceedings. We may say that he assented to what was done upon the motion of the plaintiff below, to wit: the amendment of the declaration and the sheriff's return, and the continuance of the cause; but is there any thing in this showing an intention to submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court? We think not. For aught that appears, he may have intended to object to the regularity of the proceedings, if his adversary should take action prejudicial to him. There is nothing to show his intention, and if we are left to conjecture his object in going there, it is quite as reasonable to suppose that he was there for the purpose of objecting to the insufficient return of the sheriff, as for any other purpose. We do not doubt that a party may submit his person to the jurisdiction of a court, and thus bring himself completely within its power. But such submission is not effected by entering the court room merely and witnessing the proceedings of the court. It may be effected by engaging in the controversy with his adversary, opposing him in the forum with the weapons known to the law, but not by unresisting silence and acquiescence merely. We are aware, that it has been held, that an appearance for the purpose of making a motion will be regarded as a full appearance to the action, unless the mover limits his appearance to the purpose for which he is then in court. It will be seen that such cases are distinguishable from this, inasmuch as in those cases the parties who were held to have entered an appearance were participating in the proceedings and invoking the aid of the court, while here the plaintiff in error asked nothing and did nothing. If one enter the field as a combatant, we may fairly conclude that he was duly notified of the conflict, and fully prepared for it when he came upon the ground. If he stand by calmly awaiting the attack of his adversary, no such conclusion is deducible from his conduct. The voluntary appearance of a party to an action is undoubtedly sufficient to enable a court to proceed to judgment against him according to its recognized methods, but in every case the fact of such appearance ought to be clearly established. The right of every defendant to his day in court is inviolable, and in every case it ought clearly to appear that he has enjoyed it. We find in this record nothing to show that the plaintiff in error was served with process, or that he entered an appearance to the action in the district court, and therefore the judgment of that court is reversed, with costs, and this cause is remanded for further proceedings.

GENERAL APPEARANCE, WHAT CONSTITUTES.—An appearance upon a motion confined to the single object of enforcing a statutory right (as a motion to dismiss an appeal), though not special in form, cannot be considered a general appearance and consequent waiver of that right; Lane v. Nelson, 14 Colo. 412. An order of court granting a continuance without any objection does not amount to a general appearance by a party who did not otherwise appear, and who did not move the continuance: Tapley v. Deane, 3 Colo. 23.

SMITH v. SALOMON.

SURVIVOR—may sue alone upon joint demand. The right of a survivor to sue without joining with the representative of his deceased co-obligee is not limited to cases of partnership.

ACTION—causes of that may be joined. Demands due to a plaintiff in his own right and as survivor of another, may be joined.

DEMURRER too large. Whether a demurrer is general or special, if it go to the whole declaration and there be one good count, it must be overruled.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. Justice GORSLINE did not participate in the decision of this cause.

Messrs. S. E. BROWNE, ALFRED SAYRE & E. L. SMITH, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. In three counts of his declaration the plaintiff in error set out causes of action which accrued to himself and Crocker in the life-time of Crocker, and in three other counts he set out causes of action which accrued to himself only. Counsel for defendant in error admit that this was no misjoinder, but say that according to Jell v. Douglas, 4 B. & Ald. 374, the plaintiff should have shown himself to be the surviving partner of Crocker. The rule that a surviving partner shall declare himself to be such in an action upon a demand due the partnership, appears to be well established, but it is to be observed that the right of a survivor to sue alone without joining the representative of the deceased is not limited to cases of partnership.

“When one or more of several obligees, covenantees, partners, or others, having a joint legal interest in the contract, dies, the action must be brought in the name of the survivor.” 1 Chitty’s Pl. 19.

If the plaintiff and Crocker, although not partners, were jointly interested in the sum to be recovered, the plaintiff may maintain his action for this and other demands accruing to himself alone. Vandenheuvel v. Storrs, 3 Conn. 203; Slipper v. Stidstone, 5 Term. R. 493.

Again, the counts upon indebtedness due the plaintiff alone were certainly good, and as the demurrer was to the whole declaration, it should have been overruled for that reason. Whether a demurrer is general or special, if it go to the whole declaration and there be one good count, it must be overruled. 1 Chitty’s Pl. 664.

The judgment of the probate court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

DOSS v. CRAIG.

UNLAWFUL DETAINER — demand for possession. In an action for unlawful detainer under section 5, chapter 35, Revised Statutes, 838, the plaintiff must aver and prove a demand in writing for possession of the premises which he seeks to recover.

The omission to make such demand is not cured by plea of title in defendant nor by verdict.

Error to Probate Court, Pueblo County.

THE information was filed by Craig in the probate court of Huerfano county and thence removed to Pueblo county by change of venue. Complainant alleged that he was the owner of certain agricultural lands in the county of Huerfano, and that he was in possession of them on the 1st day of February, 1866, at which time he let and demised the same to plaintiff in error for and during the period and term of one growing season or year, which period and term expired on the 1st February, 1867. He further alleged that plaintiff in error held over and detained the said lands, but nothing was averred as to a demand in writing or otherwise. A demurrer to the information was overruled, and defendant below pleaded the general issue and title in himself, upon which issues were joined. At the trial, defendant below asked the court to instruct the jury that "if they believed from the evidence that the defendant did not enter upon the premises alleged in bad faith, and that no notice or demand in writing to quit the premises alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and to deliver the premises and possession thereof to plaintiff, his agent or attorney, or any one for him, was made, in writing, of the defendant, his agent, or any one for him, by the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, or any one for him, they will find for defendant," which being refused, defendant excepted.

Mr. A. A. BRADFORD, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. F. STONE, for defendant in error.

EYSTER, J. (after stating the facts). In order to maintain a suit under the act it is absolutely and essentially necessary that the plaintiff shall have first made a demand in writing for the delivery of the premises in question. Until this is done he can have no relief under the statute. This being the law, it was the duty of the plaintiff, if such demand was made, to set it out in his petition as a substantial fact, as required in section 11 of the act. He does not make any such averment in his petition, and of it the defendant complains. It was contended by the defendant in error that the defendant's plea of title in himself was a waiver of any such right to a written demand for the possession of the premises. This is not the law in this case. A party may, by a plea of title in himself, waive a right to notice of the determination of a tenancy, but in this proceeding a demand in writing for the possession of the premises in controversy is widely different from a notice to terminate a tenancy. It was intended by the legislature by such notice to give the defendant an opportunity to surrender the possession and avoid expensive litigation. It is analogous to the demand required in replevin, and as it relates to the possession of lands, the legislature made it more formal, and provided that it must be in writing. Time is not material, it may be made a month or a day before action brought, but it must be made and it must be in writing. A demand, formal according to all of the requirements of the law, and set out in writing, if read to the party, is not sufficient. It must be made in writing and left with the party or it is no demand. 24 Minor, 192. A party cannot be guilty of wrongful detainer until after this demand has been made upon him. Nor was it cured by the verdict. It is of so important a character in this proceeding that no judgment could be rightly rendered against defendant unless it was alleged in the petition, or the absence of it expressly waived. The judgment of the court below is reversed.

REYNOLDS v. THE PEOPLE.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. It seems that paragraph 17, section 8, article 1 of the constitution of the United States is not applicable to the territories.

POWERS of the federal and territorial governments. The fact that the general government has legislative authority in the territory tends not to diminish or displace the authority of the territorial government but to establish it.

MILITARY RESERVATION — laws of territory operate within. An indictment and conviction under chapter 53, Revised Statutes, for selling spirituous liquor without license, at and within the military reservation of Fort Lyon, is good.

Error to District Court, Pueblo County.

Mr. Justice GOBSLINE did not participate in the decision of this cause.

Mr. H. C. THATCHER, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. F. STONE, District Attorney, third district, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The plaintiff in error was found guilty of a violation of the license law in respect to selling spirituous liquors. The sale was made at and within the military reservation known as Fort Lyon, and it is claimed that the conviction is erroneous upon the ground that the law under which it was had was not, at the time of the sale, operative within that reservation. This theory is founded upon the seventeenth paragraph of section eight, article one of the constitution, by which congress is invested with exclusive legislative authority "over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings."

In terms, this clause refers to places purchased by the consent of the legislature of a State, and therefore within a State, and we are not aware of any instance in which it has been applied to a place not within the limits of a State. In United States v. Bevan, 3 Wheat. 388, the court say of this clause, "It is observable that the power of exclusive legislation (which is jurisdiction) is united with cession of territory, which is to be the free act of the States."

Again, it has been expressly decided that a place, although within a State, is not subject to the legislation of congress under this clause, unless jurisdiction has been ceded by the legislature of the State in which it is situated

The People v. Godfrey, 17 Johns. 226; Olney v. The State, 4 Kan. 49.

It seems that this clause of the constitution has no application to the territories. 2 Story on Con., § 1224, et seq.; 2 Curtis' History of Constitution, 340.

Upon the general proposition, however, that congress has legislative authority in the territory, no doubt can be entertained. When we consider that the territorial government was established by act of congress, we are ready to concede the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Upon authority, also, the point is not to be questioned. American Insurance Company v. Canter, 1 Peters, 511; Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 20 How. 181.

In the case of The American Insurance Co. v. Canter, it is said that, "in legislating for them (the territories), congress exercises the combined powers of the general and of State government."

The power of congress over a territory is exerted in establishing a government to which is delegated authority to legislate upon all rightful subjects. As we had occasion to remark in the case of Franklin v. U. S., ante, 35: "Usually all restrictions upon the powers of a territorial government are found in the organic law by which it is established, but sometimes, as in the law punishing bigamy in the territories, and the law prohibiting slavery and some other acts, this rule has not been followed." The body politic thus created is not a sovereignty but an emanation of federal power, standing upon and subordinate to the authority of the general government. Itself, the creature of the federal government, a territory cannot transcend the power of its superior, nor can the authority of the territory be arrayed against that of the general government. There can be no real conflict between them unless the territory, like the gourd in the fable, which disdained its vine, should attempt to cut down the parent stem upon which it stands. The power of the general government, descending upon the territorial government, is thence diffused by the latter, and there is no question of pre-eminence presented. Every act of the legislative assembly derives its legal force and validity from the organic act, and is subject to disapproval by congress. Indeed, an act of the territorial assembly cannot run into any place of which the federal government has not jurisdiction, for the obvious reason that it proceeds in virtue of the will and power of the latter. We perceive, therefore, that the fact that the general government has legislative authority in the territory tends not to diminish or displace the authority of the territorial government but to establish it. And, as to Fort Lyon, if the general government had no authority there, then, indeed, would the act of assembly be ineffectual in that place; but the general government had full and complete jurisdiction in that place, in virtue of which the territorial act gained force and effect there as well as elsewhere in the territory. This doctrine is not opposed to those considerations which induced the framers of the constitution to give to the general government exclusive control of forts, arsenals, etc., within the several States. If the territorial assembly should attempt to interfere with the functions of the general government in any such place, the act of interference would probably conflict with some act of congress, or it could be made ineffectual by the disapproval of congress.

It is not contended that the legislative assembly was without authority to enact the law upon which the conviction in this cause is based, and we think that law was in force in the reservation of Fort Lyon as well as elsewhere in the territory at the time of the sale by the plaintiff in error.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. GRAHAM.

DISMISSING WRIT OF ERROR—effect. If plaintiff voluntarily dismiss his writ when his cause is regularly before the court, this will operate to affirm the judgment of the court below.

If the writ be dismissed for irregularity therein no such effect will follow.

Where a writ was dismissed for want of a cost bond a new writ may be prosecuted in the same cause.

BOND—execution of, by corporation. The bond of a corporation was executed by an attorney in fact appointed by the president, pursuant to a resolution of the executive committee of the corporation. Upon motion to vacate the order allowing supersedeas, held, that the bond was well executed.

Error to Arapahoe District Court.

UPON motion to vacate order allowing supersedeas and to dismiss the writ of error.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, in support of the motion.

MR. ALFRED SAYRE, contra.

The chief justice did not sit at the hearing.

BELFORD, J. Two points are presented, on which it is claimed that this motion to dismiss the writ of error should be sustained. First, that a former writ of error was sued out in this case, and voluntarily dismissed by the plaintiff in error. It is conceded in the argument that the cause of the dismissal of the first writ of error was the failure of appellant to file a cost bond. The statute provides, section 14, page 153, that in all actions in law and equity when the plaintiff or person for whose use an action is to be commenced shall not be a resident of this territory, the person for whose use such action shall be commenced, shall, before he institutes such suit, file, etc., with the clerk, etc., a bond for costs, and on failure so to do, the cause shall be dismissed. If no action had been taken by the plaintiff in error in reference to the dismissal, it is clear that the court, on motion of the defendant in error, would have struck the cause from the docket.

In the case of Hax v. Leis, post, 187, where the same principle was to some extent involved, we held, that to make a dismissal of an appeal operate as a bar to a subsequent appeal or writ of error, the appeal must have been dismissed, not for a defective record or insufficient bond or the like, but for a failure to prosecute the appeal after it had been regularly and properly in the supreme court. A writ of error is a new suit, and before it can be prosecuted, if the plaintiff in error is a non-resident, he must file a cost bond. If he fails to do so, he has no standing in court; his case cannot be heard on the merits, if objection be made. It is not regularly and properly in court, and by dismissal for a failure to comply with the required conditions on which it can be alone prosecuted, it cannot act as an affirmance of the judgment below, or as a bar to a subsequent writ of error. When a dismissal operates as a bar to subsequent proceedings, the cause dismissed must have been in the appellate court regularly and properly in a position to have been heard upon its merits. And being in this position, if the party fails to prosecute his cause in the appellate tribunal, and the same is dismissed, he must abide the consequences, whatever these may be, and cannot be heard at another time. It may be urged, that in allowing a party who has dismissed one writ of error to sue out another we give encouragement to a loose and careless practice. This may be true, but to adopt any other rule would be attended with the most serious and hurtful consequences to the rights of litigants. 1 Duer, 252; Korth v. Light, 15 Cal. 326; United States v. Pacheco, 20 How. 263. The second ground assigned for the motion is, that the bond or bonds, for there are two, are defective and insufficient. The first bond and the one on which the writ of error was had, and the supersedeas allowed, purports to be executed by the Western Union Telegraph Company, by Alfred Brewer, its attorney in fact. It is objected that there is no sufficient evidence before this court, showing that Alfred Brewer was authorized to execute this bond. The bond bears date June 30, 1869, and was filed and approved the same day. It further appears from an exhibit in the case, that at a meeting of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company, held at the principal office of the company in the city of New York, on the 22d day of May, 1869, a resolution was unanimously adopted by said executive committee, authorizing the president of the company and directing him to make, execute and deliver to Alfred Brewer, of Denver, in Colorado territory, a sufficient power of attorney, in the name and under the seal of the company, authorizing said Brewer, in the name and for the benefit of the company, to execute and deliver any bond, undertaking, security or stipulation in writing, being provided for or required by the laws of Colorado, which it may be necessary to make or give upon the institution or in the prosecution or defense of any and all suits, etc., wherein the telegraph company is a party, which may be now or hereafter brought, etc., in any court of Colorado territory. It further appears from a copy of the by-laws of said company, filed with the bond, that the executive committee shall have the power of the board of directors of the corporation in the management of the business of the company.

Pursuant to the resolution above referred to, the president of the company executed a power of attorney, authorizing Mr. Brewer to make the bond in question, and under and by virtue of such power of attorney, which is filed in the case, the bond was executed. Does this evidence show the consent of the company to Mr. Brewer to execute the bond? We think it does. The evidence, in part, is a transcript of the record of the corporation, and, by that record, the corporation will and must be bound. Even if the facts were different than they appear on the face of the record, that recital must be conclusive on the company. It may be said as to all corporations created by special statutes, that, in the statute of incorporation, either expressed therein, or by reference to the more general statutes respecting incorporations of that character or use, they have an authority and capacity granted therein to establish such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for the well ordering of the affairs thereof. We are, therefore, to look at their rules and their mode of doing business, of well ordering their affairs, which they themselves have adopted, and if they have particularly, or by the rules established, neglected or dispensed with any precautions which, at common law, were deemed essential to the security of the aggregate corporations, if there is sufficient evidence of a common consent, or a just and corporate act, they must be considered as liable when individuals would be injured or deprived of their remedy if any other construction of the doings of the corporation were adopted. While it is true that no individual can represent the corporation in their aggregate capacity, but, in consequence of their consent, still they have powers given them to order their affairs and to appoint and employ agents by votes, or in such other manner as the corporation, by their by-laws, may direct. Hayden et al. v. Middlesex Turnpike Co., 10 Mass. 403; 404. In the case of The American Insurance v. Oakley et al., 9 Paige, 496, it was held by Chancellor WALWORTH that a corporation may be bound by the acts of its agents, although such acts have not been authorized by a deed or power in writing under its corporate seal, or even by a written instrument not under seal, except in cases when, by the statute of frauds or otherwise, the contract, if made by a natural person, must be reduced to writing to be valid. And again he says: "When the president of a corporation authorizes an attorney or solicitor to prosecute or defend a suit, or to commence any legal proceedings in which the corporation is interested, the attorney or solicitor will be authorized to appear for the corporation, and such corporation will be bound by the acts of their attorney, and if the president exceed his authority in retaining such attorney or solicitor, the corporation must look to him for any damages sustained in consequence of such unauthorized act." It is not necessary to multiply the authorities on this point. Under the decision above referred to, how does Brewer stand? As the attorney of the corporation, clothed with the power to prosecute this suit, and to do all things needful for its prosecution; and if the minutes of the corporation were less clear than they are on this subject, still, under the power of attorney executed by the president of the corporation, he would have the authority to execute the bond; and, when executed by him pursuant to such warrant of attorney, it would bind the corporation.

I have not deemed it advisable to discuss the objections made to the second bond, for the reason that, if the first bond is sufficient (and such we adjudge it to be), the supersedeas could not be overruled. Besides, the second bond, if worth any thing, inures solely to the benefit of the defendant in error, and he certainly can have no especial desire to lessen and diminish the number or character of the securities now at his command.

The motion to vacate the supersedeas and dismiss the writ of error will be denied.

Motion denied.

WRIT OF ERROR IS COMMENCEMENT OF NEW SUIT: Webster v. Gaff, 4 Colo. 473.
COST BOND MUST BE FILED.—If an action be commenced or a writ of error sued out without filing a cost bond, the court shall on motion dismiss it: Edgar G. & S. M. Co. v. Taylor, 10 Colo. 112. The language of the statute is unequivocal, and leaves nothing to the discretion of the court: Atley v. Cody, 3 Colo. 221.

HAX et al. v. LEIS.

PRACTICE—former adjudication must be pleaded. Upon motion to dismiss the writ of error, this court cannot determine that the judgment was affirmed on appeal. The former adjudication should be pleaded.

APPEAL—effect of dismissal upon the judgment. If an appeal is dismissed for the reason that the appeal bond was not filed within the time fixed by the district court, this will not operate to affirm the judgment, and a writ of error may be prosecuted to reverse the same judgment.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

UPON motion to dismiss the writ of error.

MR. S. E. BROWNE, in support of the motion.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, contra.

BELFORD, J. The motion made in this case by the defendant, to dismiss the writ of error, has been carefully considered, and we have reached the conclusion that the same cannot be entertained. The ground upon which this motion rests is, that at the July term of the supreme court, A. D. 1869, this cause was pending in this court on appeal. That, on the thirteenth day of that month, the court, on motion of George Leis, dismissed the appeal, and made the following entry of the order on the journal: "It is ordered by the court that the appeal herein be dismissed without day, and that said appellee recover of and from the said appellants the sum of dollars and cents for his costs and charges paid out and expended in his defense in this behalf," etc. It is claimed, that the action of the supreme court in dismissing said appeal operated as a bar to any subsequent proceeding, either by appeal or writ of error. That the dismissal was tantamount to an adjudication on the merits and that the doctrine of res adjudicata must obtain. If this objection was tenable and the dismissal entitled to be regarded as a bar to subsequent proceedings, and did amount to an affirmance of the judgment below, still it is not raised in the proper way. It must be done by plea and not by motion. We are not at liberty to presume that an appeal was taken and dismissed. True, the fact could be ascertained by an inspection of the record, but the proper way to secure an examination of the record, and to take advantage of the facts recited in it, is to plead the judgment previously rendered and to use the record as evidence of it. The fact that an appeal had been taken and dismissed is an issuable fact, one capable of being affirmed on the one side and denied on the other. It is a rule universally recognized by and practiced upon in the courts below, that a party, claiming advantage of a former adjudication, must specially plead it. We do not know of a case where a different practice has been sanctioned or permitted. But we do not desire to rest our decision on this ground alone.

The courts of this country have had repeated occasions to examine the point presented and have uniformly held, that to make a dismissal of an appeal operate as an affirmance of the judgment below, and as a bar to a subsequent appeal or writ of error, the appeal must have been dismissed, not for a defective record or insufficient bond or the like, but for a failure to prosecute the appeal after it had been regularly and properly in the supreme court. In the case of Watson v. Huson, 1 Duer, 252, the supreme court of the city of New York held that a dismissal of an appeal was not an affirmance of the judgment. "A judgment," says Mr. Jus tice DUEB, "affirmed in the court of ultimate jurisdiction, can never again be questioned," and if the effect of the dismissal of the appeal was to preclude any further examination or impeachment of the judgment, it might reasonably be contended that the averment in the complaint, that the judgment was affirmed, is sustained by the admitted fact that the appeal was dismissed, and the learned justice observed that to affirm a judgment was to declare by a judicial sentence of the appellate court its validity, and that it was a legal solecism to say that a judgment had been affirmed, when the question of its validity was exactly that which the appellate court refused to consider. In Karth v. Light, 15 California, 326, FIELD, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The cases in which the dismissal of an appeal will not operate as a bar to a second appeal are those when the dismissal has been made upon some technical defect in the notice of the appeal, or the undertaking, or the like. The bar applies when the dismissal is for want of prosecution, and the order is not vacated during the term, or the dismissal is on the merits." How stands the case before this court? It is conceded that the appeal bond was not filed within the time prescribed by the court, and the appeal was dismissed for that reason. It had never been perfected. There was really no case before the appellate court for trial. The appeal was simply void. The condition necessary to vitalize it was wanting, the bond not having been filed in time. In the case of the United States v. Juan de Pacheco, 20 How. 263, TANEY, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is proper, however, to add, in order to prevent mistake on this subject, that the only effect of docketing and dismissing an appeal under this rule is to enable the party to proceed to execute his judgment in the court below. It removes the bar to further proceedings in that court which the appeal created, and does nothing more, and after the case has been docketed and dismissed, the party against whom the decree was rendered may still, at any time within five years from the date of the decree, take a new appeal in the inferior court."

And again, on page 264, he remarks further: "It follows from what we have said, although the case before us must be docketed and dismissed, yet this will not prevent the United States from filing a transcript at the present term, and docketing the case for argument, if they can show that the delay has not arisen from any fault or negligence on their part, and if they fail to do so, they may yet take another appeal at any time within five years, and bring here the decree of the district court for examination and reversion," and to the same effect will be found the case of the United States v. Gomez, 23 How. 327. It may be proper for us here to inquire as to the effect of a dismissal of an appeal on the rights of a party interested in the bond. We are of the opinion that the dismissal of an appeal for any reason entitles the appellee to have suit on the bond. The very object in exacting a bond is to guard against delay, etc., and to afford to the appellee compensation for a failure to enjoy and reap the immediate fruits of the judgment he has obtained. The covenant is, that the obligor will prosecute his appeal with due diligence. If he fails to file his transcript in time, or neglects to perform any duty requisite and essential to place his case properly before the supreme court, so that the cause can be heard, he is guilty of a breach of his obligation, and the appellee is entitled to an immediate action to recover whatever damages he has sustained by reason of such failure. A different interpretation of the law would lead to fraud and injustice, subjecting creditors in many instances to the entire loss of their debts. Appeals would be taken without an expectation of successful prosecution by principals, and the bonds entered into by sureties without the fear of responsibility. Harrison, etc. v. Bank of Kentucky, 3 J. J. Marsh. 376.

While we are of the opinion that when an appeal regularly taken is dismissed for want of prosecution, the dismissal operates as an affirmance of the judgment below, and a second appeal cannot be allowed, unless during the term or before the remittitur has gone out, the order of dismissal is vacated and the cause re-instated. Chamberlin v. Reed, 16

Cal. 209. Still, we cannot sanction the doctrine that a dismissal for the failure to file a proper bond has that effect, and hence we are compelled to overrule the motion made to dismiss this writ of error. Motion denied.

APPEAL—EFFECT OF DISMISSAL: Western Union Tel. Co. v. Graham, 1 Colo. 123; Freas v. Englebrecht, 3 Colo. 320.

KINNEY v. WILLIAMS.

INSTRUCTIONS must be confined to the law of the case. The existence of facts proper for the consideration of the jury must not be assumed in the instructions of the court.

DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY—to be determined by the jury. Whether exemplary damages shall be awarded in an action of trespass is a question for the jury.

PRACTICE—costs denied. Where a motion for new trial has not been presented in the time and manner directed by the court the party in fault will not be allowed costs.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

THIS was an action of trespass against appellant and others, to recover damages for an assault upon appellee, and for making a loud noise and disturbance in and about appellee's dwelling-house, at various times. There was evidence tending to prove that appellee was severely beaten upon one occasion by appellant, and others of the defendants below. The jury returned a verdict in appellee's favor for $2,500 damages.

The following is the instruction referred to in the opinion of the court:

"The court instructs the jury that they are at liberty to consider the malice of the defendants, the insulting character of their conduct, the rank in life of the several parties, and all the circumstances of the assault, if any was committed, and to award such exemplary damages as the circumstances of the case may, in their judgment, require, and are not restricted to the mere corporal injury of the party."

The cause was tried at the March term of court, and motion for new trial then made. The court directed that written arguments should be filed on this motion by July first, following, which was not done. At the September term the motion was formerly overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict.

Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER, for appellant.

Mr. G. W. PERKINS, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The first instruction given to the jury at appellee's request upon the trial below assumes the existence of facts which should have been left to the jury, and is in conflict with the twenty-eighth section of the practice act. Whether this was a case for exemplary damages was a question for the jury and not for the court. The jury may have understood this instruction as determining this question for them.

For this error the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

If the motion for new trial had been presented in the court below, as directed by that court, there is little doubt that the relief now granted here would have been given in that court, and the expense and delay of this appeal would have been avoided. Because of this neglect, the appellant will not be allowed his costs in this court or in the court below.

The court below is instructed to tax the costs, which have been made by appellant in that court, to him. Reversed.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES, WHETHER PROPER. — In Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 582, the question is raised whether exemplary damages should ever be allowed, and the principal case is cited as an instance in which they were allowed.

SOUDDER v. CLARKE.

BILL OF EXCHANGE — order for lumber is not. An order for lumber, drawn by S. upon R., is not a bill of exchange, and the drawer is not liable upon it.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

EYSTER, J. This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, in the probate court of Arapahoe county, on an instrument in writing, of which the following is a copy, as set forth in the pleadings :

“DENVER, July 22, 1867.

“Mr. Edward Rawlings. Sir : please deliver to Mr. Clarke or bearer four thousand feet of lumber and charge, as agreed, to my account.
EDWIN SOUDDER.”

There were two counts in the plaintiff's declaration. The first was a special count on the instrument, as above set forth, and the second was the common indebitatus assumpsit count for work and labor, goods sold and delivered, etc.

The defendant demurred to the first count of the plaintiff's declaration, and pleaded the general issue to the second count. The court below overruled the demurrer, and the defendant stood by his demurrer and refused to plead. The plaintiff then withdrew the second count, and a jury was sworn to assess the plaintiff's damages on the first count in his declaration. The jury, after hearing the evidence submitted to them on the first count, rendered their verdict, assessing the plaintiff's damages at $100. A motion for a new trial was made by defendant, which was overruled, to which the defendant then and there excepted, and which, with the ruling of the court on the defendant's demurrer, is here assigned for error.

The only question for decision by this court is : Was the instrument sued on a bill of exchange or promissory note ? Was it such an instrument as involved the personal responsibility of the drawer of it ? We think it was not, it was not a bill of exchange, it had not one of the requisites of such an instrument. It was a mere request made by the defendant to Rawlings to deliver to the plaintiff or bearer four thousand feet of lumber and no more. In the case of Mershon v. Withers, 1 Bibb, 503, the supreme court say in reference to a similar case : “The bill in its subject-matter and consequences was not as supposed in the declaration.

It was drawn on a particular fund, it could not make the drawer personally liable, and, therefore, was no bill of exchange according to the custom of merchants; for it is essential to such a bill that it depends upon the personal credit and responsibility of the parties whose names are on it, without such personal credit and capacity to charge the drawer and drawee the bill is not negotiable according to the usage of merchants, and if not negotiable the parties to it are not liable to an action on it."

In the case of Nichols, Administrator, v. Davis, 1 Bibb, 490, the same court say in a case not dissimilar to this, "most clearly it (the instrument in question) does not possess the properties nor is entitled to the privileges of that commercial instrument (a bill of exchange). It is an essential quality of a good bill, that it attach to itself the personal responsibility of the drawer, and be not drawn on the credit of any particular fund. But in the present case the instrument is drawn on the credit of a particular fund and does not involve the personal responsibility of the drawer. It can only be considered as an appointment or authority to the person to whom it is addressed to pay so much out of the particular fund mentioned, which if they refuse to do no recurrence can be had upon the instrument itself to the drawer, but recourse must be had to the original debt (if any such existed), which induced him to make such appointment."

These cases we think are conclusive of the points in this case, and the judgment of the probate court must be reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment on the demurrer of the defendant below, to the declaration of the plaintiff in this suit.

Reversed.

LOVELAND v. SEARS.

JURISDICTION of district and probate courts. District and probate courts, within the limits prescribed to the latter, are of concurrent jurisdiction. CERTIORARI will not lie from a district to a probate court

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Messrs. MILLER & MARKHAM, for appellant.

Mr. E. L. SMITH, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. After judgment in the probate court, the cause was removed to the district court by certiorari, and the latter court quashed the writ upon appellee's motion. In his petition to the district court, the appellant prayed that the writ might be issued in pursuance of the statute, but it is not possible to ground this proceeding upon that act. The act refers to proceedings before justices of the peace, and it is impossible to extend it to probate courts. If, in this instance, the probate judge had been acting as a justice of the peace, there would be some ground for saying that the proceedings were subject to removal according to the statute, but such was not the fact. The cause originated in the probate court, and was not within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. Therefore this writ cannot stand upon the statute, and we will now inquire whether it may stand upon the common law.

By the common law the writ of certiorari lies for the removal of causes from an inferior to a superior tribunal. 1 Tidd's Prac. 398.

Hence the first question arising in every case is as to the jurisdiction of the court from which the writ is issued; for if the court to which the cause is taken is not superior to that from which it is removed, of course the writ is nugatory. In Cass v. Davis, ante, 43, this court held that the district and probate courts, within the time prescribed to the latter, were of concurrent jurisdiction, the supreme court being invested with authority to revise the proceedings of either. It is true that in that case the subject of appeals only is discussed, and nothing is said of the proceeding by certiorari. Nevertheless, the power to review the decisions of probate courts was found to be in the supreme court and not in the district court, and this is decisive of this question. It would be strange indeed if district courts could review proceedings of probate courts upon certiorari when they are unable to proceed to the same result upon appeal or writ of error. The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs. Affirmed.

DISTRICT AND PROBATE COURTS — CONCURRENT JURISDICTION: See In re Rogers, 14 Col. 29, 20, and note to Cass v. Davis, ante, p. 49.

CAROTHERS v. JONES.

FORMER RECOVERY — conclusio. In an action of replevin it appeared that the property in dispute had been the subject of another suit, and the record of that suit being introduced in evidence, a verdict contrary to the judgment in the first suit will not be sustained.

NEW TRIAL — where the verdict is not supported by evidence. In an action of replevin for two mules, a wagon and harness, there was no evidence as to the wagon and harness. A general verdict for the plaintiff will be set aside and a new trial awarded.

Error to District Court, Jefferson County.

JONES brought replevin against Carothers for two horse mules, one set double harness, one large double wagon; each of said mules branded T on the left shoulder, and each about eight years old; one dark brown color, the other a lightish bay color, known as the Tucker mules.

At the trial Arthur McLaughlin testified: He knew property in dispute; it is one span of horse mules, one light bay, one dark brown and branded T on left shoulder, they are known as the Tucker mules; bought in Georgetown of Tucker in September, 1867; property paid for in hay and potatoes. Defendant told me he was to have one-half of the mules if he paid for them; defendant paid nothing, told me he had nothing to do with the mules. Mules worth $400, wagon, $75; harness, $25. Plaintiff kept possession of mules until May 15, 1868; the defendant took possession and kept them till August.

Cross-examination: The defendant got possession of the mules from the sheriff of Park county. I was present at the term of court in Park county in 1868.

Jesse McLaughlin testified: Plaintiff obtained the mules of Tucker, to be paid for in hay and potatoes. Defendant told me he had nothing to do with the mules, that Jones owned them. I was present when parties settled; allowed defendant $30 a month for his work; this took place the last of January, 1868; defendant came with the sheriff and took the mules and replevied them.

Defendant gave in evidence a transcript of record from the probate court of Park county, which record was of a suit between John M. Carothers, plaintiff, and William M. Jones, defendant; declaration in replevin for one dark-brown mule, one bay mule, both branded T on left shoulder, one four-mule wagon and a double harness. This transcript showed a judgment for the plaintiff, that he retain possession of the property replevied, and that he recover his costs of suit, etc. Jesse McLaughlin testified that the mules in controversy, in the probate court of Park county, were branded T on left shoulder, and that one was a dark-brown mule, and the other a light-bay mule. Arthur McLaughlin testified that the property replevied by Carothers in Park county were two large mules, one light-bay, one dark-brown, a double harness and a four-horse wagon.

Mr. JAMES MARSHAL PAUL, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for defendant in error.

BELFORD, J. William M. Jones, the defendant in error, instituted his suit in replevin against John M. Carothers, the plaintiff in error, in the district court of Jefferson county. The property sought to be recovered in this action consisted of two mules, a two-horse wagon and a set of double harness. The property is described in the plaintiff's affidavit as follows: "Two horse mules, one set of double harness, one large double wagon; each of said mules branded T on its left shoulder, one of a dark-brown color and one of a light-bay color, known as the Tucker mules." The defendant, Carothers, filed several pleas, non cepit, non detinet, and one setting up title in himself. The cause was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion was made by the defendant for a new trial, which was overruled and excepted to.

Judgment was entered on the verdict and the defendant appeals to this court.

The errors assigned are two : First, that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence ; second, that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. Appellate courts are very reluctant to interfere with the verdict of a jury, and especially so when there is evidence tending to support it. The jurors have the witnesses before them, hear them testify, observe the manner in which their evidence is given, and are in a better situation to estimate correctly the weight to be attached to their testimony than is a court whose impressions of the evidence are simply drawn from a perusal of the record. For these reasons the supreme court will only interfere when it is clear and manifest that injustice will result from upholding a verdict. From the evidence incorporated into the bill of exceptions, it appears that the mules in controversy were purchased by Jones and Carothers in September, 1867, of one Tucker. These mules remained in the possession of Jones from September, 1867, until May 15, 1868, when they were delivered into Carothers' possession by the sheriff of Park county, by virtue of a writ of replevin. Carothers retained possession until August, 1868, when the mules were taken by the sheriff of Jefferson county and delivered to Jones in pursuance of a writ of replevin, issued out of the Jefferson district court in the suit of Jones against Carothers. To establish his title to the mules, Carothers introduced in evidence a transcript of the record of the probate court of Park county, from which it appears that, at the June term, 1868, of said probate court, Carothers had instituted an action of replevin against Jones for the recovery of one brown mule, branded on the left shoulder with the letter T, also one bay mule branded on the left shoulder T ; also a four-mule wagon and set of double harness. A trial was had, a verdict rendered in Carothers' favor, and it was ordered by the court that the plaintiff in that suit retain possession of the property. Whatever objection may exist to the form of the judgment rendered in the Park probate court, none was made either to its form or validity in the court below. And no cross-errors having been assigned by the defendant in error, I regard said judgment for the purposes of this suit as valid and effectual. Were the mules replevied by Jones in the action below the same mules replevied by Carothers in his suit in the Park probate court? I think there can be no doubt of it, when we compare the description of the property in the two suits. Jones, in his affidavit, describes them as the Tucker mules. The evidence introduced shows conclusively that Jones kept possession of the mules bought of Tucker, until dispossessed by the sheriff of Park county, under the authority of a writ of replevin; that then Carothers obtained possession of these same Tucker mules, and that the mules in controversy in the court below were the identical mules purchased by Jones and Carothers of Tucker in Georgetown, September, 1867.

If the proceedings of the Park probate court are to be regarded as valid, and the title to these mules between these same parties was settled in that suit, then this second action should not and cannot be maintained. The verdict should have been set aside and a new trial awarded. But this verdict cannot be maintained on another ground. The jury found that the plaintiff below was the owner of the wagon and harness; and in that verdict the same was adjudged by the court to Jones. There is not one particle of evidence to sustain this finding; not a single witness testified on the subject. The finding was entirely unauthorized and unwarranted, and to permit such a verdict to stand is to do violence to the rights of property and injury to the principles of justice.

The action of the court below in denying a new trial must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

NEW TRIAL — VERDICT — EVIDENCE. — Where the evidence does not support the verdict, judgment will be reversed and a new trial granted: Kent v. Abel, 12 Colo. 565.

PATTERSON v. GILE.

STAMPS — need not be canceled. An instrument which has been stamped according to the revenue laws of the United States may be read in evidence, although the stamp thereon has not been canceled.

SAME — construction of the act relating to. Whether an instrument is admissible in evidence, under the act of 1864, is to be determined by section 168 of that act as amended (14 Statute at Large, 143).

PLEADING — want of consideration. In an action upon a promissory note, want of consideration must be specially pleaded.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

ASSUMPSIT on a due bill for $365.36. Plea general issue, under which defendant offered evidence of want of consideration, was rejected.

Mr. W. C. KINGSLEY, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. When the due bill, upon which this action was brought, was produced at the trial in the court below, it bore revenue stamps of sufficient amount, but the stamps had not been canceled. The court permitted the attorney of the plaintiff below to cancel the stamps and allowed the instrument to be read in evidence against the objection of the plaintiff in error, who now insists that this ruling was erroneous. By section 158 of the revenue act, a penalty is provided for any violation of the act in respect to the stamping of instruments in cases where the omission or neglect to stamp is with an intent to evade the provisions of the act, and it is also declared that the instrument which is omitted to be stamped with such intent shall be deemed invalid and of no effect. By some courts it has been considered that the omission to stamp an instrument, whether fraudulent or not, will invalidate it. Hugus v. Strickler, 19 Iowa, 414; Maynard v. Johnson, 2 Nev. 16, 25.

But the weight of authority is opposed to this construction, and finds the forfeiture of the instrument to be a penal consequence of a fraud upon the act. Harper v. Clark, 17 Ohio St. 190; Hitchcock v. Sawyer, 39 Vt. 412; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 175; McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Penn. 178.

After a careful study of the act I have not been able to convince myself that the omission to stamp an instrument, under any circumstances, will render such instrument invalid and of no effect, and therefore I do not perceive the importance of ascertaining the intention of the maker in omitting the stamp, except it be with reference to the penalty of $50 prescribed by the act in cases of intentional omission. I comprehend the clause above referred to, which declares that the instrument shall be invalid and of no effect if the omission to stamp it be with intent to evade the provisions of the act, but I find in the same section provisions for stamping all instruments not stamped at their inception, whatever the intention of the maker in omitting to stamp them at the proper time. It is provided "that hereafter, in all cases where the party has not affixed to any instrument the stamp required by law thereon at the time of making or issuing the said instrument," upon complying with certain conditions prescribed by the act, the collector of the revenue for the proper district may affix the stamp, and the instrument "shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued."

Inasmuch as every instrument not stamped may be perfectly stamped under this clause, and thus invested with all its legal attributes, I am not able to say that any unstamped instrument is, for want of the stamp, invalid and of no effect. I understand that an invalid instrument cannot be validated by the simple act of a government officer affixing a stamp. If an instrument be absolutely invalid and of no effect, it must remain so until it receive life at the hands of its authors.

The legal status of an unstamped instrument is not easily defined, but so long as the law admits it to be stamped I cannot regard it as a nullity.

This view is, I think, supported by section 163 of the act which was enacted in 1866, and which prescribes the only condition of the revenue law, upon which an instrument may be admitted as evidence in a court of justice. That section declares :

“That, hereafter no deed, instrument, document, writing or paper, required by law to be stamped, which has been signed or issued without being duly stamped, or with a deficient stamp, nor any copy thereof shall be recorded or admitted or used as evidence in any court until a legal stamp or stamps, denoting the amount of tax, shall have been affixed thereto as prescribed by law.”

Accepting this plain declaration as it is written, it is obvious that the circumstances attending the omission to stamp an instrument are entirely immaterial. If the instrument has not been stamped, it cannot be used as evidence although the omission to stamp it may have been entirely accidental and without any design to evade the act. If it has been stamped by the maker at its inception or by the collector subsequently, as provided in section 158, it is wholly immaterial whether the maker intended to defraud the government of the tax imposed upon the instrument. Under this section but one question can arise concerning an instrument offered in evidence, and that is, whether it has been stamped as the act requires, and upon the answer to this question the instrument should be admitted or excluded. Therefore as I find that, according to section 163, the only question respecting the admissibility of an instrument as evidence is, whether it has been stamped as the law prescribes, and that while section 158 denounces a penalty against a fraudulent omission to stamp an instrument, it also provides for affixing a proper stamp to every instrument which requires it, and which has not been stamped when made. I conclude that the intention of the maker of an unstamped instrument is not material in determining the legal character of such instrument, and that so much of the latter section as appears to establish a different rule must receive a construction which will make it harmonize with the other provisions of the act.

I have attempted to show that an instrument is to be rejected or received in evidence upon the provisions of section 163 of the revenue act, and none others, and if I have succeeded in this, the remaining inquiry is, whether the due-bill in this case was admissible according to the provisions of that section.

When the instrument was offered in the court below it bore sufficient revenue stamps, and although these stamps were not canceled, I think we may fairly presume that they were placed upon the due-bill at the time it was made. Certainly, if the stamps had appeared to be canceled the court would have indulged such presumption, and, because the maker omitted the cancellation, it is somewhat illogical to say that he also omitted to affix the requisite stamps.

The object of the law in requiring the stamp to be canceled, as declared by section 156, is to prevent another use of it, and, while it may be said that the date placed upon the stamp in canceling it, affords some evidence of the time when the stamp was placed upon the instrument, the act does not make it evidence of that fact. The law requires the stamp to be put upon the instrument when the latter is made, and leaves this fact to be proved in the same way that every other controverted fact is proved. If an instrument appears to be stamped, the law will, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, assume the stamps to have been properly affixed, for the reason that it cannot be presumed that any one has attempted a fraud upon the act, until the fact is established by testimony. Assuming that the stamps were placed upon the due-bill when it was made, I think that the provisions of section 163 were observed. The act of stamping an instrument is accomplished by affixing a stamp or stamps denoting the duty imposed by law upon such instrument. The cancellation is another and different act prescribed for another purpose. By the act of stamping, the payment of duty upon the instrument is accomplished; by the cancellation the fraudulent use of the stamp is prevented. I cannot doubt that, if an uncanceled stamp should be removed from an instrument to which it had been properly affixed, with intent to use it again in fraud of the act, the offender would be subject to the penalty announced in section 155. A party guilty of such an offense could never take refuge under the circumstance that the stamp fraudulently used by him lacked cancellation. Therefore the omission to cancel the stamp upon an instrument, while, if intentional, it will subject the party to the penalty of $50.00, prescribed in sections 156 and 158, does not in any way affect the legal character of the instrument, and I respond to the requirements of section 163, by saying that the due-bill in this case was stamped as required by law.

This discussion has been extended beyond the limits required by this case, for the purpose of showing that we are unable to recognize the doctrine promulgated by many State courts, that an instrument required by law to be stamped, may be used as evidence in a court without being stamped. As a territory, we derive our political existence and every political right and privilege that we enjoy from the general government, and therefore we cannot deny the power of that government to legislate upon this subject in this way, as did the supreme courts of Illinois and Massachusetts. Latham v. Smith, 45 Ill. 29; Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452.

We recognize the power of the congress to enact this law, and, according to the one hundred and sixty-third section of the act, we will require every instrument to be stamped according to the provisions of the act before it is used as evidence.

Another question presented in this record, and strongly urged by the counsel for plaintiff in error, has been determined in the State of Illinois, and we are disposed to adopt the ruling of that court. It has been the practice in this territory, since the present statute relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes was enacted, to plead a want or failure of consideration specially, and since the statute is not very clear upon this point, we think it better to uphold the rule which has been hitherto observed than to attempt to change it. The supreme court of Illinois was evidently influenced by a desire to maintain the rule as it had been understood and practiced by the profession, and we may, with propriety, act upon the same consideration. Rose v. Mortimer, 17 Ill. 475.

If the statute were opposed to this rule, of course we should be compelled to abandon it. But the statute groups together the several defenses of want and failure and partial failure of consideration, and declares that they may be pleaded, and, inasmuch as it was certainly intended that partial failure of consideration should be specially pleaded, we may say that it was also intended that want or failure of consideration should be specially pleaded. At all events the profession have so construed the act from the first, and we will not now seek a new construction. The judgment of the probate court is affirmed, with costs. Affirmed.

PLEADING—WANT OF CONSIDERATION.—In an action upon a promissory note, want of consideration must be specially pleaded: Munro v. King, 3 Colo. 240.

LONGAN v. CARPENTER.

MORTGAGE—not assignable at law. The assignee of a mortgage has no remedy upon it at law, except it be treated as an absolute conveyance and the mortgagee convey the premises by deed.

Same—assignable in equity. But if a promissory note secured by mortgage is assigned, the assignee will hold the mortgage subject to the equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagee at the date of the assignment.

MORTGAGE ASSIGNED—rights of parties. At law the innocent holder of a negotiable note may recover the amount thereof; but if the note is secured by mortgage and the holder seeks to foreclose the mortgage, the mortgagor can avail himself of any payments made to the mortgagee before the assignment.

A promissory note secured by mortgage and by pledge of personal property was assigned before maturity to a bona fide purchaser. Previous to the assignment a portion of the pledged property was sold by the payee, but no credit was indorsed on the note. In a suit by the assignee to foreclose the mortgage, held, that the mortgagor was entitled to be credited with the amount realized by the payee from the sales of the pledged property.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

APPELLER filed his bill to foreclose a mortgage given by appellant to Jacob B. Carpenter. He alleged that the mortgage was given to secure a note for $980, dated March 5, 1867, payable six months after date at the Colorado National Bank to Jacob B. Carpenter or order, that on the 24th of July, 1867, Jacob B. Carpenter assigned the note and mortgage to him.

Appellant in her answer denied all knowledge of the assignment and averred that, at the date of the mortgage, in addition to the mortgage security, she delivered to J. B. C. as collateral and further security for the sum of money specified in the note and mortgage, 103 sacks of good merchantable wheat flour then of the value of \$1,236, and 7,500 lbs. of wheat then of the value of \$450, which, she alleged, said J. B. C. agreed to sell and apply to the payment of the sum due him on said note and mortgage; or, if not sold, to return on payment or tender of payment of the sum of money specified in the note and mortgage. Appellant also alleged, that, at the maturity of the note, she tendered the sum of \$1,180 at the Colorado National Bank in payment of the note, and demanded the return of the note and mortgage and the flour and wheat to her, which was refused. Appellant averred further, that J. B. C. appropriated the said flour and wheat, of the value of \$1,686, to his own use and refused to account therefor. The master found that there was due upon the note and mortgage \$1,622.68. At the hearing, the deposition of William Longan was read. He testified that the mortgaged premises belonged to his mother, the appellant; that appellant borrowed from J. B. C. \$980, and gave the mortgage and 100 sacks of flour and 7,520 or 7,530 lbs. of wheat as security; that the flour and wheat were in a house on Blake street belonging to Williams & Miller, and that J. B. C. took Williams & Miller's receipt for it; that J. B. C. authorized witness and his brother to take the flour and wheat to the mountains and dispose of it, if they would pay to Williams & Miller the market price for the same in Denver; that Williams & Miller should indorse the amount so paid on the note. That, in the latter part of April or 1st of May, 1867, witness got 560 or 600 lbs. of wheat from Williams & Miller and paid them $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. for it; that this was a portion of the wheat given to J. B. C. as aforesaid; witness at other times got flour of the same lot and paid Williams & Miller therefor at \$8.50 a sack; witness could not tell the exact number of sacks he got; in July, 1867, Williams & Miller failed in business and witness found a lot of the flour and wheat being disposed of; witness went to J. B. C. and tried to get him to save the wheat and flour. J. B. C. stated that he was not going to get himself in any law suit about it, and declined to take any steps about the matter; said that he was sufficiently secured by the mortgage and that he would give the warehouse receipt for the flour and wheat back to witness; that he would assign the receipt to witness so that he could go and get the flour and wheat.

Witness further stated that, after Williams & Miller failed, Mr. Miller of that firm told him that J. B. C. was the owner of the flour and wheat, and that he would account to him alone for it, which he had done, and that J. B. C. had authorized its disposal, and that witness would look at Williams & Miller's books and they would show just what had been done with the flour and wheat. Witness told J. B. C. what Miller had said, and J. B. C. said he would give witness the receipt. When witness asked him where it was, he said witness would have to go to his lawyers as they had his papers. On cross-examination witness stated: The wheat and flour was in the warehouse of Williams & Miller before the loan was made; that we had before that time borrowed money, about $600, on the flour alone; the first loan was about sixty days before that of J. B. C.'s was made; the grain and flour belonged to witness and his brother; the warehouse receipt was given to Mr. Kountze as security for the first loan; the old warehouse receipt was taken up, with the money borrowed of J. B. C., and the first loan so paid off.

Jesse B. Longan testified that he pledged the flour and grain to J. B. C. as security for the payment of the note; security by way of mortgage, that that security qualifies the rights of the mortgagee and those claiming under him, and that, when an action is brought to foreclose the mortgage, that that instrument, together with the note secured thereby, passes into the category of obligations to which defenses and equities may attach and be made available into whosoever hands they fall. We are free to admit that this question is surrounded with great difficulties, and deeply regret that no settled and uniform rule exists in this country on the subject. The supreme courts of Wisconsin, Michigan and Illinois, so far as we have been able to discover, are the only courts that have passed upon the matter in controversy. In Illinois, the rule is laid down as claimed by the appellant. They hold there that, although the note secured by the mortgage is negotiable, still it is open to whatever defenses existed against the mortgagees. A different rule obtains in Wisconsin and Michigan. Amid this conflict of authorities, we feel at liberty to choose our course, and shall endeavor to follow that which, in our judgment, is recommended by the better reason. What relation does a mortgage sustain to a note secured by it? In one sense, it is a mere incident to the debt. He who owns the note owns the mortgage. The assignee of the former is entitled to the benefits of the latter, although the assignee did not know of its existence. Kyes v. Wood, 21 Vt. 331. But it must be borne in mind that these principles are the outgrowth of equity, and equity alone. At common law, choses in action were not assignable. For the convenience of commerce, by the statute of Anne, in England, certain choses in action were made assignable, so as to vest in the assignee the legal title, as promissory notes or bills of exchange. We have a statute to the like effect, which prescribes that any promissory note, bill, bond or other instrument in writing, whereby one person promises to pay another any sum of money or article of personal property, or sum of money in personal property, shall be assignable by indorsement thereon.

The mortgage, to foreclose which this bill was filed, was given to secure the payment of a promissory note which was assigned by the payee and mortgagee to the complainant. This was in equity an assignment of the mortgage. The note was assignable by the statute, but the mortgage is not nor is it assignable by the common law. The assignee of a mortgage has no remedy upon it by law, except it be treated as an absolute conveyance, and the mortgagee convey the premises by deed. The 22d section of the statute, page 377 (Revised Statutes of Colorado), provides that if default be made in the payment of any sum of money secured by the mortgage on lands and tenements duly executed and recorded, it shall be lawful for the mortgagee, his executors or administrators, to sue out a writ of scire facias, etc. Here the remedy is specifically confined to the mortgagee, his executors or administrators. The assignee cannot proceed at law and sue out a scire facias. To avail himself of his mortgage security he is driven to the court of chancery. His remedy is purely equitable, and seeking equity he must be willing to do equity. He who buys that which is not assignable at law, relying upon a court of chancery to protect and enforce his rights, takes it subject to all infirmities to which it is liable in the hands of the assignor, and the reason is, that equity will not lend itself to deprive a party of a right which the law has secured him, if such right is intrinsically just in itself. "Mortgages," says Chief Justice CATON, in Olds v. Cummings, 31 Ill. 192, "are not commercial paper. It is not convenient to pass them from hand to hand, performing the real office of money in commercial transactions as notes, bills and the like. When one takes an obligation secured by a mortgage, relying upon the mortgage as security, he must do it deliberately, and take time to inquire if any reason exists why it should not be enforced. While he may take the mere promise to pay the money as commercial paper and depend upon the personal security of the parties to it, it may be said to be a distinguishing characteristic of commercial paper, that it relies upon personal security, and is based upon personal credit. It is a part of the credit system, which is said security by way of mortgage, that that security qualifies the rights of the mortgagee and those claiming under him, and that, when an action is brought to foreclose the mortgage, that that instrument, together with the note secured thereby, passes into the category of obligations to which defenses and equities may attach and be made available into whosoever hands they fall. When one takes an obligation secured by a mortgage, relying upon the mortgage as security, he must do it deliberately, and take time to inquire if any reason exists why it should not be enforced. While he may take the mere promise to pay the money as commercial paper and depend upon the personal security of the parties to it, it may be said to be a distinguishing characteristic of commercial paper, that it relies upon personal security, and is based upon personal credit. It is a part of the credit system, which is said to be the life of commerce, which requires commercial investments to pass rapidly from hand to hand. Mortgage securities are too cumbersome to answer these ends. The note itself, though secured by a mortgage, is still commercial paper, and when the remedy is sought upon this, all the rights incident to commercial paper will be enforced in the courts of law. But when the remedy is sought through the medium of the mortgage; when that is the foundation of the suit, and the note is merely used as an incident to ascertain the amount due on the mortgage, then the courts of equity, to which resort is had, must pause and look deeper into the transaction and see if there be any equitable reason why it should not be enforced. He who holds a note and also a mortgage holds in fact two instruments for the security of the debt; first, the note with its personal security, which is commercial paper, and as such may be enforced in the courts of law, with all the rights incident to such paper; and the other, the mortgage with security on land, which may be enforced in the courts of equity, and is subject to the equities existing between the parties. The right of an assignee to set at defiance a defense which could be made against the assignor is an arbitrary statutory right, created for the convenience of commerce alone, and must rely upon the statute for its support, and is not fostered and encouraged by courts of equity."

This doctrine, so clearly enunciated by Chief Justice CATON, is re-asserted and enforced by Chief Justice WALKER in the case of Walker v. Dement, 42 Ill. 273. In delivering the opinion in this latter case he says, that while the purchaser of a note before maturity without notice will be protected against all defenses to the note, still, if it is secured by mortgage or other collateral security, the assignment will not cut off prior equities against the mortgage or collateral fund, although they might be secret and latent. There are many cases in which assignees have been protected against latent equities of third persons, whose rights and even names do not appear upon the face of the mortgage, and the reason is, that it is the duty of the purchaser to inquire of the mortgagor if there be any reason why it should not be paid ; but he should not be required to inquire of the whole world to see if some one has not a latent equity which might be interfered with by his purchase of the mortgage, as for instance a cestui que trust.

In the case of Merry v. Sylburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 441, Chancellor KENT said :

“It is a general and well-settled principle that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to the same equities it was subject to in the hands of the assignor. But this rule is generally understood to mean the equity residing in the original obligor and not an equity residing in some third person against the assignor.” In Westfall v. Jones, 23 Barb. 10, the court said :

“Does the plaintiff, being a bona fide purchaser and assignee of the bond and mortgage, stand in any better condition than the person from whom he derived his title? It is a well-settled principle that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to all equities which existed against it in the hands of the assignor.” The same rule is laid down in Pennsylvania in Mott v. Clark, 9 State, 399, and in Prior v. Wood, 31 Penn. St. It may be objected to these decisions, that the mortgage in each of the cases was given to secure a bond, and that the bond having no commercial character, the party taking an assignment would, as a matter of course, take the mortgage burdened with infirmities which the statute prescribes shall not apply to negotiable notes transferred before due.

These cases are made to rest on another and different ground, namely, that the proceeding was on the mortgage itself, and there being no express statutory provision authorizing the assignment of the mortgage. But it may be urged that the mortgage is accessory to the note, that it is attached to it, and being so attached, it is, and must remain, inseparable. This is true as long as both instruments remain in the hands of the mortgagor. But when he assigns the note there is in law a separation. The assignee can take his note into a court of law and recover a judgment upon it, but he cannot take the mortgage there; he cannot claim the benefit of it there. He is confined simply to his remedy on the note. Whatever judgment he recovers is purely a personal one. He will not be heard to say that the maker of the note pledged a special fund, out of which the debt must be satisfied. The court could reply, and with reason, whatever your rights may be in equity, one thing is certain, there is no law authorizing your assignor to transfer to you the mortgage. It does not follow you into this court. How is it when he brings his action on the mortgage in a court of equity? Then the mortgage is the foundation of the suit, and the remedy sought is the foreclosure of the equity of redemption. The note is used to compute the amount; it has no other office to perform. The mortgage in one sense, and in an important one too, has a character of its own. If one holds a note, against which the statute of limitations has run, and also a mortgage or pledge of real or personal property to secure it, he cannot sue on the note, but he can take and hold possession of the property, and sell it if it be personal property, with proper precautions, and if real property, he can have a bill in equity to foreclose his mortgage, and if his lien fails to pay the whole of his debt, he loses the remainder, because he can have no action upon it, although he may have proper process founded upon the debt and security to establish his lien and make it available in the payment of his debt. A mortgage may be enforced so long as it is available, although the debt secured by it is barred by the statute of limitations. Parsons on Contracts, vol. 2, 379; 20 Mo. 482; Angell on Limitations, 77, 78. It is also well established that, if a legal tender is made of money due on a bond and mortgage to the mortgagee, or his assignee or attorney, which is refused, the land is discharged from the mortgage though the debt remains. Jackson v. Bowers, 18 Johns. 110; 6 Hill, 66; 21 Wend. 467; and 26 id. 541. Does not this indicate that the mortgage and the instrument which it secures have separate and independent characters? This is sufficient to show that it has a character of its own. But it may be urged, if this had been an action at law on the note itself, that the assignee could not have been chargeable with equities or defenses, which might have existed against the same in the hands of the assignee or original payee, and of which the complainant was ignorant at the time of assignment, and that it being commercial paper he could have obtained judgment for the full amount expressed in the note, and on execution this same land described in the mortgage might have been levied on and sold to satisfy the same. Admitting this to be true, yet in this case the purchaser of the land under the sale would hold it subject to the mortgagor's right of redemption. Thornton v. Pegg, 24 Mo. 247. There is a reason why in an action on the note he would be entitled to recover the full amount, namely, a court of law cannot take cognizance of equities that in a court of chancery would not only be recognized but rigorously enforced. The books are full of cases where a judgment has been rendered in a law court against a defendant one day and the same judgment enjoined by a court of chancery the next.

It is true that the principles governing and controlling a court of chancery are as fixed and certain as are those which control a court of law, and one of those principles governing a court of chancery is, that he who invokes its equitable powers must be ready to do equity. But this discussion has already been protracted to a sufficient length. What was the equity of the mortgagor in this case? What relation did Jacob B. Carpenter sustain to the wheat and flour received by him as security in addition to the mortgage, and how far is the complainant affected thereby? We think it was a pledge. The contract of pledge is a bailment or delivery of goods and chattels of one man to another, to be holden as a security for the payment of a debt or the performance of an engagement, and upon the express or implied understanding that the thing deposited is to be restored to the owner as soon as the debt is discharged or the engagement has been fulfilled. The contract is to be distinguished from the contract of hypothecation by the transfer of the possession or the delivery of the thing intended to be charged to the creditor, and from the contract of mortgage by the absence of a transfer of the ownership and right of property thereof in the premises during the continuance of the trust. If the thing intended to be burdened with the debt or charge remains in the possession and under the disposition of the owner, there is no pledge. By a pledge, therefore, of the goods and chattels the right of possession is altered, but not the right of property. Was the wheat and flour in the possession and under the control of Jacob B. Carpenter? He had the receipt of the warehousemen for it. Mahala Longan could not have conveyed the same to any one freed and discharged from his lien upon it. Miller & Williams, the warehousemen, were liable to him, on their receipt, for the amount expended on it. If any one had carried away and converted the wheat to his own use, Carpenter could have maintained an action for it, and the production of the receipt in evidence would have been proof of his title. Part of this wheat and flour, while in the possession and under the control of Jacob B. Carpenter, and before the assignment of the note, was sold, and the money paid to Miller & Williams, his depositaries. He recognized them as his agents by accepting their receipt, and the money paid by them for the wheat and flour sold was equally under his control, and could have been collected by him. If he failed to apply this money on the payment of the note and mortgage, and allowed it to remain in their hands until it was dissipated and squandered, he must suffer the loss, not Mahala Longan, who had no right to the possession of it. And if, in an action by Jacob B. Carpenter, Mahala Longan would have been entitled to recoup the amount of money paid to Miller & Williams for the wheat pledged, under the rule we have announced in this opinion, his assignee stands in no better position, and this money, so paid, must operate as a satisfaction, pro tanto, of the note and mortgage. As to the wheat and flour that remained in the hands of Miller & Williams at the time of the assignment of the note to the present complainant, we express no opinion further than to say, that it never passed to B. Platte Carpenter, and that, if any liability attaches to any one, it must be to Jacob B. Carpenter, and on his liability we purposely refrain from expressing any opinion.

For the failure of the court below to allow credit on the mortgage for the wheat sold prior to the assignment of the note, this case must be remanded and reversed. It is accordingly reversed, with costs, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

HALLETT, C. J., dissenting. Mahala and Jesse B. Longan made their negotiable promissory note of date March 5, 1867, payable to J. B. Carpenter six months after date. To secure this note Mahala Longan mortgaged to J. B. Carpenter certain lands in Jefferson county, and the note and mortgage having been assigned to the appellee before the maturity of the note, this bill was filed to foreclose the mortgage.

The defense set up by the appellant in her answer is, that at the time the note and mortgage were given she pledged to J. B. Carpenter certain wheat and flour, and that at the maturity of the note she tendered the amount due upon it at the Colorado National Bank, where it was left for collection, and demanded the note and mortgage, as well as the wheat and flour.

The answer was put in without oath, the verification being waived by the complainant in his bill according to the statute, and therefore evidence is required to support its averments. In the first place it is to be observed, that the evidence does not support the allegation that the appellant gave to J. B. Carpenter the wheat and flour as security for the payment, but shows on the other hand, that this wheat and flour was pledged by William and Jesse B. Longan. It is true that William Longan testifies that the appellant gave the personalty as additional security, but this statement is overborne by the other testimony in the case. Upon the whole testimony it appears that William and Jesse B. Longan were the owners of the flour and wheat, and at the time the note was made the property was in the warehouse of Williams & Miller, where it had been placed for safe-keeping. William and Jesse B. Longan had previously obtained a loan upon the same property, and as the greater part of the money obtained from Carpenter was to be applied to the payment of this pre-existing indebtedness, the same property was at first offered as security for the note in this case. This security being refused by Carpenter, the mortgage in this case, together with the pledge of the personal property, was offered as security for the note and accepted. Jesse B. Longan testifies that he gave the personalty to Carpenter as security for the note, and that the money was borrowed for himself and his brother. The whole testimony shows that Mahala Longan became a party to the transaction for the purpose of mortgaging her real estate to secure the payment of the money borrowed by her sons, that she was not the owner nor was she in possession of the personal property, and that the latter, if pledged at all, was pledged by the sons and not by the mother. Hence it is not true, as alleged in the answer, that the appellant gave to J. B. Carpenter personal property as security for this note, and the proof failing to support the allegation, the defense must be rejected. Gresley's Eq. Ev. 232.

Accepting these facts as if they were well pleaded, and assuming, what is by no means clear upon the evidence, that the amount due upon the note was tendered at its maturity, how was the appellant entitled to demand the possession of the personalty upon the payment of the note? Surely upon the extinguishment of the note the property would revert to the pledgors, William and Jesse B. Longan, and the appellant would be no more entitled to the possession then than before the pledge was made.

Again, the rule which makes the assignment of a mortgage subject to the equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagee is expressly confined to such equities only, and cannot be extended to equities existing between the mortgagee and third parties. James v. Morey, 2 Cowen, 297.

In this case the personalty was pledged by Wm. and Jesse B. Longan, and whatever their rights against J. B. Carpenter, the appellant is a stranger to them. This doctrine is recognized by the court in this case, but I do not perceive that any attempt has been made to apply it. It is true that there is evidence in the record tending to prove an agreement, respecting the wheat and flour, between the pledgors and the pledgee, to the effect that the property might be sold to the pledgors by the warehousemen and the proceeds applied to the payment of the note, and, also, that some of the property was sold according to this agreement. If J. B. Carpenter was responsible for the money thus received, probably this was a payment upon the note which, according to the view of my brethern, would inure to the benefit of the appellant. But conceding this, the appellant should have set up the payment in her answer. She has pleaded a tender of the whole amount due upon the note, and complains that the pledged property and the note and mortgage were not surrendered to her when the tender was made, and to this defense she must be confined. If, under such an answer, a party may show payment, every other defense is equally open, and the rule which requires correspondence between proof and allegation may as well be annulled.

I come now to consider, whether the innocent holder of negotiable paper secured by mortgage may recover upon the mortgage the amount due upon the note in his hands, or is limited to the amount which might be recovered by the mortgagee if the suit were instituted by him. Upon this question there is some conflict of opinion, but I think that the weight of authority and the better reason are opposed to the views of my brethren in this case, and therefore I reluctantly proclaim my dissent from the opinion of the court.

The nature of a mortgage and its relations to the indebtedness it is intended to secure are pretty well understood at this day, and do not demand much discussion. In Martin v. Mowlin, 2 Burr, 978, Lord MANSFIELD said :

“A mortgage is a charge upon the land, and whatever will give the money will carry the estate in the land along with it to every purpose. The estate in the land is the same thing as the money due upon it.”

So, also, KENT, C. J., in Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 43 :

“Until foreclosure, or, at least, until possession taken, the mortgage remains in the light of a chose in action. It is but an incident to the debt, and in reason and propriety it cannot and ought not to be detached from its principal. The mortgage interest, as distinct from the debt, is not a fit subject of assignment. It has no determinate value. If it should be assigned, the assignee must hold its interest at the will and disposal of the creditor who holds the bond. Accessorium non ducit sed sequitur principale.”

To the same effect are all the authorities and no one can now be found to question the doctrine that a mortgage is a mere incident to the indebtedness it is intended to secure, inseparable from it and incapable of existence without it. It is a truism of the law that a mortgage is a security for indebtedness accompanying the latter through all hands, and ultimately sharing the same fate. This rule which identifies the security with the indebtedness in my opinion requires, that the remedy upon the security shall be co-extensive with the demand. When this is denied the mortgage is divested of its character as a security to the extent of such denial. By the mortgage contract a lien is given upon property for the payment of certain indebtedness, and if the indebtedness be withdrawn from the lien, or if the existence of the lien be denied for causes dehors the mortgage, that instrument is divested of its essential quality in the face of its express provisions. That is no security for indebtedness which will not come up to the point of contributing to its payment, and a mortgage intrinsically good, which falls short of the measure of its principal, is a paradox unknown to the law. To illustrate, let us look for a moment at the present case. A negotiable note secured by mortgage was indorsed to appellee before maturity upon a valuable consideration. It does not appear that the pledged property was delivered to appellee, or that he had any knowledge of it, so that no notice need be taken of that feature of the case. Neither law nor equity will deny to the appellee, as a bona fide holder for value, the full amount of the note when that instrument is presented. But it is said, that the action being to foreclose the mortgage, the amount of the note must be diminished by the sum received by the payee or his agents before the assignment to appellee. The mortgage is, in itself, valid and effectual, according to its legal character as a security for the indebtedness evidenced by the note. The note is intrinsically good, and, in the hands of the appellee, constitutes a demand against the appellant, for the amount expressed upon its face. Each instrument is perfect in itself, the one as a demand against appellant, the other as security for that demand, and yet when united, and a remedy to enforce the lien is sought, the security of the mortgage is denied as to a portion of that demand. In other words, the mortgage has ceased to be a security as to part of the indebtedness evidenced by the note, its express provisions to the contrary notwithstanding. It appears to me that the mortgage having been made as a security for the payment of the note, it ought to stand as a security for the whole note, extinguishable only upon payment of the whole amount recoverable upon it. Any other view is opposed to the rule which unites the mortgage to the indebtedness inseparably and gives them a common existence.

In this connection I will ask attention to the language of the supreme court of Wisconsin upon this subject.

“The doctrine that an assignee can enforce the mortgage for no more than is justly and actually due between the mortgagor and the mortgagee had its origin at a time when the practice of giving mortgages as collateral security for the payment of negotiable paper was wholly unknown, and was made to rest upon the ground that such would be the rule adopted in a suit at law, upon the covenant or bond to which the mortgage was collateral, and the assignee should stand no better in equity than at law. The reason of the rule being, that because, in a suit at law for the use of the assignee upon the bond or covenant to collect the debt, a recovery cannot be had for a greater sum than is actually due from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, and therefore no more shall be recovered in equity in an action to foreclose the mortgage, or that the parties as to rights and remedies shall stand upon the same footing in both courts; it follows, as a logical conclusion, that when the nature of the instrument evidencing the debt and the circumstances of the transfer are such, that in a suit at law upon it against the mortgagor the assignee can enforce its payment regardless of any equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagee, he should have the same rights and remedy in equity. The reason of the rule ceasing in the case of negotiable securities transferred before maturity and without notice, the rule also ceases. The debt is the principal thing, the mortgage the incident, the transfer of the debt carries with it the mortgage. It is the debt which gives character to the mortgage and fixes the rights and remedies of the parties under it, and not the mortgage which determines the nature of the debt." Croft v. Bunster, 9 Wis. 509. See, also, Dutton v. Joes, 5 Mich. 519; Reeves v. Scully, Walker's Ch. 248.

Another consideration of great weight ought not to pass unnoticed. It is conceded that the appellee may recover in an action at law, upon this note, that portion of his demand which is denied to him in this proceeding. It was said by HOSMER, C. J., in Clark v. Beach, 6 Conn. 159: "The equitable doctrine concerning the rights of mortgagor and mortgagee has gradually been naturalized in the common-law code, and by the adoption of principles long established in chancery, and tenaciously adhered to, the suitors are not driven from one bar by increased litigation and expense to obtain infallible relief at another."

The policy of the law here defined has not, I think, been heeded in this case. The appellant is protected from the payment of a portion of the appellee's demand, to which she must hereafter respond in a court of law, while the appellee is driven from this bar by increased litigation and expense to obtain infallible relief at another. The case of Olds v. Cummings, 31 Ill. 188, is the authority upon which the decision of this court is based, and that case is grounded upon the assumption that a foreclosure suit is brought upon a mortgage only. The court in that case say :

"The note itself, though secured by a mortgage, is still commercial paper, and when the remedy is sought upon that, all the rights incident to commercial paper will be enforced in the courts of law. But when the remedy is sought through the medium of the mortgage, when that is the foundation of the suit, and the note is merely used as an incident to ascertain the amount due upon the mortgage, then the courts of equity to which resort is had must pause and look deeper into the transaction, and see if there be any equitable reason why it should not be enforced."

Upon this I submit that a foreclosure is founded upon the indebtedness as well as the mortgage. A court of equity will not, and in the nature of things cannot, permit a mortgagee to recover unless he is the holder of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage. 1 Hill. on Mort., ch. 11, § 5.

Whether the proceeding be at law or in equity, the indebtedness is the principal thing, for both remedies are designed to enforce payment of the money. I concede that the remedy at law is upon the note alone, but it is equally plain that the suit in equity is founded upon the note and mortgage, and that each is essential to the right of recovery. The indebtedness is the incumbrance and the mortgage is the means by which the incumbrance is attached to the estate. If either be removed, there is nothing remaining upon which the court can act. In a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage it is the duty of the court to ascertain the amount of the indebtedness, as well as to enforce the lien upon the mortgaged property for its payment, and while the mortgage will show the lien it is rarely evidence of the indebtedness. Sometimes a covenant for the payment of the money is inserted in the mortgage, but usually a bond, note or other separate instrument is executed for the purpose of showing the amount of the indebtedness. Where the indebtedness is evidenced by a separate instrument a court of equity is as much bound to give effect to that instrument as to the mortgage. In this case the note is evidence of the amount of the indebtedness just as the mortgage is evidence of a lien upon certain property for the payment of that indebtedness, and the court is bound to give effect to the first as well as the second. The note is the legal and unquestionable evidence of the indebtedness as the mortgage is evidence of the lien, and each according to its office determines the rights of the parties. It is impossible to say that there is any thing due upon the mortgage disconnected from the note for the reason that the note alone determines the amount of the indebtedness.

The supreme court of Illinois say that the note is "merely used as an incident to ascertain the amount due upon the mortgage," but it is plain that no such use was made of the note in that case. The note called for the amount expressed upon its face, but the court refused to recognize the demand. The mortgage referred to the note as the standard of indebtedness, but the court rejected the note in violation of the express language of the mortgage. And this was done for the avowed purpose of protecting the mortgagor from making payment to the innocent holder of negotiable paper. I am not able to perceive that the former occupies a higher position in a court of equity than the latter, or that there is any reason for setting aside the rules of law applicable to commercial paper in cases of this kind.

The opinion of that court as well as that announced by this court is open to other criticism, but I think that I have shown that the ruling of the district court was correct, and that the decree of that court should be affirmed.

PROMISSORY NOTE—ASSIGNMENT BEFORE MATURITY—MORTGAGE.—Assignment of a negotiable promissory note before maturity raises a presumption of want of notice of any defense to it, and this presumption stands until overcome by sufficient proof. The holder of the note when obliged to resort to the mortgage for payment is unaffected by an equity arising between the mortgagor and mortgagee, subsequently to the transfer, and of which he, the assignee, had no notice at the time it was made. He takes the mortgage as he did the note: Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall. 271, reversing the decision in the principal case.

MACHETTE v. WANLESS.

VERDICT on issues in trover and replevin—sufficiency. Issues upon plea of non-detinet and property in defendant in replevin, and upon plea of not guilty in trover, are not determined by a verdict of guilty.

CONSTRUCTION OF MORTGAGE must be such as will give effect to the whole instrument. A mortgage in terms defeasible upon payment of a note for $100, but which, by another clause, appears to have been intended as a security for past indebtedness, will be construed so as to bring the clause relating to past indebtedness within the terms of the defeasance.

MORTGAGE—description of indebtedness. A mortgage given to secure all past indebtedness due and owing from the mortgagor to the mortgagee contains a sufficient description of the indebtedness.

PRACTICE—objection to evidence must be made at the trial. Objections to evidence cannot be presented for the first time in this court.

REPLEVIN BY MORTGAGEE of chattels—evidence of indebtedness. A mortgagee of chattels may proceed against the mortgaged property while he holds any portion of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage, and in replevin for such chattels it is sufficient for him to show that he holds some portion of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage.

In an action of replevin by a mortgagee to recover possession of the chattels mortgaged, the defendant cannot defeat the action by showing that a portion of the indebtedness mentioned in the mortgage has been paid.

REPLEVIN—defense arising after suit brought. In replevin by a mortgagee to recover possession of the mortgaged chattels, the defendant cannot defeat the action by showing that a portion of the indebtedness was paid after suit brought.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE must be executed according to statute. A chattel mortgage, which does not provide that the property shall remain in the possession of the mortgagor, and which is not executed according to the statute (Rev Stat., chap. 14, 103), cannot be received in evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

AT the trial, George F. Wanless testified: That he was agent for the plaintiff below, and authorized to make advances to one Goff, who occupied plaintiff's farm; that he took a mortgage from Goff to the plaintiff on one-half of Goff's crop, to secure such advances; that, on going to the plaintiff's farm one day, he found the defendant below removing the grain; that he told defendant of the mortgage to plaintiff, and claimed the grain and forbid the removal of it; that Machette, the defendant, answered, that he did not intend to give up the grain, and thereafter secreted it, and refused to tell where it was; that the grain was found and replevied under the writ; that Machette stated that he was aware of plaintiff's mortgage; that Goff told witness, about a week before the grain was threshed, that he would not thresh for some weeks yet; that the grain was grown upon plaintiff's farm in the summer of 1867; that the advances made for plaintiff by witness were made at different times; that the last advance was $100; was made in June, 1867.

Cross-examination: Witness identified a note taken by him from Goff at the time the mortgage was executed, and stated that it was paid at maturity by Machette, the defendant. Witness also stated: "I had advanced Goff money before that, horses, etc. I had made advances and so had my brother, and I took this mortgage to secure all of his indebtedness to my brother. I did not then know what or how much my brother had advanced, or how much I had advanced in all, and therefore only specified particularly this note in the mortgage; Machette paid me this note on the day it was due, I think it was after this suit was brought."

Plaintiff then offered a chattel mortgage from Goff to himself, dated July 6, A. D. 1867, and two notes from Goff to himself, one dated December 1, 1866, for $616, payable one day after date, another dated October 15, A. D. 1866, for $500, payable eight months after date. The consideration expressed in the mortgage was $500, and the defeasance was as follows:

"Provided, nevertheless, that if the said party of the first part, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall well and truly pay to the party of the second part, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the redemption of the above bargained goods and chattels, the just and full sum of $100, on or before the fifteenth day of September, A. D. 1867, with interest on the same, according to the tenor and effect of a certain promissory note, given by the said party of the first part to the said party of the second part, bearing even date with this deed, then these presents to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue, and to secure all past indebtedness due and owing from the said first party to the said second party, said indebtedness to be paid on or before said fifteenth day of September, A. D. 1867."

The defendant admitted the execution of the notes and mortgage, but objected generally to the introduction of the notes and to the mortgage on the ground that it was fraudulent and invalid for uncertainty. But the court allowed them to be read in evidence. The defendant below proved the execution of a mortgage from Goff to him, and also a note of $1,500, dated June 6, 1867, payable thirty days after date. The mortgage was of the same date, and for the undivided one-half of the crop then growing upon plaintiff's ranche. This instrument did not contain any provision as to the possession of the property by the mortgagor, nor was it acknowledged in the form prescribed by the statute, relating to chattel mortgages. Upon plaintiff's objection the note and mortgage were excluded. The defendant also offered the $100 note, mentioned in the mortgage from Goff to plaintiff, and upon plaintiff's objection the court refused to receive it. The defendant also offered a power of attorney from Goff to him, authorizing him to pay the $100 note and obtain a release of plaintiff's mortgage. On plaintiff's objection this was excluded also. The verdict of the jury was, they find the said defendant guilty, and assess the said plaintiff's damages on occasion of the premises at five cents.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT and Mr. GEORGE W. PURKINS, for appellant.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE and Mr. M. BENEUDIOT, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The declaration in this cause contains a count in replevin and a count in trover. To the count in replevin non detinet and property in Machette was pleaded, and to the count in trover the plea was not guilty. Issues were joined upon these pleas, and upon trial thereof the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and awarded five cents damages to the plaintiff below. It is impossible to say that these issues were determined by this verdict. Whether the jury found the defendants guilty of the detention charged in the first count, or the conversion charged in the second count, can only be conjectured, and the verdict is entirely silent as to the ownership of the property. In Patterson v. United States, 2 Wheat. 221, it is said: "Whether the jury find a general or a special verdict, it is their duty to decide the very point in issue, and although the court in which the cause is tried may give form to a general finding so as to make it harmonize with the issue, yet if it appears to the court, or the appellate court, that the finding is different from the issue, or is confined to part only of the matter in issue, no judgment can be rendered upon the verdict."

It is hardly necessary to add, that according to this rule this judgment cannot stand.

Other questions are presented which will probably arise upon another trial of the cause, and therefore it is necessary to refer to them briefly.

The mortgage from Goff to Wanless, although in terms defeasible upon payment of the $100 note, seems to have been intended as a security for all indebtedness then existing between the parties. The clause relating to past indebtedness must be brought within the terms of the defeasance in order to make it effectual, and this appears to have been the intention of the parties. This construction will give effect to every part of the instrument, while that urged by the appellant requires the provision respecting past indebtedness to be rejected, and the law will indulge the first construction rather than the last.

As to the description of the indebtedness, the case of Insurance Company v. Brown, 11 Mich. 266, is an authority.

In that case it was held that a mortgage conditioned for the payment of all sums due and to become due was sufficiently certain, and the opinion of the court appears to be well sustained by other authorities.

If the appellee had been called upon to show that the notes given in evidence were covered by the mortgage, the court below would, doubtless, have required him to furnish such proof, since the mortgage does not contain a specific description of the indebtedness designed to be secured. But the appellant's objection appears to have been directed against the mortgage, and it does not appear that any question was made in the court below respecting the connection or want of connection between the notes and mortgage. So, also, as to the objection that it does not appear that the instrument was recorded in the office of the county recorder. It does not appear to have been presented to the court below, and cannot be presented for the first time in this court.

In answer to the objection that the $100 note was not offered by the appellee together with the chattel mortgage, it is sufficient to say, that a portion of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage was offered and received. Of course, a mortgage valid and effectual to secure the whole of the indebtedness described in it, is valid and effectual as to every portion of such indebtedness, and, while the mortgagee holds any portion of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage, he is entitled to proceed against the mortgaged property. Perhaps this statement would require some modification if applied to a case where a mortgagee of chattels has assigned a portion of the indebtedness secured in his mortgage, and his assignee has obtained possession of the mortgaged chattels. But the appellant does not occupy the position of an assignee of the $100 note. He claims to have taken it up on behalf of Goff, the maker, and is aggrieved that the court below would not permit him to show this fact. Furthermore, at the time the property was replevied, the note had not been paid, and, therefore, appellant was not then in possession of it, either as assignee or otherwise. Upon the evidence in this case, it certainly was sufficient for appellee to show, that he held a part of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage, and we do not see that appellant could defeat a recovery by showing that he did not hold all of the indebtedness. Although there was a count in trover in the declaration, there was no attempt to charge defendants below with more property than was obtained upon the writ of replevin, and, therefore, we may say, that the action was solely to recover possession of chattels. We have seen, that appellee was only required to show some indebtedness from Goff to him under the mortgage, in order to support his right to the possession of the mortgaged chattels, and, therefore, the refusal of the court to allow appellant to show that the $100 note had been paid was not erroneous.

As to the mortgage from Goff to appellant, it was not executed according to the statute, and, therefore, it was properly excluded. Hunt v. Bullock, 23 Ill. 320.

We do not perceive that any other questions presented in this record will necessarily arise upon another trial of the cause, and, therefore, this discussion will not be extended further.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

REPLEVIN — VERDICT. — In replevin a verdict of not guilty does not answer a traverse of property in the plaintiff: Freus v. Lake, 2 Colo. 481.

MORTGAGE — DESCRIPTION OF INDEBTEDNESS. — A mortgage given to secure all indebtedness, past, present, or future, i. e., debts due and owing or to become due from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, contains a sufficient description of the indebtedness: Clark v. Hyman, 55 Iowa, 27, citing the principal case.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. GRAHAM.

REGULATIONS BY TELEGRAPH COMPANY respecting their business. Telegraph companies may make reasonable regulations concerning their business, but cannot by such rules relieve themselves from responsibility for the negligence of their servants.

REGULATION not applicable. That the plaintiff did not cause a message to be repeated as required by a regulation of the company is no defense to an action for a failure to deliver the message after it was received at the office to which it was addressed.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES in action for non-delivery of telegram. In an action against a telegraph company to recover damages for the non-delivery of a telegram, in which the plaintiff requested his agents at Nebraska City to "ship oil soon possible," the plaintiff cannot recover the profits which he might have made on the oil if the message had been delivered and the oil sent in due time.

In such action the plaintiff may recover the money paid by him for transmitting the message, the advance in the price of freight, and his expenses incurred by reason of the failure of the defendant to fulfill the contract.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

HALLETT, C. J., did not participate in the decision.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for defendant in error.

BELFORD, J. The marked ability which has characterized the argument of this case makes it important to examine with great care the principles involved. The declaration contains three counts. It is averred that the plaintiff, on the 5th day of December, 1864, employed the defendant to transmit from Denver, in Colorado, and deliver to Ashton and Tait, in Nebraska City, in Nebraska, the following message:

“DENVER, December 5, 1864.

“ASHTON & TAIT, Nebraska City:

“Ship oil soon as possible, at very best rates you can.

“WILLIAM GRAHAM.”

It is further alleged that, in consideration of the sum of $5.00 then paid, the defendant accepted and agreed to deliver the same, but that, by reason of the unskillfulness, negligence, and want of care of the servants and employees of the company, the message was not transmitted and delivered; by means whereof the said Ashton and Tait did not ship the oil as requested, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay higher rates of freight on the same, amounting to the sum of $500, and also that the plaintiff lost great gains and profits by the delay thus caused in not shipping said oil, amounting to the sum of $1,500, and was otherwise put to great expense and incurred great loss and damage.

The defendants, for answer, plead the general issue, and four special pleas. In the special pleas it was alleged, that at the time of the delivery of the several telegraphic messages, in the several counts of the declaration mentioned, the plaintiff was notified and informed that in order to guard against mistakes in the transmission of messages over the lines of the defendants from Denver to Nebraska City, every message of importance ought to be repeated by being sent back from the station at which it is to be received to the station from which it is originally sent, and that the defendant would charge fifty per cent more for repeating each message than for sending or transmitting such message without repeating the same; and that, while the defendant would use every precaution to insure correctness, the said defendant would not be responsible to the plaintiff or to any other person for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery of repeated messages, beyond an amount exceeding five hundred times the amount paid for sending the message, and that the said defendant would not be responsible for mistakes or delays arising from interruptions in the working of the telegraph of the said defendants, nor for any mistake or omission of any other company over whose lines a message should be sent to reach the place of destination. It is further alleged that the plaintiff, well knowing the premises, did not, at the time of delivering the messages, in the declaration mentioned, to the defendant, nor at any time before or since, request the defendant to repeat the messages by sending the same back from Nebraska City to Denver, nor did the plaintiff pay or offer to pay to the defendants the sum or price charged by the said defendants for repeating the said several telegraphic messages. To these several special pleas a demurrer was filed and sustained. The defendant went to trial on the general issue, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $1,039.69. The motion for a new trial having been overruled, the cause comes here.

The first error assigned is the sustaining of the demurrer to the special pleas.

It is claimed by the plaintiff in error that Graham, having subscribed to the conditions printed on the back of the paper on which the dispatch was written, is not only chargeable with notice of them, but that his right to recover is limited thereby. It is further insisted that, not having requested the defendant to repeat the message, he thereby released the company from liability. It is no longer a question of doubt that a telegraph company has the right to make reasonable rules and regulations for the proper conducting of its ordinary telegraphing business, and this right has been recognized by many of the States by statutory enactments, and in others by decisions of their courts, but while this is the case, the doctrine has nowhere been carried to the length of exempting them from all responsibility for a want of fidelity and care in the exercise of the employment which they undertake to prosecute. There are duties they owe the public arising out of the nature of their employment which it would be impolitic and inexpedient to suffer them to diminish or evade. Among these duties may be mentioned the obligation to employ competent and skillful operators and other agents and servants, in all respects competent for the discharge of their particular duties; and further, to see that they not only possess such skill, but that it is continually applied in the particular business in which they are engaged. They cannot refuse to receive and forward messages, nor select the persons for whom they will act. They must send for every person who may apply at a uniform rule without any undue preference, and according to established rules and regulations applicable to all alike. In the case of Ellis v. American Telegraph Company, 13 Allen, 234, BIGELOW, C. J., says: "There can be no doubt that in the ordinary employments and occupations of life men are bound to the use of due and reasonable care, and are liable for the consequences of carelessness or negligence in the conduct of their business to those sustaining loss or damage thereby. We can see no reason why this rule is not applicable to the business of transmitting messages by telegraph. But the rule does not operate so as to prevent parties from prescribing reasonable rules and regulations for the management of the business, or establishing special stipulations for the performance of services, which, if made known to those with whom they deal, and directly or by implication assented to by them, will operate to abridge their general liability at common law, and to protect them from being held responsible for unusual or peculiar hazards which are incident to particular kinds of business. Of course a party cannot in such way protect himself against the consequences of his own fraud, or gross negligence, or the fraud or gross negligence of his servants or agents, nor can he escape all liability or responsibility in the performance of the service or duty which he undertakes. Nor can there be any difficulty or danger in the application of this principle so long as it is kept within a proper limit. That limit is found by requiring in all cases that the conditions and regulations by which a party seeks to limit his liability in the conduct of his business shall be reasonable. Such only, by the rules of law, can a party be permitted to prescribe, and to none other can those who deal with them be held to yield their assent."

This brings us to the question, whether the rule relied on by the defendants in the special pleas, and which is set up in defense of the plaintiff's claim, is a just and reasonable one, and such as they have a right to prescribe, and by which the plaintiff was bound.

It has been remarked by an eminent lawyer, "that when rules and regulations are in derogation of common right, or are intended to restrict and limit liabilities to which the company would otherwise be subject, by reason of the duties imposed upon it by law, or the nature of its engagement, the validity of such rules and regulations is a question of law." Accepting this as true, how stands the rule relied upon in the special plea? The gist of the action is the failure to deliver the message. The complaint is not that the message was incorrectly sent or that it was inaccurately taken off the wires at Nebraska City. If this was the gravamen of the action, we might hold with the Kentucky and Massachusetts courts, that it was the duty of the plaintiff to insure its accuracy by having it repeated. But how could the failure to deliver the message be avoided by paying for having it repeated? Can it be said that the operator at the other end of the line could insure the safe delivery of a message by repeating, when the negligence which occasioned the failure occurred after the receipt of the message? The object of repeating a message is to correct errors and not to avoid delays in delivering it. After transmission an incorrect message could be sent out and delivered as speedily as if it had been verified and proved to be perfectly accurate. Delays in the delivery of a message result from causes altogether different from those which produce mistakes in transmission, and it is reasonable that rules of limitation or exemption should be adapted to the nature of the case. Scott and Jarnigan on the Law of Telegraphs, § 113. A message may be correctly transmitted from one point to another, may be correctly taken off the line, and the agent of the company may, through inattention, fail to deliver it to the party to whom it is directed. It would hardly be contended that in this case the company could shield itself under the condition that the party sending the message failed to pay for having it repeated. The mere fact of having it repeated could not have insured its delivery. The failure to deliver is not caused by imperfection of instruments and appliances, by electrical changes, or by a break of the line at an intermediate point, but by the negligence of the operator, and against this inattention and want of care these rules and regulations cannot provide. To support the reasonableness of the conditions attached to the message, our attention has been called to the case of Ellis v. American Telegraph Company, noticed above. The counsel citing this case must have overlooked the remarks of the chief justice, on page 238: "It is hardly necessary to say that the question, whether the mistake or error in the dispatch would have been prevented or corrected by the repetition of the message, in conformity to the regulations established by the defendants, does not appear to have arisen at the trial. Whether it would have done so was a question of fact for the jury. Of course the defendants would be liable for any negligence causing damage, which would not have been prevented by a compliance with these rules."

Until the plaintiff in error can show that the failure to transmit and deliver the message could have been prevented by having it repeated, the above case can be of little avail to him. The next authority relied on is that of Camp v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 166. In this case the company, by way of defense, relied upon a notice of the terms and conditions on which messages were received by it for transmission, and which are the same as those relied on here. SIMPSON, Judge, says: "There is no allegation in the plaintiff's petition that the mistake was occasioned by negligence, or was the result of incompetency or want of proper skill on the part of the agents who were employed by the company to act as operatives in the sending and receiving of dispatches; but the failure of the company to comply with its contract to transmit the message correctly is alone relied upon as the foundation of the plaintiff's right to a recovery in the action." It will be observed that the case at bar and the case cited differ in other particulars. Here the plaintiff charges that failure to transmit and deliver the message was occasioned by "the carelessness, negligence and want of skill of the defendants and their agents, and through want of due care and attention to their business." Here the act complained of is the failure to deliver the message, while in the case cited the message was transmitted and delivered, but there was a mistake made in the tenor of the dispatch, making it read sixteen cents a gallon instead of fifteen cents, as written by the sender. While we hold that it is competent for the company to provide by rules and regulations against the unforeseen disarrangement of electrical apparatus and the imperfection necessarily incident to the transmission of signs and words by electricity, yet it must be conceded that these forces or accidents do not affect the ability of the company to deliver the message to the party addressed, after it has been taken off the wires and reduced to writing. What is needed to secure delivery is fidelity, and to this the company is bound in all messages. In the case of Birney v. New York and Washington Telegraph Company, 18 Md. 341, 342, the plaintiff delivered to the company's agent a message for transmission, which was wholly forgotten by the agent, and he neglected to send it at all. There was no repeating price paid by the plaintiff. It was held by the court that the company's notice, with regard to the repetition of messages, would not apply to a case of neglect, when no effort was made to put a message upon its transit. Much has been said about the peculiar hazards to which telegraph companies are exposed. It is said that "the operating apparatus of the telegraph leaves no record of the work done at the place from which it is transmitted, and that, therefore, there is peculiar liability to error in the non-transmission and transmission of dispatches." This is all true, and courts and legislatures have been liberal in allowing companies to provide against such risks as arise out of atmospheric influences and kindred causes. At this point they have properly stopped. To permit them to contract against their own negligence would be to arm them with a most dangerous power, one, indeed, that would leave the public almost entirely remediless. It must be borne in mind that the public have but little choice in the selection of the company which is to perform the desired service. They do not select their agents or employees, nor can they remove them. They are bound to take the company as they find it, and to commit to these agents their messages, however valuable they may be. Such being the case, public policy as well as commercial-necessity require that companies engaged in telegraphy should be held to a high degree of responsibility. I have thus far examined this case on the pleadings without alluding to the evidence elicited on the trial, and am of the opinion that the court below committed no error in sustaining the demurrer to the special pleas. Another question equally important remains for decision. On the trial below the court permitted the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, to introduce evidence of the price of coal oil in Denver, in December, 1864, and in January, February and March, 1865.

The introduction of this evidence was, doubtless, permitted on the ground that the plaintiff had a right to recover damages for the loss of profits he might have made, had the dispatch been delivered to Ashton and Tait; and the oil been shipped by them and reached Denver in January or February. It is claimed by the plaintiff in error that the court also erred in giving the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant made an effort, in good faith, to transmit the dispatch given in evidence, and that the same was transmitted from Denver to Nebraska City, but that the dispatch was not delivered to Ashton and Tait, by reason of the carrier of the defendant depositing the same in the post-office at Nebraska City, then the jury are instructed that the defendant was not guilty of willful neglect or negligence, and the plaintiff is not entitled to exemplary damages or "smart money," but is only entitled to such reasonable damages as he sustained by the difference in freight, and the difference in price for which he sold his oil, and the price for which he might have sold it had the dispatch been delivered in time and the oil shipped at the next opportunity, that Ashton and Tait had to ship the oil after they should have received the dispatch." The plaintiff in error rests his objection to the introduction of the evidence above referred to, on the ground that the plaintiff's declaration contained no special averment of the loss of profits. In an action for refusing to let a lessee into possession, the plaintiff gave evidence of injury to his wife's business as a milliner, without having averred it specially; but the court held it admissible under the general allegation of damage, as going to show that "the plaintiff had sustained inconvenience." Ward v. Smith, 11 Price, 19; see, also, Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas Company, 15 Wis. 327. Before proceeding to discuss the right of the plaintiff to recover damages for loss of profits, it is proper to remark that neither the message nor declaration discloses the kind of oil that was to be shipped, nor its quantity nor quality, nor where it was at the date of the dispatch, nor for what purpose such shipment was to be made, nor whether such oil was intended for sale or for use, nor at what point the profits were lost. For any thing that appears in the declaration it might have been hair oil, fish oil, or wizard oil. The element of certainty has been left out. True, the evidence shows that the plaintiff had on deposit with Ashton and Tait, as his forwarding agents, sixty-nine boxes of coal oil, but nothing of this kind appears in the declaration. Under the general averment, that the plaintiff lost profits on oil, it is claimed that the company should come prepared to dispute at the trial the value of any kind and any quantity of oil, at any place, and at any time. Under the ruling of the court below, the plaintiff could have as readily recovered for loss of profits on olive oil, as coal oil; for the profits of ten thousand gallons of oil, as for the profits on one. The defendant might have come prepared with testimony as to the value and quantity of one kind of oil, and yet have been surprised by an inquiry as to another kind or quantity. "A chief object of formal written pleadings is, to apprise the opposite party of the real cause of complaint against him, so that he may in like manner interpose the proper answer on his part, and that on the trial he may not be taken by surprise; this requires that the injury complained of should be stated with such fullness and certainty in the declaration as to leave no reasonable doubt of the particular transaction on which the plaintiff relies, and which he intends to prove to establish his right of action. These are common-place principles and apply to every pleading which is required to be special in its nature." Relyea v. Drew, 1 Denio, 563.

But, granting that the declaration was sufficiently specific in all these points, was the plaintiff entitled to recover damages for the loss of profits he might have made had the dispatch been delivered, and the oil been sent and received in Denver, and sold? In the case of Staats v. Executors of Ten Eyck, 3 Caines, 116, LIVINGSTON, J., says: "The safest general rule in all actions on contracts is to limit the recovery as much as possible to an indemnity for actual injury sustained without regard to the profits, which the plaintiff has failed to make, unless it shall clearly appear from the agreement that the acquisition of certain profits depended on the defendant's punctual performance, and that he had assumed to make good such a loss also." To the same effect is Thompson v. Shattuck, 2 Metc. 618. In the case of Freeman v. Clute, 3 Barb. 426, HARRIS, J., says: "The defendants insist that if liable for consequential damages at all, they are only liable for such expenses as were actually incurred by the plaintiff in attempting to put the machinery in operation, and such actual loss as he had sustained in using the defective machinery; while on the other hand the plaintiff claims that he is entitled to recover, as consequential damages, the profits he could have made in the manufacture of oil had the machinery been complete and put up within the time limited. I agree with the counsel for the plaintiff in the general rule for which he contends, that the party complaining of the breach of an executory contract is entitled to indemnity for the loss which the non-performance of the obligation by the other party has occasioned him, and for the gain of which it has deprived him. But the gain contemplated by this rule is only that which is the direct and immediate fruit of the contract, such gain may as properly be regarded in estimating the damages resulting from a failure to perform a contract as any actual loss the party may sustain. But even the civil-law rule, which is more liberal than the common-law, in the measure of damages for the violation of an executory contract, confines the allowance for the loss of profits to the particular thing which is the object of the contract, and does not include such loss of profits as may have been incidentally occasioned in respect to his other affairs. I cannot agree with the counsel for the plaintiff that the estimated profits upon the manufacture of a specified quantity of flax seed into linseed oil constitutes a legitimate item of damages against the defendants; such profits are entirely too speculative and uncertain to make them a measure of damages."

The same rule is laid down in Blanchard v. Ely, 21 Wend. 342. In the case of Driggs v. Dwight, 17 Wend. 71, and Millers v. The Mariners' Church, 7 Greenl. 51, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the expenses actually incurred in their business as a consequence of the failure of the defendants to perform their contract, but denied their right to recover damages for profits, which they claimed they might have made. Mr. Justice STORY, in the case of The Schooner Lively, 1 Gallis. 315, commenting on this subject, says: "Independent, however, of all authority, I am satisfied upon principle that an allowance of damages upon the basis of a calculation of profits is inadmissible. The rule would be in the highest degree injurious to the interests of the community. The subject would be involved in utter uncertainty. The calculation would proceed upon contingencies, and would require a knowledge of foreign markets to an exactness in point of time and value which would sometimes present embarrassing obstacles. Much would depend on the length of the voyage and the season of the arrival. After all it would be a calculation upon conjectures and not upon facts." In the case of Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 490, the earlier New York decisions are reviewed with great care, and the conclusion reached is that the party injured by a breach of contract is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, provided they are certain, and such as might naturally be expected to follow the breach. They exclude only uncertain and contingent profits, not such as, being the immediate and necessary result of the breach of contract, may be fairly supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made it, and are capable of being definitely ascertained by reference to established market rates. POTHIER says: "In general, the parties are deemed to have contemplated only the damages and injury which the creditor might suffer from the non-performance of the obligations in respect to the particular thing which is the object of it, and not such as may have been accidentally occasioned thereby in respect to his other affairs. This rule, however, applies only to cases where, by reason of special circumstances, having no necessary connection with the contract broken, damages are sustained which would not ordinarily or naturally flow from such breach ; as when a party is prevented by the breach of one contract from availing himself of some other collateral and independent contract entered into with other parties, or from performing some act in relation to his own business, not necessarily connected with the agreement. An instance of the latter kind is, when a canon of the church, by reason of the non-delivery of a horse pursuant to agreement, was prevented from arriving at his residence in time to collect his tithes. In such cases the damages sustained are disallowed, not because they are merely consequential or remote, but because they cannot be fairly considered as having been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of entering into the contract." After examining at great length the various decisions on the subject, SELDEN, J., remarks : "From these authorities and principles it is clear that the defendants were not entitled to measure their damages by estimating what they might have earned by the use of the engine and their other machinery, had the contract been complied with. Nearly every element entering into such a computation would have been of that uncertain character which has uniformly prevented a recovery for speculative profits."

In the case of Squire et al. v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 98 Mass. 232, and which was an action in tort for failing to deliver a message, BIGELOW, C. J., says : "These rules, in their application to damages in actions of this nature, are well settled and familiar. A party who has failed to fulfill a contract cannot be held liable for remote, contingent and uncertain consequences, or for speculative or possible results which may have ensued on his breach of duty, although they may be traceable to that cause. The reason is, that damages of such a nature are not the natural or necessary incidents of a contract, and cannot be deemed to have been within the contemplation of parties when they agreed together. A rule of damages, which should embrace within its scope all the consequences which might be shown to have resulted from a failure or omission to perform a stipulated duty or service, would be a serious hindrance to the operations of commerce and to the transaction of the common business of life. The effect would often be to impose a liability wholly disproportionate to the nature of the act or service which a party had bound himself to perform and to compensation paid and received therefor. The practical rule, founded on a wise policy, and, at the same time, consistent with good sense and sound equity, is that a party can be held liable for breach of contract only for such damages as are the natural or necessary and the immediate and direct results of the breach, such as might properly be deemed to have been in contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into, and that all remote speculations and uncertain results, as well as possible profits and advantages, and other like consequences which might have arisen from the fulfillment of the contract, must be excluded, as forming no just or legitimate basis on which to determine the extent of the injury actually caused by a breach."

While in this cause the court disallowed the recovery of profits, it held that the defendants, as a contracting party, were liable for the injury actually caused by their breach of duty, and commenting on the opinion delivered by himself in Blis v. American Telegraph Company, 13 Allen, 226, remarks: "There is nothing in the nature of the business, which they undertake to carry on, that should exempt them from making compensation for any neglect or default on their part." There is another important case bearing on this subject, and one worthy of great attention, as it seems to have been ably argued by counsel and gravely considered by the court. I refer to the case of Leonard v. The New York Telegraph Company, 41 N. Y. 565. The facts in that case were as follows: On the 24th of September, 1856, Magill & Pickering, acting for plaintiffs, delivered to the Western Union Telegraph Company, at Chicago, a dispatch to be sent to one Shoals, at Oswego, as follows: "D. B. Shoals, Oswego. Send 5,000 sacks of salt immediately. Magill & Pickering." When the message was delivered, it read, "Send 5,000 casks of salt immediately." The term

"sacks," in the salt trade, designates fine salt, containing fourteen pounds, and the term "casks" designates coarse salt, in packages containing not less than 320 pounds. Shoals received the telegram on the day it was sent, and that evening chartered a schooner to take the salt to Chicago, and shipped by her 2,733 barrels of coarse salt. The cargo of salt arrived at Chicago on the 15th day of October. There being no market for the same, it was stored away at the expense of the plaintiff. The salt was worth, at the time of its shipment in Oswego, $1.60 per barrel. The cost of transporting the same to Chicago, exclusive of insurance, was nearly twenty-seven and a half cents per barrel, and on its arrival at Chicago it was not worth at that place to exceed $1.25 per barrel.

The cause was tried before a referee, who found "that the measure of damages to which the said plaintiffs are entitled is the difference in the value of salt at Oswego and Chicago with the cost of transportation added thereto, with interest from the time of the arrival of said salt at Chicago." On commenting on this finding of the referee, EARLE, C. J., says: "The measure of damages to be applied to cases as they arise has been a fruitful subject of discussion in courts. The difficulty is not so much in laying down rules as in applying them. The cardinal rule undoubtedly is, that one party shall recover all the damages which has been occasioned by the breach of contract by the other party. But this rule is modified in its application by two others. The damages must flow directly and naturally from the breach of contract, and they must be certain both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed. Under this latter rule, speculative, contingent and remote damages, which cannot be directly traced to the breach complained of, are excluded; under the former rule such damages are only allowed as may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, as might naturally be expected to follow its violation. It is not required that the parties must have contemplated the actual damages which are to be allowed, but the damages must be such as the parties may fairly be supposed to have contemplated when they made the contract. Parties entering into contracts usually contemplate that they will be performed, not violated. As both parties are usually equally bound to know and be informed of the facts pertaining to the execution or breach of a contract which they have entered into, I think a more precise statement of the rule is, that a party is liable for all the direct damages which both parties to the contract would have contemplated as flowing from its breach if, at the time they entered into it, they had bestowed proper attention upon the subject, and had been fully informed of the facts.

* * * I think, therefore, that the rule of damages adopted by the referee was sufficiently favorable to the defendant. The damages allowed were certain, and they were the proximate and direct result of the breach." As to the measure of damages that may be recovered in an action of tort, or for breach of contract, I call attention to the cases of Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co., 15 Wis. 325; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 13 How. (U. S.) 344; Masterton v. The Mayor, etc., Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61; Fox v. Harding, 7 Cush. 522; Thompson v. Jackson et al., 14 B. Mon. 114; Davis v. Talcott, 14 Barb. 611; Wade v. Leroy et al., 20 How. 24; Waters v. Powers, 20 Eng. Law and Eq. 410; Fletcher v. Tayleur, 33 id. 187; Alder v. Heighly, 16 M. & W. 117.

If the authorities from which I have quoted state the rule correctly, and I have no reason to doubt it, then the instruction given by the court, so far as the same relates to the plaintiff's right to recover for profits which he might have made had the message been delivered and the oil sent, etc., is erroneous, and the jury having been misled by it, the cause must be reversed. And as this cause must go back for trial, it is proper that we should add that the plaintiff is entitled to recover not only what he paid the company for transmitting the message, but also the increased price of freight he was required to pay, and also all expenses that the plaintiff incurred by reason of the failure of the defendant to fulfill the contract. The length to which the opinion has already grown prevents reference to other matters that have been assigned for error.

The cause is remanded for new trial in accordance with the principles announced in this opinion, and the parties have liberty to amend their pleadings.

Reversed.

BERRY v. HART et al.

PLEADING IN TRESPASS — justification by officer. In trespass de bonis against an officer, if he justify under a writ of attachment, he must aver return of the writ.

SAME — justification by plaintiff in attachment. But this rule is not applicable to the plaintiff in the attachment suit.

EVIDENCE — official character of sheriff. Whatever rule may be enforced against an officer justifying under process, it seems to be sufficient for third persons to show that he is an officer de facto, and a plaintiff in attachment who is sued in trespass is not bound to show that the sheriff who levied the writ was an officer de jure. It is sufficient for him to show that the sheriff was performing the duties of the office and generally recognized in it.

JUSTIFICATION by plaintiff in attachment. If a plaintiff in attachment is sued in trespass by a stranger to the proceeding he need not aver the ground upon which the attachment was issued.

And if the ground of the attachment is set out in the plea, it is not necessary to support it at the trial.

AGENT — authority of clerk in a store. A clerk left in charge of a store during the absence of his principal, with instructions to do the best he can, has no authority to sell the entire stock valued at upwards of $10,000 to a single creditor of his principal to satisfy a debt of less than $7,000.

AGENT'S AUTHORITY — may be attacked by creditor of the principal. A creditor of the principal may attack a sale made by an agent, upon the ground that the agent was without authority to make it, but a mere stranger cannot be allowed to interfere between principal and agent.

The creditor must prove a debt and legal process against the principal in the same manner as one who seeks to avoid a sale under the statute of frauds and for the same reason.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

TRESPASS de bonis asportatis against Isidore H. Kastor, William Z. Cozens and appellant. Cozens and appellant pleaded the general issue ; afterward Cozens pleaded specially that he was sheriff of Gilpin county ; 6th May, 1867, a writ of attachment came to his hands issued out of the district court of Gilpin county, at the suit of Kastor & Berry, and against Oliver S. Buell, and directed to him to execute, commanding him to attach so much of the estate of Buell as should be of value sufficient to satisfy the sum of $659.25 and costs, etc.; that he levied the said writ on the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, as the property of said Buell, and that said goods and chattels were the property of the said Buell at the time when, etc. ; that the levying of said writ was the trespass complained of, etc. Appellant filed the following special plea :

And the said defendant, Julius Berry, by Royle & Butler, his attorneys, for a further plea in this behalf by leave of the court, for this purpose first had and obtained, says actio non because he says that on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1867, at the county of Gilpin aforesaid, and before the committing of the said trespasses above laid to the charge of the defendants herein, he and one Isidore H. Kastor were partners, doing business at the city of Denver, to wit, in the county of Gilpin aforesaid, under the firm-name and style of Kastor & Berry, and that one Oliver S. Buell, who did business under the name and style of O. S. Buell & Co. at the said county of Gilpin, was indebted to the said Kastor & Berry in the sum of $659.25, and that the said Buell was then and there converting his property into money, with the intent of placing the same beyond the reach of the said Kastor & Berry. And defendant avers that on the said 6th day of May, A. D. 1867, and before the committing of the said supposed trespasses, at the county aforesaid, he made and filed his affidavit in the clerk's office of district court of said Gilpin county, which affidavit was duly subscribed and sworn to before an officer authorized to administer oaths, in which affidavit he alleged that the said Buell was indebted to the said Kastor & Berry in the sum of $659.25, and that the said Buell was converting his property into money with the intent of placing the same beyond the reach of the said

Kastor & Berry, and that he was otherwise disposing of his property, with the intent of placing the same beyond the reach of the said Kastor & Berry ; and that said defendant then and there made a good and sufficient bond with good and sufficient surety, and filed the same with the said clerk of the said district court of Gilpin county. And defendant further avers that, on the day and year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, and before the committing of the said supposed trespasses, upon the filing of the affidavit and bond in the said clerk's office of the district court of Gilpin county, a writ of attachment was issued by the said clerk of said district court at the suit of the said Kastor & Berry against the estate of the said O. S. Buell, and that, on the said 6th day of May, A. D. 1867, at the county aforesaid, the defendant caused the said writ of attachment to be delivered to William Z. Cozens, who was then and there the sheriff of said Gilpin county, which said writ of attachment commanded the said sheriff of Gilpin county to attach so much of the estate, real and personal, of the said O. S. Buell, to be found in the said county of Gilpin, as should be of value sufficient to satisfy the sum of $659.25 and costs, and such estate so attached in his hands to secure so as to provide that the same might be liable to further proceedings thereupon, according to law, at a court to be holden at the city of Central for the said county of Gilpin, upon the second Tuesday of July, A. D. 1867, so as to compel the said O. S. Buell to appear and answer the complaint of the said Kastor & Berry, which said writ of attachment was then and there in full force and effect, and not discharged or satisfied ; and which said writ of attachment was directed to the said Cozens, as sheriff of said Gilpin county, to execute, and that the said Cozens, as such sheriff as aforesaid, by virtue of the said writ of attachment, and by the aid and direction of defendant, did, on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1867, at the county of Gilpin aforesaid, in the life-time of the said writ of attachment, take the said goods and chattels in the said declaration mentioned, and levy upon the same, by virtue of the said writ of attachment, as the property of the said O. S. Buell ; and the defendant avers that the said goods and chattels in the said declaration mentioned were the property of the said O. S. Buell and were subject to attachment, without this, that the property of the said goods and chattels in the said declaration mentioned, or any part thereof, at the said time when, etc., was in the plaintiffs, as by the said declaration is above supposed, which are the said supposed trespasses in said declaration mentioned and none other. And this the said defendant is ready to verify, wherefore he prays judgment, etc.

In several replications the plaintiffs below denied the material facts alleged in these special pleas.

At the trial Philip M. Martin testified that he knew the Harts and Cozens and Berry and perhaps Kastor, and did know them in May, 1867. I was called on by Mr. Cozens to invoice the goods he had taken ; they were in plaintiffs' store on Main street, Central City, Gilpin county, Colorado ; Orlando North assisted us in invoicing ; they were taken from the store by Cozens ; Hart, Wiggins & Co. were doing business here at that time ; John Q. Hart was their agent ; I have the invoice list which we made ; Cozens saw and examined it, and said it was correct ; he told us to invoice the goods at the prices laid down here ; Hart told him not to take the goods away, that they were the property of Hart, Wiggins & Co. ; the list I hold in my hands is correct ; the goods were valued at $4,017 ; Cozens saw the footings up ; he said he got a copy from North and that it corresponded with mine ; I was selling goods at that time ; have been in that business for twenty-one years ; have been in business here since 1861. If the goods had been carefully managed they might bring the invoice price ; I think they consisted of hats, caps, sacks, coats, etc. I saw Mr. Berry about there at that time, once in front of the store. The goods were taken in the county ; Cozens removed the goods from the store ; he boxed them up and took them away.

The plaintiffs then offered in evidence the list referred to by the witness, and the court admitted it.

Cross-examination : Did Cozens take the goods as an officer? Question was objected to by plaintiffs. Court sustained objection and refused to allow witness to answer. Defendants excepted.

Cozens said he had to do his duty; don't recollect whether he said he had to do his duty as an officer; Hart, Wiggins & Co. had been in business here from four to six days before this; the sale from Buell to Hart, Wiggins & Co. was made in Buell's store; it was agreed between Hart and Cozens that North and I should make the invoice, I think; my understanding was that Hart bought the goods from Oliver Buell; Buell was not here at that time; they were sold by his agent Sherman; Sherman was his agent; I understand that he had authority.

The following question was then asked: Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether Sherman had authority to make the sale? to which plaintiffs objected, and court sustained objection. Defendants excepted.

Witness then testified: I have been the agent of Hart, Wiggins & Co. since that time in this territory, in this as well as other matters; Hart was their agent at that time.

Charles C. Post testified that he knew defendants and knew of plaintiffs; the plaintiffs were doing business here on 6th of May; I knew of Julius Berry and Cozens taking the goods of plaintiffs from their store on Main street, in the store now occupied by P. C. Johnson; it was on the 6th of May, 1867; they were putting them into boxes; I saw them roll them out of the store in boxes.

Cross-examination: Berry was working there, taking goods down and helping to pack them; I was there as attorney for Hart, Wiggins & Co.

Defendants then asked: What did Cozens say about the taking, if any thing, at any time during the taking?

Plaintiffs objected, and court sustained objection. Defendants excepted.

The following question was then asked: Do you know whether Cozens claimed to take the goods by virtue of a writ of attachment in his hands as an officer?

Plaintiffs objected, and court sustained objection. Defendants excepted.

Plaintiffs thereupon closed their case.

Defendant introduced Charles E. Sherman, who testified that he knew the agent of Hart, Wiggins & Co. ; I knew Oliver S. Buell in April and May, 1867 ; he had been in the clothing business just before that time, in the place now occupied by Clark & Sweet, as a tobacco store ; he was there at least a year in the same kind of business ; I commenced clerking for Buell in that place some time in December, 1866, and continued about five months ; while Buell remained here, I was his clerk ; when he was gone I had full charge of his business ; he went east in 1867 ; he did business under the name and style of O. S. Buell & Co. ; Buell composed the firm ; there was no other member to my knowledge ; he remained east about a couple of months ; I conducted his business during his absence ; he did not give me any written authority ; he gave me full charge of his business, and told me to do the best I could for him, and what I thought was best ; he went east to visit his friends and buy goods, to continue his business ; he returned on the 4th of May, 1867, I think ; the business was closed on the 29th of April, 1867 ; the firm sold the goods to Hart, Wiggins & Co. ; I sold them as the agent of Buell ; the value of the goods sold was somewhere between $10,000 and $11,000 ; the sale paid the debt of Buell to Hart, Wiggins & Co. ; I think the amount of the debt was somewhere between $6,000 and $7,000 with interest ; there was no other consideration besides that ; they did not pay me any money on the transaction, they gave me no notes or security ; Buell never gave me any particular authority to make the sale to Hart, Wiggins & Co. ; he gave me general authority ; I think O. S. Buell & Co. were indebted to Kastor & Berry ; I don't know whether Hart knew or was informed at the time of the sale, that O. S. Buell & Co. were indebted to Kastor & Berry ; O. S. Buell & Co. were also indebted to Berry, Hexter & Co., and Deitsch & Bro., in Denver ; I don't know whether Hart knew of the indebtedness to the Denver folks ; the sale from Buell to Hart, Wiggins & Co. included one account, and perhaps more, but no note.

Cross-examined : I had authority from Buel to take charge of his business and do the best I could.

Defendants then offered to prove by H. H. Atkins "that he knew who was sheriff of Gilpin county during the month of May, 1867, and for two or three years previous ; that he had good means of knowledge, because he was clerk of the district court of said county, and frequently had business with said sheriff ; that William Z. Cozens was sheriff in said month of May, and had been for a long time previous ; that he was recognized as such by the district court of said county, by public officers, and by the public generally, and that his right to hold and exercise the duties of said office was not disputed."

To which plaintiffs objected, and the court sustained said objection. Defendants excepted.

Defendants then offered the affidavit, bond and writ of attachment, and the return of the sheriff indorsed on said writ in the suit of Kastor and Berry against O. S. Buell, and upon plaintiffs' objection the court excluded them.

The jury found for the plaintiffs $4,017.

Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER, and Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellees.

HALLETT, C. J. The issues in this case were not the same as in the case of Deitsch v. Hart et al., post, 300, decided at this term, although appellant's evidence was substantially the same as that offered by Deitsch. In that case, the special plea was found to be substantially defective, and, therefore, the justification failed. In this case, appellant's plea, although, perhaps, it would have been obnoxious to demurrer, is, in our opinion, sufficient after issue joined.

It is said, that appellant should have alleged that the writ of attachment had been returned, and such is the rule when an officer attempts to justify under a writ of this kind. Davis v. Bush, 4 Blackf. 330.

But we have found no case in which this rule has been applied to the plaintiff in the writ, and, upon principle, there appears to be no reason for extending it to him. It is the duty of the officer to return the process at the proper time, and he may well be required to perfect his levy by making return, if, at the time of pleading, the return day has passed. The plaintiff in the suit, however, ought not to be charged on account of an omission of the officer occurring after the alleged trespass was committed. If appellant is guilty of a trespass, he became so by suing out the attachment and directing it to be levied, and the circumstance that the officer failed in his duty after the levy will not affect his rights, unless he was in some way responsible for the omission. In Middleton v. Price, 2 Strange, 1184, the plaintiff in the writ and the officer jointly justified. "And it not being shown that any return was made, the court held, that the officer was a trespasser ab initio, and that the plaintiff, by joining with him in the plea, is equally affected by the defect of it."

If they had pleaded separately, probably the plaintiff would not have been held liable for the officer's default.

The plea being sufficient after issue joined, the question most discussed at the bar is the admissibility of the evidence offered in the court below to show the official character of the sheriff. It is conceded that the acts of officers de facto are valid, when they concern the public or the rights of third persons, who have an interest in the act done. People v. Collins, 7 Johns. 549.

The appellant was in no way connected with the sheriff, except that he procured his services in levying the writ of attachment. Desiring to enforce payment of his debt against Buell, appellant sued out process, and, if he found Cozens performing the duties of sheriff, and generally recognized as such officer, we think that he might accept his services without further inquiry as to the tenure by which the office was held. Certainly no question as to the validity of the levy, predicated upon Cozens' title to the office, can arise between Buell and appellant, and, a fortiori, no such question ought to be allowed between appellant and appellees. The circumstance, that Cozens and appellant were sued jointly, can make no difference since they severed in pleading. Whatever rule may be enforced against an officer justifying under process, it seems to be sufficient for third persons to show that he is an officer de facto, and the evidence offered by appellant tended to prove this fact, and was, therefore, improperly rejected. From this it follows, that the affidavit in attachment and the writ and return were also excluded improperly.

And here I might pause in the discussion of this cause, but for the suggestion of counsel that the verdict must have been the same if all the evidence excluded upon the trial below had been admitted. This suggestion rests upon an alleged absence of proof upon two points in appellant's defense. In the special plea the ground upon which the attachment was issued is set out, and it is claimed that there is no evidence to support it. But we think that the allegation itself is not material in this action and must be disregarded. In Damon v. Bryant, 2 Pick. 411, the reason given for requiring an officer to prove a debt in cases of this kind is, that it may appear that he is acting for a creditor because it is only in that character that he can question the vendee's title to the goods.

It is plain that a creditor, when justifying a seizure out of the hands of a stranger, must show his debt upon the same reason. Proof of the relation of debtor and creditor establishes the right of the creditor to proceed against the property of the debtor wherever it may be found, but whether he shall proceed by attachment or ordinary summons is a question of no importance to any other than the parties to the suit. If the debtor should bring trespass against the creditor, there would be strong reason for requiring the creditor to show that there was cause for issuing the attachment because the debtor may question the remedy as well as the right. But a stranger to the process is in a differenposition. As to him it is sufficient for the creditor to show his debt, and that he has resorted to legal process for its collection.

It is also urged that appellant failed to show that the sale from Buell to appellees was fraudulent, and therefore the title of the latter parties must be held good. It is to be observed, however, that appellant was not confined to that method of showing title in Buell. It seems that Buell was a merchant, and that he went east to buy goods, and visit his friends, leaving Sherman, his agent, in charge of his business, and that during his absence Sherman sold his whole stock of goods to appellees for the purpose of paying Buell's indebtedness to them. The value of the goods was upwards of $10,000, and the indebtedness of Buell to appellees was less than $7,000. It is difficult to maintain the authority of the agent to make this sale, for if it is conceded that Sherman had authority to sell the whole stock of goods in mass at two-thirds of their value, which is all that can be claimed upon the testimony, there is nothing to show that he had any authority whatever to pay debts. Sherman says that Buell gave him full charge of the business and told him to do the best he could. Giving to this authority the utmost latitude, Sherman had power to sell goods and perhaps pay current expenses, and the sale of the whole stock to a single creditor to satisfy one debt was entirely beyond the scope of his employment. Nash v. Drew, 5 Cush. 422; Swett v. Brown, 5 Pick. 178; Beals v. Allen, 18 Johns. 365.

Appellant had the right to have this question submitted to the jury under proper instructions, but he could not do so except in connection with the other evidence in the case. In this view it was not necessary that he should rely upon fraud in the sale from Buell to appellees, because if the jury should find that Sherman had no authority to pay the debt to appellees, and there had been no ratification of the act, the title was still in Buell and the property was subject to attachment under a writ running against him. That appellant was in a position to question the sale from Buell to appellee, upon the insufficiency of Sherman's authority to make it, is decided in the case of Beals v. Allen, cited above.

It seems that a stranger, who seeks to attack a sale upon the want of authority in the agent by whom it was made, must show a debt and legal process against the principal in the same manner as one who seeks to avoid a sale under the statute of frauds, and, for the same reason, a mere stranger cannot be allowed to interfere between principal and agent. Jackson v. Van Dalfsen, 5 Johns. 44.

It was necessary for appellant to show privity between himself and Buell before he could attack the sale made by Sherman, and for this purpose the evidence of indebtedness and process, and the official character of the sheriff was material to his defense. Upon this ground, also, this case is to be distinguished from that of Dietsch v. Hart et al., in which there was no sufficient plea of justification under which the appellant could attack the sale from Buell.

There are other questions in this record which probably will not arise in another trial of the cause, and, therefore, they are not noticed.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

ATTACHMENT — JUSTIFICATION BY PLAINTIFF. — If a plaintiff in attachment is sued in trespass by a stranger to the proceeding, he need not aver the ground upon which the attachment was issued: McCraw v. Welch, 2 Colo. 288.

CHENEY v. BARBER.

PRACTICE — manner of preserving objection, that written instrument has been altered after execution. It was objected to a written instrument when it was offered in evidence that it had been altered after execution by changing the name of the payee and the date, and the objection was overruled. The instrument not having been attached to the record filed in this court, the ruling of the court below on this point cannot be reviewed.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT. Contract for payment of $600 in four months and an additional $600 upon the sale of certain mining property. Comments and construction.

CONDITION PRECEDENT — performance must be proved. In order to recover upon an agreement to pay $600 when W. S. R. should sell certain mining property on the Bobtail lode, the plaintiff must prove that W. S. R. sold property on that lode, and also that the property so sold was that which was referred to in the agreement.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

Messrs. W. S. & L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

BELFORD, J. This was an action of assumpsit founded on the following note and agreement in writing :

"Four months after date, for value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay J. E. Barber, or order, $600. Signed, Wm. S. Rockwell, Hazen Cheney. October 3, 1863.

"In consideration of the above sum being without interest we promise and agree that should Wm. S. Rockwell, one of the signers hereto, effect a sale at the east or elsewhere, of certain mining property on the Bobtail lode, and receive his pay therefor, then we will pay an additional $600. Signed, William S. Rockwell, Hazen Cheney. (Seal.)"

It is alleged in the complaint that, on the 3d day of October, 1863, the plaintiff Barber, together with certain other parties, were the owners of certain mining property situated in Gilpin county and known and described as the east sixty-six and (2-3) two-thirds feet of claim number one east, and the west twenty feet of claim number two east on the Bobtail lode. That, on the day aforesaid, William S. Rockwell applied to the plaintiff for a power of attorney from him, authorizing Rockwell to negotiate a sale of the interest of the plaintiff in said property, and also, at the same time, applied to plaintiff for the loan of $600 in money for his own benefit. That thereupon it was agreed between Rockwell and Barber that the plaintiff would loan and advance to Rockwell the sum of $600, and also empower him to sell and convey the interest of the plaintiff in the property above described, on the condition that Rockwell and Cheney should make a joint and several promissory note to the plaintiff (being the one above set forth), and payable four months after date, for the sum of $600, and that said defendants, Rockwell and Cheney, would further execute and deliver to plaintiff an agreement in writing (being the one above set forth), that upon the sale of said property they would pay the plaintiff an additional sum of $600 to that mentioned in said note. It is further alleged that Rockwell and Cheney did thereupon execute said note, and at the same time and place make their certain agreement in writing, whereupon the said plaintiff duly empowered the said Rockwell to sell and convey the said property above described, and to execute a deed therefor. And the plaintiff further avers that afterward, to wit, on the 31st day of March, 1864, Rockwell did sell and convey the same identical property referred to and mentioned in the written agreement above set forth, and received the pay therefor. A trial was had by the court, a finding for the plaintiff, and judgment for the sum of $1,500.

The plaintiff, to maintain his action, offered in evidence the note and agreement, to the introduction of which the defendant objected, "because said note and agreement have been altered by substituting the name of a different payee, and that the date of the said note has been changed since the same was executed." Which objections were overruled by the court, and this is the first error assigned. We have no data before us by which the tenability of these objections can be determined. There is no evidence before us, that these objections urged by counsel existed; in fact, the execution of the papers is admitted, and we are asked to conclude that the instruments offered in evidence were altered upon the simple ground that the counsel so stated when they were offered in evidence. Had the originals been attached to the bill of exceptions, we might derive some light from an inspection, but this is denied us. Neither the originals, nor any evidence showing the alleged alteration, have reached this court. The general rule is, that the material alteration of an instrument, made by a party who claims the benefit of it, without the consent of the party against whom it is sought to be enforced, renders it void. The question of alteration is a question of fact. The true rule in regard to the burden of proof is, that when the alteration is of such a character as to defeat entirely its operation for any purpose, as in the case of an erasure of the signature of a deed or other instrument, so that, admitting all to be true that appears upon the instrument, when produced it would be void in law, it should be explained in the first instance before it should be permitted to go to the jury. In other cases the instrument should be given in evidence, and should go to the jury upon the ordinary proof of execution, although an alteration may appear in it, leaving the parties to such explanatory evidence as they may choose to offer. But if there is neither intrinsic nor extrinsic evidence as to when the alteration was made, the presumption of law is, that it was made before or at the execution of the instrument. Stoner v. Ellis, 6 Ind. 152. It nowhere appears that any proof was offered, tending to show that any alterations were made in the instruments, and in the absence of all evidence on the subject, we cannot say that the action of the court in admitting these instruments was erroneous.

It is claimed by the appellant that the contract sued on is an entirety in law ; that it contains but one agreement as to payment and time of payment, the latter being four months after date, the amount to be paid four months after date to be either $600 or $1,200, depending on the happening of an event, being the sale of certain mining property. It is very clear that the first instrument sued on is a contract to pay $600 four months after date. This payment depends on no contingency and hinges on no condition. It is an absolute promise to pay, and, at maturity, the plaintiff might have instituted legal proceedings to enforce its collection, omitting, at the same time, any mention or notice of the contract which immediately followed it.

In the second contract it is stipulated that, as no interest has been charged for the loan of the sum secured by the promissory note, Rockwell & Cheney will pay $600 more to Barber, should Rockwell succeed in selling the mining property which Barber authorized him to sell. We cannot agree with the appellant in his theory that the obligation to pay the additional $600 depended upon the sale of this property within four months, or during the time intervening between the execution and maturity of the note. The contingency upon which this second $600 became payable was the selling of the property. When a sale was effected, and the money therefor received by Rockwell, then his promise ripened into an absolute liability. There nowhere appears in this second contract any limit as to the time when the sale was to be made, and to give it the construction claimed by the appellant, we must interpolate into the body of the contract words which the parties to it did not deem fit to incorporate. In other words, we must make a new contract for them. This clearly is not the province of a court. To construe contracts, not make new ones, is our duty.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that, upon a sale being made, Rockwell & Cheney became liable for the additional $600.

It is further contended by the appellant that there is no evidence showing that a sale was made by Rockwell. It will be observed that the contract fails to describe specifically the property to be sold. It was on the Bobtail lode, but what particular portion of it?

To entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must show that the property, concerning which the contract was made, was sold by Rockwell. To prove a sale, he introduced in evidence a deed made by Rockwell as attorney in fact of Barber and others to George A. Hoyt. Conceding that this deed was properly admitted in evidence, there is nothing in the record showing that the land described in the deed was the same about which this contract was made. If left to enter the domain of inferences, we might conclude that the property was the same, but the plaintiff, to recover, must rely on something better than inferences. It was in his power to prove this fact, and he should have done so. The testimony of Lyon throws no light on this branch of the subject, and the statement in Rockwell's letter is entirely too ambiguous to be relied upon with safety. From the careful examination we have given the evidence, we are forced to the conclusion that it is not sufficient to prove a sale of the property about which the contract was made.

This cause is therefore reversed and remanded for a new trial, at the costs of the appellant.

SULLIVAN et al. v. CLEMENTS.

EVIDENCE must support the allegation. In an action of trespass quare clausum, if the locus in quo be described in the declaration, the evidence must be confined to the place named.

TRESPASS quare clausum. Evidence of possession. In trespass quare clausum, if the plaintiff does not show title, he must show that he was in possession of the locus in quo at the time of the alleged injury.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellants.

Messrs. BROWNE, HARRISON & PUTNAM, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit in the district court of Boulder county and thence removed to Jefferson, where appellee obtained judgment for $1,360. The description of the locus in quo in the declaration is according to the government survey, and is wholly unintelligible, except the last clause, which comprehends twenty acres of land. Rejecting that part of the description which we cannot understand and accepting that which is good, the declaration is for a trespass upon twenty acres of land, described according to the lines of the public survey. The only witness who attempted to describe the premises was less successful than the pleader, inasmuch as his description is unintelligible throughout. All the witnesses speak of a tract of land, containing one hundred and sixty acres, and we find nothing to connect their testimony with the locus in quo, given in the declaration. Therefore the proof does not come up to the allegation, and in our opinion this is a substantial omission.

By the ancient common law it was unnecessary to name the locus in quo in the declaration, and if the defendant pleaded the general issue, the plaintiff could prove a trespass in any part of the parish in which the venue was laid. By the use of the common bar, asserting title to some particular close in the parish, the defendant could compel the plaintiff to describe the close by name or otherwise, and then the parties in the third pleading came to the point, which is now gained in the declaration.

This practice was virtually abolished in A. D. 1654, by allowing plaintiffs to name the close in which the trespass was committed in the declaration. 4 Robinson's Prac. 584.

Perhaps the old practice might be followed at this day in a proper case, but when the locus in quo is described in the declaration, it would seem, upon principle and authority, that the evidence should be confined to the place named. 2 Greenleaf's Ev. 618 a; Fowle v. Wyman, Quincey (Mass.) 336; Vowles v. Miller, 3 Taunt. 189.

Another objection to the evidence demands attention. Appellee did not introduce evidence of title, but relied upon possession of the locus in quo, and of course it must appear that he was actually in possession at the time of the alleged trespass, inasmuch as there can be no constructive possession in the absence of title. According to the witness Hollingsworth, appellee's possession commenced November 25, 1867, and as he alone appears to have had knowledge of the fact, his statement must be accepted as true. Now there is no evidence of an entry by appellants after this time. Appellants entered the premises on the 4th of November anterior to appellee's possession, and at other times not named by the witnesses, but it does not affirmatively appear that appellee's possession was ever disturbed. The gist of this action is injury to the possession, and the evidence must show that the possession of the plaintiff has been invaded. Dean v. Comstock, 32 Ill. 173.

For these errors the judgment of the district court must be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded. Reversed.

TRESPASS - EVIDENCE OF POSSESSION. - To maintain trespass quare clausum, the plaintiff must have actual or constructive possession: Huganin v. Owen, 2 Colo. 339.

HASKINS v. TUCKER et al.

PRACTICE—judgment when declaration not on file. The court cannot proceed to judgment in an action at law without a declaration on file in the cause. Costs will not be allowed to party in fault. Where the error complained of was occasioned by the negligent act of the attorney for plaintiff in error costs will not be allowed.

Error to Probate Court, Clear Creek County.

Mr. C. C. Post, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. H. SHEPHERD, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. It appears by the bill of exceptions in this case, that the declaration, although seasonably filed in the cause, was not before the probate court at the time judgment was rendered. One of the attorneys for the plaintiff in error had taken the paper from the files by consent of the probate judge and had failed to return it, and the court appears to have regarded this omission of the attorney as sufficient to warrant the court in proceeding to judgment without the pleading.

A declaration is the statement of the plaintiff's cause of action and enters into the record of the cause. Without it the court cannot be informed of the nature and extent of the plaintiff's demand, and of course cannot give to such demand the form of a judgment. If an attorney or other person shall be guilty of misconduct in taking papers from the files of a court, or in refusing to return such papers, he may be punished for his offense; but the wrongful act of a person in taking pleadings from the files will not cure defects in the record caused by such withdrawal. It was in the power of the court below to allow the loss of the declaration to be supplied by filing a copy, if defendants in error had sought to do so, but the court could not proceed to judgment without a declaration on file. As the error in this record appears to have grown out of the negligent act of the attorney for plaintiff in error, we shall not allow the plaintiff any costs. The judgment of the probate court is reversed and the cause is remanded.

GALLUP et al. v. WILDER et al.

PRACTICE — declaration must be filed before judgment. It is error to take judgment without a declaration on file in the cause.

Error to Probate Court, Fremont County.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for plaintiff in error.

Per CURIAM. On the 13th day of July, 1867, the plaintiff below sued out of the probate court of Fremont county a summons against the defendants below, which summons was made returnable on the 5th day of August, 1867. It was served the day it was issued on Gallup and Lothrop. On the 11th day of February, 1868, the defendants, Gallup and Lothrop, were defaulted and judgment entered up against them for the sum of $1,200. The record states that after the default was entered evidence was thereupon introduced by the plaintiffs, and thereupon the court ordered that the plaintiffs recover from the defendants the sum of $1,200, etc., etc.

On the 23d day of June, 1868, and after the proceedings above were had, the plaintiffs filed their declaration. This course of procedure cannot be tolerated. The filing of the declaration after the default and judgment were had would not cure the want of authority nor remove the defects that existed. Rankin v. Crowell, Miner, 125.

There are other errors in the record but it is unnecessary to allude to them.

The cause is reversed and remanded, with costs.

FORD et al. v. BROWN et al.

PRACTICE as to bill of particulars. If the declaration contain a special count on a promissory note, and the common counts, and the plaintiff stipulate that he will at the trial rely upon the promissory note only, it is not necessary to file a bill of particulars.

PRACTICE as to filing copy of instrument sued on. If a copy of the instrument on which the action is founded is filed with the declaration, and the declaration is amended, it is not necessary to file another copy with such amendment.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. C. KINGSLEY, for defendant in error.

BELFORD, J. John S. Brown and William McKindly brought suit against William R. Ford et al., in assumpsit. The declaration consisted of a special count on a promissory note, and also the common counts. A demurrer was filed to the special counts, and an answer as to the common counts. The demurrer was confessed and leave taken to file an amended declaration. Upon the filing of the amended declaration the defendant asked for a rule on the plaintiffs to file a more specific bill of particulars. This was met by a stipulation on the part of the plaintiffs, that in the trial of the cause they would rely wholly on the note, and thereupon the rule for the filing of the more specific bill of particulars was not granted. We see no error in the court denying the rule. When the plaintiffs stipulate that their only cause of action is the note, and that they will rely on no other, we see no necessity for the filing of a bill of particulars. It is contended by the plaintiffs in error that inasmuch as no copy of a note was attached to the amended declaration, they were entitled to a continuance. There is nothing in this. A copy of the note was affixed to the original declaration, and this was sufficient. In confessing the demurrer the plaintiffs below did not withdraw the declaration. They simply took leave to amend it. When a copy of the instrument sued on is attached to the original declaration, and this declaration is amended, we know of no rule of law that requires a copy of the instrument to be attached to the amendment.

Had the plaintiffs withdrawn their declaration at the time they confessed the demurrer the rule would be otherwise. But they did not do so. There is a wide distinction between withdrawing a declaration and amending it.

We see no error in the record, and consequently the judgment is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

SOPRIS v. LILLY et al.

PLEADING — declaration on replevin bond. In actions on penal bonds in which, under the statute, the plaintiff assigns several breaches of the conditions of the bond in a single count of the declaration, the several assignments in connection with the body of the count are regarded as constituting separate and distinct counts of the declaration.

PLEA TO WHOLE DECLARATION — must answer all allegations therein. In an action upon a penal bond, a plea which goes to the whole declaration must be sufficient as to all breaches of the conditions of the bond which are well assigned therein.

In an action on a replevin bond it was alleged that the principal in the bond failed to prosecute the replevin suit with effect and to return the property replevied according to the conditions of the bond. The defendants pleaded that the property was in fact returned and the costs of the replevin suit paid. The plea was bad, for the reason that it did not answer the breach assigned upon failure to prosecute the replevin suit.

DAMAGES for detention of property. In an action on a replevin bond, in which it is assigned for breach of the condition of the bond that the principal did not prosecute the replevin suit with effect, damages for the detention of the property replevied may be recovered.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. L. B. FRANCE, for defendants in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The declaration in this case is upon a replevin bond, the conditions of which are alleged to have been violated by the failure of defendant Lilley to prosecute the replevin suit with effect, and to return the property replevied, in obedience to the judgment of the court in that suit. In a plea which goes to the whole declaration the defendants set up, that the property was in fact returned, and the costs of the replevin suit paid, but nothing is said as to the failure to prosecute the replevin suit with effect. In actions upon penal bonds, in which, under the statute, the plaintiff assigns several breaches of the conditions of the bond in a single count of the declaration, the several assignments in connection with the body of the count are regarded as constituting separate and distinct counts of the declaration, and we are authorized to say, that there are as many counts in the declaration as there are breaches of the conditions of the bond. Hibbard v. McKindly, 28 Ill. 253. If to such a declaration the defendant wishes to plead to the count taken in connection with any of the assignments separately from the others, there can be no objection to his doing so, but in such case he must limit his plea to the breach which he proposes to answer. It has always been held, that a plea which professes to answer the whole declaration must be sufficient as to each and every count in the declaration, and this rule, applied to cases of this kind, shows that a plea which goes to the whole declaration must be sufficient as to all breaches of the conditions of the bond, which are well assigned in the declaration.

Humphrey et al. v. Taggart, 38 Ill. 228. In this case there are two assignments of breaches of the conditions of the bond, and the plea, which professes to answer both of them, contains an answer to but one of them. We are unable to perceive any reason for denying the plaintiff's right to recover for the breach of the bond, in respect to the prosecution of the replevin suit with effect. If it is thought that the plaintiff cannot recover damages for the detention of the property, we regard the case of Shepard v. Butterfield, 41 Ill. 76, as decisive of the question. If, in the replevin suit, Booth had recovered damages for detention of the property, such recovery would be no evidence of the amount of such damages in this action under the breaches assigned in this declaration. If any damages for detaining the property had been awarded against Lilly in the replevin suit, perhaps an action to recover them would lie upon that provision of the bond, which provides for the payment of all damages which should be adjudged against him. But we are not concerned with that view of the case at present, and indeed we have now only to say, that the plea does not meet the whole declaration, and therefore the demurrer ought to have been sustained. The judgment of the probate court is reversed with costs, and the cause is remanded. Reversed.

REPLEVIN BOND, DECLARATION ON. — In actions on penal bonds in which, under the statute, the plaintiff assigns several breaches of the conditions of the bond in a single count of the declaration, the several assignments in connection with the body of the count are regarded as constituting separate and distinct counts of the declaration: Hayes v. N. Y. Mg. Co. 2 Colo. 278.

LITCHFIELD v. DANIELS.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT — plaintiff may remit excess over $2,000, and sue in that court. If the plaintiff's demand exceed $2,000, he may remit the excess and sue for that sum in the probate court.

PRACTICE — plaintiff's demand determined by ad damnum. If the plaintiff limit the ad damnum in his declaration to $2,000, this shall operate to remit the excess over that sum to the defendant.

CONTINUANCE — to obtain testimony of absent witness — necessary diligence. Upon affidavit for continuance on the ground of absence of witness, it appeared that defendant entered appearance Oct. 12, 1869; that he was not informed as to location of witness until January 29, 1870. Held, that affidavit was defective in not showing that inquiry was made for the witness between those dates.

PLEADING — denying partnership. Under section 6, chapter 30, Revised Statutes, 810, a plaintiff is not required to prove the joint liability of defendants sued as partners, unless the execution of the instrument sued on is denied by plea verified by affidavit.

IMMATERIAL ISSUE — plea denying partnership. Where in a suit on a promissory note against several defendants, as partners, one of them pleaded that at the date of the execution of the note he was not the partner of his co-defendants, the plaintiff was not required to prove the partnership.

Appeal from Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellant.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for appellee.

BELFORD, J. This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the probate court of Arapahoe county by the appellee against Abraham T. Litchfield, John W. Anthony, David Street and Henry Carlisle, copartners as John W. Anthony & Co., on a promissory note, of which the following is a copy :

"LARIMER CITY, WYOMING TERR.,

"August 17, 1868.

"One day after date, for value received, we promise to pay to the order of Daniels & Brown, the sum of $1,853.81, being balance due on book account with interest from date, at the rate of seven per cent per annum, until the sum shall be paid.

"JOHN W. ANTHONY & Co."

This note was indorsed by the payees to the plaintiff.

To the plaintiff's declaration, which consisted of a special count on the note, together with the consolidated common counts, the defendant filed the following plea verified: "And the defendant, Abraham T. Litchfield, by his attorneys, comes and defends the wrong, etc., and prays judgment, etc., because he says, that the defendant, Abraham T. Litchfield, at the time when, etc., was and is not a partner of the said John W. Anthony, David Street and Henry Carlisle, and is not jointly liable with the said John W. Anthony, David Street and Henry Carlisle as partners aforesaid, on the said supposed promises and undertakings in the said declaration mentioned in manner and form as the said plaintiff has, in his said declaration, alleged against him," etc. Issue was joined on this plea and the trial had by the court, who found for the plaintiff. The only evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff was the note. The defendant called no witness. The first objection taken by the appellant to the proceedings below is, that on the day that the summons was issued, there was due on said promissory note the sum of $2,019. It is insisted that the jurisdiction of the probate court is limited to the sum of $2,000, and that the claim sued on exceeds that amount by $19, and that the court had no power to try and determine the cause, for the reason that this sum of $19, being in excess of the amount fixed by law as the limit of the court's jurisdiction, rendered all the proceedings void. Section 25 of the revised code, page 526, provides: "The probate courts in the said several counties mentioned in the first section of this act, except the county of Gilpin, shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in all civil cases at law and in equity, where the debt or sum claimed shall not exceed $2,000."

While the amount due on the note at the issuing of the summons might have exceeded the amount prescribed in the above section, still the limit of the plaintiff's action was $2,000. This was the extent of his ad damnum, and beyond this amount he sought to recover nothing. After a careful consideration of the section above cited, and of the provisions in the organic act, we are of the opinion that it is not the amount due on the instrument sued on that fixes and determines the jurisdiction of the court, but the amount and extent of the plaintiff's claim. If there be due on the instrument sued on $10,000, still if the plaintiff limits his claim to $2,000 the case is within the jurisdiction of the court. The limitation of his claim in the ad damnum operates per se as a remittance of whatever amount may be due in excess of $2,000. The next error complained of is the overruling of the defendant's application for a continuance. This suit was commenced in the probate court on the 12th day of October, 1869. On the 14th of December the defendant filed his plea, and on the 14th of February, 1870, he filed his application for a continuance. The sufficiency of the application for a continuance can be determined by either of two considerations, viz., 1st. The diligence used to obtain the evidence of the absent witness. 2d. The materiality of his testimony as disclosed by the affidavit. As to the diligence used to obtain the testimony of the witness, it is alleged in the affidavit that the defendant was ignorant of the whereabouts of this witness until January 29, 1870, and he then learned that the witness was in San Francisco, but about to sail for New York. It nowhere appears that he did sail for New York. It is nowhere alleged in the affidavit that from October 12, when the suit was commenced by the waiving of process by Litchfield, that any inquiry was made to ascertain the location of this witness or procure his testimony. If Mr. Litchfield was not a partner of Anthony & Co. at the date of the execution of the note sued on, he certainly knew that fact on the day when he entered an appearance. He knew what the issue would be, and it behooved him to make reasonable efforts to procure the testimony of witnesses by whom he might make good his defense. The court was clearly right in overruling the application for a continuance, for the reason that no diligence was shown to obtain the testimony of the witness.

It is further claimed that the court erred in finding for the plaintiff and entering up judgment in the face of the plea filed by the defendant. It is contended that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to do something more than simply introduce the note. It is insisted that it devolved on him to show that Litchfield was a partner in order to make him liable in the action.

Section six (6) of the Revised Code, page 310, provides in actions upon contracts, express or implied, against two or more defendants, alleged to have been made or executed by such defendants as partners or joint obligors or payors, proof of the joint liability or partnership of the defendants or their Christian or surnames, shall not in the first instance be required to entitle the plaintiff to judgment, unless such proof shall be rendered necessary by the filing of pleas denying the execution of such writing verified by affidavit as required by law.

From a reading of this section, it is evident that before the plaintiff can be required to introduce any evidence going to show that the defendants were partners or joint obligors, the defendant must file his plea not denying the partnership or joint obligation, but denying the execution of the writing sued on.

The plea filed in this case goes to no such extent; it simply avers that at the date of the note he was not a partner, nor was he such partner at the time of the filing of the plea. This does not meet the requirements of the statute, nor did it render it necessary for the plaintiff to introduce other evidence than the note itself. Before the revision took place (see Laws 1861, p. 215, § 6) the law was different. The defendant could require the plaintiff to put in proof of partnership by filing a plea of abatement or by denying the execution of the writing sued on, but in the revision that part of section 6, page 215, Laws of 1861, which made it necessary for the plaintiff to establish the partnership when the defendant put it in question by plea of abatement, was omitted. The evident intention of the legislature in the revision was to relieve the plaintiff from the proof of partnership, when the execution of the writing itself was not denied under oath. And so reading the statute we are compelled to affirm the judgment rendered below, which is accordingly done, with costs.

Affirmed.

PARTNERSHIP, PLEA DENYING: Rogers v. Nuckall, 2 Colo. 282.
JURISDICTION — REMISSION OF DAMAGES. — A creditor may remit any part of his demand and sue for the balance in any court having jurisdiction thereof: Cramer v. McDowell, 6 Colo. 370. Thus the obligee in a bond was permitted to remit the excess of damages and sue for the balance, so as to bring his action within the jurisdictional amount: Davis v. Wauwamaker, 2 Colo. 638.

CODY v. RAYNAUD.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT in foreign county. Section 2, chapter 70 Revised Statutes, 500, applies to actions brought in probate courts.

PLEADING in action where defendant resides in foreign county. It is not necessary to aver in the declaration the facts which will give the court jurisdiction over a defendant who resides in another county.

JURISDICTION — want of — must be pleaded in abatement. If the court has not jurisdiction of the person, the defendant must plead that fact in abatement, and she cannot raise the question by motion.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURTS. Probate courts are of limited but not inferior jurisdiction.

CONTRACT, EXPRESS — may be abandoned for cause. A party may for good cause, and where the fault is not his own, abandon a special contract and recover the value of services upon an implied assumpsit.

CONTRACT, EXPRESS — if abandoned, plaintiff must resort to implied. In such case the law raises a contract for the protection of the innocent party, and the express contract is not involved except for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was cause for abandoning it.

CONTRACT, EXPRESS — abandoned without cause. Where a special contract was entered into, by which the plaintiff agreed to serve the defendant for the term of one year, if the plaintiff voluntarily and without the fault of the defendant quit the service of the defendant, she cannot recover.

The special contract being shown, it ought to appear that there was sufficient cause for abandoning it.

EVIDENCE of abandonment of contract. As to the cause for abandoning a special contract it is not enough that a witness should testify that plaintiff quit defendant's employment because of abusive language and bad treatment. Specific acts of defendant should be proved.

EVIDENCE of acquiescence in plaintiff's demand. Where the plaintiff proved a contract for service which had not been performed, and it appeared that at or about the time the plaintiff quit defendant's service the defendant requested the plaintiff to remember that she had left and had not been discharged, the circumstance that the defendant made no objection to a bill for services rendered, which was subsequently presented by the plaintiff, is not sufficient to show an agreement on the part of defendant to pay the same.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

THE declaration contained the common counts for work and labor and the money counts.

At the trial plaintiff read the deposition of Anna Lemon, who testified in substance, that in March, 1869, in New York city, the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiff, by which she employed the plaintiff to go to Denver and work for her at the rate of $50 per month for the term of one year; also that defendant agreed to pay plaintiff's traveling expenses in going to Denver.

Plaintiff also read the deposition of Wm. E. White to the same effect, except that he stated that the plaintiff was to receive $40 per month for the term of one year, and that the plaintiff was to receive her traveling expenses if she remained with defendant the full year, otherwise the traveling expenses were to be deducted from plaintiff's salary.

Alice Mulchinock testified: "I was in Mrs. Cody's employment at the time Madame Raynaud left, and afterward Madame Raynaud left Mrs. Cody on or about July 3d, 1869; she came in the store at Central City, Colorado Territory, afterward, and asked Mrs. Cody to settle with her; Mrs. Cody asked her what the amount was, and she (Mrs. Raynaud) calculated it in my presence at $50 per month, for three months and one week; Mrs. Cody made no objections at the time to Mrs. Raynaud about the amount; she said to me after Mrs. Raynaud left that she did not know how she (Madame Raynaud) had got it up to that, for you know (speaking to witness) it was only forty per month. I said I did not know it because I was not present at the agreement; that she (Mrs. Cody) had told me so, but Mr. White had told me it was $50 per month. That was all the conversation.

Question by plaintiff's counsel:

Did Mrs. Cody make any objections there in the presence of Mrs. Raynaud to paying her? Answer: She only said she would deduct her traveling expenses; I do not remember the amount of Madame Raynaud's bill. She calculated at the rate of $50 per month. It was for three months and one week. She (Madame Raynaud) left on Saturday, July 3, 1869, and called on Mrs. Cody Monday, July 5, 1869. I was present on Saturday when Mrs. Raynaud left. I had been in Mrs. Cody's employment from May 2, 1869, to then, and continued in her employment to August 2, 1869; Mrs. Raynaud left on account of Mrs. Cody's abusive language; I told Mrs. Raynaud to go on that day; there was no reason for Mrs. Cody to use such language.

Question: State just what Mrs. Cody told you she was paying Madame Raynaud? Answer: She stated to me that she was paying her ten per week. Mrs. Raynaud was in the employment of Mrs. Cody at Central City, when I came there, and remained in her employment until July 3d. Mrs. Cody told me she sent Madame Raynaud to Central because business was better there than in Denver. Madame Raynaud had gone to Central before I came to Denver.

Cross-examined by defendant's counsel: Madame Raynaud left the employment of Mrs. Cody because she was badly treated. She was not discharged, Mrs. Cody did not tell her to go, but she was so badly treated it was impossible for her to stay.

Question: After Madame Raynaud left and came back, on July 5th, do you remember that Mrs. Cody stated to her that she had left, and she (Mrs. Cody) had not discharged her, and do you remember the reply Mrs. Raynaud made?

Answer: Mrs. Raynaud made no reply. I am sure Mrs. Raynaud's bill, when presented to Mrs. Cody, was for three months and one week, and she calculated it at $50 per month. She so stated to Mrs. Cody in my presence. I have a suit pending against Mrs. Cody, and have no very kind feelings for her. On several occasions Mrs. Cody abused Mrs. Raynaud in my presence, on one occasion Mrs. Raynaud got so sick on account of it that she had to go to bed, and got to spitting blood. She was not subject to any pulmonary disease. I never heard her use any abusive language to Mrs. Cody.

Re-examined: It was on the day Madame Raynaud left that Mrs. Cody said to her: "Madame Raynaud you will remember that you have left, and I have not discharged you." It was on the following Monday, July 5, that Madame Raynaud called on Mrs. Cody and presented her bill, and all that Mrs. Cody then said was, that she would deduct her, Madame Raynaud's, traveling expenses. Mrs. Cody did not state to Madame Raynaud what the amount of her traveling expenses were; all she stated was, that she would deduct the amount of her traveling expenses. Mrs. Raynaud presented her bill for the full amount, and Mrs. Cody made no objections, except she said she would deduct her (Mrs. Raynaud's) traveling expenses."

Mr. DANIEL SAYER, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This was assumpsit in the probate court of Arapahoe county, for work and labor.

Plaintiff in error, who was defendant in the court below, was served with summons in Gilpin county, and the first assignment of error questions the power of the probate court to issue process to that county.

The jurisdiction of probate courts in civil actions, when the sum in controversy does not exceed $2,000, was first conferred by the legislative assembly in the year 1864. By the fifth section of that act, it was declared that the probate courts named should have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in all civil cases at law and in equity, where the debt or sum claimed should not exceed $2,000. By the sixth section the rules of practice of the district courts were made applicable to probate courts, and by the ninth section the probate courts are declared to be courts of record, and "they shall have a seal, and in their respective counties shall possess all the powers now vested in the district courts in this territory in all matters in controversy where the debt or sum claimed does not exceed $2,000."

This act did not comprehend the probate court of Arapahoe county, but in the following year an amendatory act extended the provisions of the first to all probate courts in the territory except that of Gilpin county. In section three of this last act jurisdiction was again conferred upon probate courts, but in language different from that of section five of the act of 1864, the words "concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts" being omitted from the act of 1865. But we doubt whether this omission is of any importance. The latter act comprehends "all actions, suits and proceedings at law brought for the recovery of money not exceeding in amount the sum of $2,000," and this jurisdiction is as plainly concurrent with the district courts as if it were so expressed.

One of the purposes of the act of 1865 was to withdraw from probate courts the equity jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1864, and to this end new language was used in conferring jurisdiction, which differs of course from that used in the first act, but not significantly, except as to the purpose which the assembly had in view.

It is to be observed also, that section 9 of the act of 1864, which gives to probate courts, within the limits prescribed to them, all the powers conferred upon district courts, was not expressly or impliedly modified by the act of 1865, and the same is true of the sixth section of the first act, which applied the practice of the district courts to the probate courts.

We are, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the second section of chapter 70, Revised Statutes, which prescribes the venue of civil actions is applicable to such actions in probate as well as district courts. By that section in certain cases actions may be brought in a county in which the defendant does not reside, and the summons served in the county of his residence. And of late it has not been thought necessary to aver in the declaration the facts which will give the process such extra-territorial force. Kenney v. Greer, 13 Ill. 492; Hamilton v. Dewey, 22 id. 490.

These cases also show that the question of jurisdiction is raised by plea in abatement and not by motion as was attempted in this case.

Much was said at the bar upon a question which was determined by this court in the case of Cass v. Davis. Probate courts are of limited, but not inferior, jurisdiction.

We are unable to deny the jurisdiction of the court below, and we will now consider the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment.

It appears from the evidence, that, in the month of March, 1869, defendant in error agreed with plaintiff in error to work for her one year as a milliner, and that she left the service of plaintiff in error after working a little more than three months. This special contract is not set out in the declaration, and if it were it is difficult to see how defendant in error could recover upon it, since it was never performed.

But a party may, for good cause and when the fault is not his own, abandon a special contract and recover the value of services upon an implied assumpsit. Lantry v. Parks, 8 Cow. 63; McClure v. Secrist, 5 Ind. 31; Eldridge v. Rowe, 2 Gilm. 91.

In such case the law raises a contract for the protection of the innocent party, and the express contract is not involved, except for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was cause for abandoning it.

Perhaps the price fixed by the express contract may be of some value on arriving at the compensation to be awarded under the implied contract, but the parties are not bound by it.

The measure of damages is the value of the services or materials furnished, and the aggrieved party is no more bound by the contract price than by the other provisions of the instrument.

If the defendant in error quit the service of the plaintiff voluntarily and without the fault of the latter, she cannot recover, and the special contract being shown, it ought to appear that there was sufficient cause for abandoning it. Upon this point the evidence is insufficient. A witness testified that defendant in error left the service of plaintiff on account of abusive language and bad treatment, but this is the opinion of the witness and no evidence that such language was used or that plaintiff's treatment of defendant was bad. The cause upon which defendant in error quit her employment is a fact to be proved by testimony of specific acts of plaintiff toward defendant, and not by such testimony as this. Evidence was given of a demand for wages by defendant upon plaintiff in error with a view to show the latter's acquiescence in the justice of that demand. In our opinion the conduct of plaintiff in error upon that occasion will not warrant such an inference.

The judgment of the probate court is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

TANNATT v. THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL BANK OF CENTRAL CITY, COLORADO.

AGENTS—what signature will bind principal. If an agent sign a bill of exchange in this form, "T. R. T., agent for S. T.," and there is nothing in the body of the bill evincing an intention to bind the principal, the agent shall be regarded as the drawer of the bill.

EVIDENCE—to explain the agent's signature. In such case parol evidence cannot be received to show that the agent intended to bind his principal.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

HALLETT, C. J., dissented.

Mr. E. T. WELLS and Mr. HUGH BUTLER, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellee.

BELFORD, J. This was an action brought by the Rocky Mountain National Bank against Thomas R. Tannatt, on a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy :

“BLACK HAWK, Col., March 11, 1869.

“At five days’ sight pay to the order of Rocky Mountain National Bank, fifteen hundred dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of

“THOMAS R. TANNATT,

“Agent for S. TAYLOR.

“To S. TAYLOR, Providence, R. I.”

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below, and the defendant brings the cause here on appeal.

On the trial, the defendant offered to prove that the bill of exchange was drawn by him in a representative capacity. That, at the time of the drawing of the same, and for a considerable period anterior thereto, he was engaged in carrying on business for Taylor ; that he drew the bill of exchange on Taylor, as his agent and not otherwise, and that the bank had full knowledge of this fact.

This evidence was excluded by the court, and is one of the grounds of complaint.

We see no error in the rejection of this evidence. If the defendant is liable as drawer of this negotiable instrument, that liability must be determined by the instrument itself. Parol evidence can never be admitted for the purpose of exonerating an agent who has entered into a written contract in which he appears as principal, even though he should propose to show, if allowed, that he disclosed his agency and mentioned the name of his principal at the time the contract was executed. When a simple contract, other than a bill or note, is made by an agent, the principal whom he represents may, in general, maintain an action upon it in his own name, and parol evidence is admissible, although the contract is in writing, to show that the person named in the contract was an agent, and that he was acting for his principal. Such evidence does not deny that the contract binds those whom on its face it purports to bind, but shows that it also binds another. Nash v. Towne, 5 Wallace, 703.

In the case of Jones v. Littledale, 6 Adolphus & Ellis, 486, Lord DENMAN, delivering the judgment of the court, lays down this as a general proposition, "that if the agent contracts in such form as to make himself personally responsible, he cannot afterward, whether his principal were or were not known at the time of contract, relieve himself from that responsibility."

In many cases it is held that parol evidence may be introduced to charge an undisclosed principal, but never to exonerate an agent who has made himself personally liable. 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 224 (marginal).

Is Thomas R. Tannatt personally liable on this bill of exchange? "The rule is well settled," says Mr. STORY, "that, as to agents, if they draw or indorse or accept bills in their own names, although on account and for the benefit of their principals, they are held personally liable, because they alone can be treated on the face of the bills as parties. If they would bind their principals, they must draw, indorse or accept the bills in the name of their principals, and sign for them and in their names." It is further added in a note, "that, in order to bind the principal and exonerate himself, the agent should regularly sign thus: 'A B by C D, his agent,' or 'C D for A B.' But in practice there are innumerable deviations from this simple and appropriate form, and the decisions upon the various cases which have arisen in courts of justice involve much conflict of doctrine and opinion, and do not seem always to have proceeded upon any uniform principle of interpretation." See Story on Bills of Exchange, § 97.

In the case of The City of Detroit v. Jackson, 1 Doug.

115, the judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, after reviewing the numerous cases on the subject, says: "In these and numerous other cases of the same class, the courts have simply looked to the form of the instrument itself in order to ascertain whether it is the contract of the principal or of the agent personally. If, by the terms of the agreement, a party describing himself as agent undertakes to do certain things, the mere addition of the word 'agent,' or, indeed, any other designation which he may add to his name, will not make it the contract of his principal. Such addition will be regarded as mere description, and will not have the effect of binding a third person who is not, in form, made a party to the instrument. It is not enough that the person executing an instrument have power as agent to bind a third person, he must, in fact, make it the obligation of that person in terms in order to bind him. A familiar instance of the manner of executing a contract by an agent is found in the case of bank bills. They are, upon their face, the promise of the corporation by which they were issued, though signed by the president and cashier with an abbreviation showing only the capacity in which they sign."

In the case of Tucker v. Fairbanks and others, 98 Mass. 104, GRAY, Judge, says: "The question, whether the defendants are liable upon the face of the bill, requires more consideration. The difficulty is not in ascertaining the general principles which must govern the cases of this nature, but in applying them to the different forms and shades of expression in particular instruments. In order to exempt an agent from liability upon an instrument executed by him within the scope of his agency, he must not only name his principal, but he must express, by some form of words, that the writing is the act of the principal, though done by the hand of the agent. If he expresses this, the principal is bound and the agent is not. But a mere description of the general relation or office which the person signing the paper holds to another person or to a corporation, without indicating that the particular signature is made in the execution of the office and agency, is not sufficient to charge the principal or to exempt the agent from personal liability."

It is claimed that the words, "agent for S. Taylor," fully indicate that Tannatt signed the bill of exchange in a representative capacity, and that the engagement manifests an intent not to bind himself, but to bind the principal. It will be observed, however, that Taylor's name as principal nowhere appears in the body of the instrument. The money was to be charged to Tannatt's account, not Taylor's. The words, "agent for S. Taylor," may be regarded as a mere description of the general relation or office which the person signing the paper holds to another person, without indicating that the particular signature is made in the execution of the office and agency.

"Agent for a particular person," says GRAY, Judge, "may designate either the general relation, which the person signing holds to another party, or that the particular act in question is done in behalf of, and as the very contract of, that other; and the court, if such is manifestly the intention of the parties, may construe the words in the latter sense."

But how is this manifest intent to be learned? Clearly from the whole instrument. In affixing the words, "agent for S. Taylor," it is possible that he designed them as a memorandum, to be used in a settlement he might afterward make with Taylor. The signature of the defendant does not purport to have been made in behalf of a principal. They do not express an act of agency, as the words "A B" for "C D" would. They are mere description. I agree that no precise form of words is indispensable to the execution of an instrument by an agent for a principal. But it must appear in some way that the instrument is executed in behalf of the principal, or it cannot be his act.

It is not unusual for one who, as surety, executes a joint bond with the principal debtor, to annex to his name the character in which he signs. But then there is no doubt that he is liable to the creditor. Had the signature been

"Thos. R. Tannatt, agent of S. Taylor," it would hardly be contended that it was Taylor's bill of exchange.

But it is claimed that this form of signature has been repeatedly adjudged good by the supreme court of Massachusetts. I admit that it has been so held in Ballou v. Talbot, 16 Mass. 461, but the decision in that case, while it has been followed there, has not quieted discussion, even in that State. In the case of Jefts and Wife v. York, 4 Cushing, 371, the signature was "S. D. York, agent for the Freewill Baptist Church," but the body of the note sued on contained the name of the principal, and it was the principal that made the promise, and the case turned upon that fact.

In the case of Barlow v. The Congregational Society, etc., 3 Allen, 461, this subject is again considered, and GRAY, J., remarks: "All the decisions of this court upon unsealed instruments, since the case of Mann v. Chandler, 9 Mass. 335, have required something more than a mere description of the general relation between the agent and the principal in order to make them the contracts of the latter."

Again, he says: "But wherever it appears upon the face of a simple contract, made by an agent of one named therein, and whom he can legally bind thereby, that he acts as agent and intends to bind his principal, the law will give effect to the intention in whatever form expressed."

"In short, the note not only names the principal, describes the relation between the principal and the agent, and declares the note to be made in execution of the agency, but it cannot take effect according to its terms, except as the note of the principal. As the intention to bind the defendants thus appears upon the face of the note, the judgment must be affirmed."

If, as it has been held in this and in the case in 98 Mass., that the words "Agent for A B" may be taken as a description of the general relation between the agent and the principal, it seems to me a forced construction to say, that a signature in that form must also be taken as indicating a manifest intent to bind the principal.

In the case of Offut v. Ayres, 7 Monr. 356, the form of the signature was "For B. Ayres, W. B. Ayres," and the court held it to be the note of W. B. Ayres.

In the case of Webb v. Burke, 5 B. Monr., it is said to be well settled, that if in the body of a writing, A B, as agent, binds C D, and then signs it "A B, agent for C D," the writing is that of C D.

In the case of Cook & Co. v. Sanford, 3 Dana, the note was "One day after date we promise," etc., and signed "V. McKnight for N. B. Cook & Co." The court say, in this case, the words "we promise" show that the promise was intended to be made by a plurality of individuals, and there would be an inconsistency in supposing it to be the agent who promised.

It will be observed, that this cause is not made to rest on the form of the signature, but what appears in the body of the instrument, and which unmistakably shows that the principal and not the agent was intended to be bound. See, also, Downer v. Collin, 26 Ala. 591.

In the case of De Witt v. Wallin, 4 Seld. 571, the form of the signature was "David Hubbell Hoyt, agent for the churchman." GARDNER, Ch. J., says in commenting on this signature, "It is not sufficient that he describes himself as agent, he must give a right of action against the principal. Here the promise is not by the defendant or the churchman, nor by Hoyt for them or either of them, or in their behalf, but for himself. The formula used by him in the signature to the note in controversy has been determined in this and other States, to create an obligation on the part of the agent personally, and not in behalf of the principal. I can see no good reason for relaxing the principle of these decisions. We may conjecture, that the affix to the name of Hoyt was designed by him to answer some other purpose than simply to designate his person. He may have supposed that it created a contract upon the part of the defendant, or what is more probable, he may have designed it as a memorandum to enable him to determine thereafter from what fund the note should be paid, and to guide him in making up his account with the churchman or with the defendant personally. It is sufficient to defeat the action that this purpose is equivocal, that the language does not necessarily, or by fair and reasonable construction, create an assumpsit on the part of the defendant, whether known as William Walton or as 'the Churchman.' There is no great hardship in requiring, that if one man undertakes to oblige another by note, bill of exchange or other commercial instrument, he should manifest his purpose clearly and intelligibly, or that his principal will not be bound, whatever may be the result in reference to himself."

I am aware that in this case PARKER, J., also delivered an opinion, but I am unable to see that it militates in any degree against the doctrine laid down by Gardiner. At all events in the case of Fiske v. Eldridge, 12 Gray, 474, this case is quoted with approval. See, also, 98 Mass. 106.

I confess that, after a most careful consideration of the Massachusetts cases, I fail to appreciate the soundness of a rule which declares that the words "agent for" may be taken on the one hand as a description of the general relation which the person signing holds to another, and on the other hand as showing that the particular act in question is done in behalf of, and as the very contract of, that other. If these words are open to this two-fold interpretation, when and how is the proper use of them to be determined? Under what circumstances will the court regard them as words of description, and when as indicating that the particular signature is made in the execution of the office and agency? Is it to be a matter of legal whim and caprice, or is the application to be made under fixed rules on recognized principles? In the case of Tucker v. Fairbanks, 98 Mass. 106, the court say that the latter construction may be given, when such is manifestly the intention of the parties. The intent to bind the principal, therefore, must be manifest before the courts should construe the words in the latter sense. If this intent is to be derived from the form of the signature, there ought certainly to be some particular shade given to the words by the writer of them, so that we might learn when they are to be used in the one sense and when in the other. No! we must look elsewhere. Not outside the instrument, because the liability of the drawers of a negotiable instrument must be determined from the instrument itself; but look to the whole instrument and from the body of the contract, taken together with the signature, determine whether it gives a right of action against the principal. If it does, then it exempts the agent; otherwise, he is responsible. If by his act of signing he has left it doubtful whether another or himself is to be bound, the doubt is to be resolved against him, and especially in cases of negotiable paper, where the rule is well settled, that whoever takes it enters into a contract with the parties who appear on the face of it, and cannot look to others for payment. 12 Gray, 481.

While we hold that a person may draw, accept or indorse a bill by his agent, and it will be obligatory upon him as though it was done by his own hand, still the agent, in such case, must either sign the name of the principal to the bill, or it must appear on the face of the bill itself in some way or other, that it was in fact done for him, or the principal will not be bound. See Sayre v. Nichols, 7 Cal. 541.

If we look at the body of this bill of exchange there is nothing in it showing any intention to make Taylor liable. To hold him liable, we must rest our judgment wholly on the form of the signature. And we have already shown that a signature of that kind can be taken as a mere description of the relation which the party signing bears to another, or as showing that the particular act in question is done in behalf of, and as the very contract of, that other.

We feel that it is unsafe to adopt this latter construction, unless it appears from the whole instrument that it was the manifest intent of Tannatt to bind Taylor. In my judgment there is nothing manifesting this intent, and the judgment should be affirmed.

My brother Eyster fully concurring with me in this opinion, the judgment below is affirmed.

HALLETT, C. J., dissenting. Appellant was charged as drawer of certain drafts signed by him as follows: "Thos. R. Tannatt, agent for S. Taylor," and the question is, whether he is liable in that character. Appellant appears to have been the agent of Taylor, or at all events he proposed to show upon the trial that he was such agent, and that he had authority from Taylor to draw these drafts. If such were the facts, it appears to me that the signature was sufficient to bind Taylor, and relieve appellant from liability. This precise formula has often been held sufficient to bind the principal, and I think that as to these words, the question should be regarded as settled. Ballou v. Talbott, 16 Mass. 460; Barlow v. Cong. Society of Lee, 8 Allen, 460; Tucker Manf. Co. v. Fairbanks, 98 Mass. 101; Hovey v. Magill, 2 Conn. 680; 1 Am. Lead. Cases (4th ed.), 612, 629, and cases cited. Against these authorities is the opinion of GARDINER, C. J., in De Witt v. Walton, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 572. In this case PARKER, J., gives another ground for his opinion, and it does not appear whether the other members of the court concurred with him or with the chief justice, and therefore it cannot be said that the court decided in that case that in this method of signing the agent binds himself and not his principal. I think that the weight of authority is against the ruling of the court below, and that the judgment should be reversed.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—LATENT AMBIGUITY. — Parol evidence is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity in a bill of exchange: Hagar v. Rice, 4 Colo. 94, where the court say that they cannot assent to the doctrine laid down in the principal case, "a doctrine whose tendency is to defeat rather than effectuate the intention of the parties to written contracts."

ALLEN v. ELDRIDGE.

MARRIED WOMAN—may recover her earnings. By chapter 60, Revised Statutes, 454, a husband is deprived of all interest in the labor of his wife, rendered to third persons, and a married woman may maintain an action in her own name to recover her earnings.

MARRIED WOMAN'S OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY must be proved. Where husband and wife are living together, and there is no evidence as to the ownership of provisions and articles of household use, the presumption is that they belong to the husband.

INSTRUCTIONS — must be applicable to the evidence. Where there is no evidence to show that the plaintiff is the owner of personal property, it is error to instruct the jury that if the defendant took and used the property of the plaintiff he is liable to her for its value.

Error to District Court, Jefferson County.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. JOSEPH MANN, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The declaration in this case contains the common counts for work and labor, goods sold and delivered, etc., to which plaintiff in error pleaded a set-off and the general issue. The evidence is given in the bill of exceptions, and relates to a sale of goods to plaintiff in error, and work and labor done for him by defendant in error. The evidence shows that defendant in error was, at the time the action accrued, and at the time of trial, a married woman, living with her husband, and it is upon this fact that her right to recover in this action is denied.

At common law this action was not maintainable, and it becomes necessary to inquire whether it is sustained by chapter 60 of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Married Women." That chapter, so far as it relates to the questions to be considered, is as follows :

Sec. 1. "The property, real and personal, which any woman in this territory may own at the time of her marriage, and the rents, issues, profits and proceeds thereof, and any real, personal or mixed property which shall come to her by descent, devise or bequest, or the gift of any person except her husband, including presents or gifts from her husband, as jewelry, silver table-ware, watches, money and wearing apparel, shall remain her sole and separate property, notwithstanding her marriage, and not be subject to the disposal of her husband; or liable for his debts."

Sec. 2. "Any married woman, while married, may bargain, sell and convey her personal property, and enter into any contract in reference to the same as if she were sole."

Sec. 3. "Any woman may, while married, sue and be sued in all matters having relation to her property, person or reputation, in the same manner as if she were sole."

Sec. 6. "Any married woman may carry on any trade or business, and perform any labor or services on her sole and separate account, and the earnings of any married woman from her trade, business, labor or services shall be her sole and separate property, and may be used and invested by her in her own name, and she may sue and be sued as if sole in regard to her trade, business, labor, services and earnings, and her property acquired by trade, business and services, and the proceeds thereof, may be taken on any execution against her."

The right of a married woman to the proceeds of her own labor, under this statute, cannot be doubted. The language of the act is clear and explicit, and the husband is deprived of all interest in the labor of his wife, rendered to third persons. It may be contended that the words "on her sole and separate account," in the first clause of section 6, restrict the woman's right to cases in which she declares her intention to appropriate the proceeds of her labor to her own use. But there is little room for such construction. It must be presumed that every one who labors for hire is seeking his own personal emolument; for men do not sow that others may reap. The highest claim to the fruits of labor is vested in him who performs it, and none other need be asserted. We do not doubt the right of defendant in error to recover in her own name the value of her services personally rendered to plaintiff in error, and this, whether the contract for payment is express or implied.

As to the merchandise alleged to have been sold to plaintiff in error, we have greater difficulty. It seems that in the month of July, 1867, defendant in error, with her husband, lived on plaintiff's farm, but not in the house occupied by him. While there, she was engaged by plaintiff in error to keep house for him, and with her husband removed into plaintiff's house, carrying with her a quantity of lard and other articles of household use, which she testified were purchased by plaintiff in error from her. There is no evidence as to the ownership of these articles, except that they were in possession of defendant in error and her husband. So far as we know, the husband and wife were living together in the full enjoyment of marital rights, and the husband managing and controlling his family affairs. In such case, we think there can be no presumption that articles of food plainly intended for family use are the separate property of the wife. As we have seen, the law gives to a married woman the personal property which she has at marriage, and such as may come to her during coverture, by descent, etc., and such as she may acquire in trade or business, but there is nothing to show that these articles came in any of these ways. In the absence of evidence to show the separate ownership of the wife, the law will presume that they were owned by the husband, there being nothing in this statute to change this common-law intentment. But it may be said that there was an express promise to pay defendant in error for these goods, upon which an action would lie by her and her husband jointly, and, therefore, her suit can only be defeated by plea in abatement. We know that, upon a promissory note or covenant made to the wife during coverture, husband and wife may sue as plaintiffs, and if the wife sue alone, the non-joinder of the husband must be pleaded in abatement. Gaters v. Madeley, 6 Mees. & Wels. 422; Bendix v. Wakeman, 12 id. 87; Dalton v. Midland County Railway Company, 76 Eng. Com. Law, 474. But we have not found a case which goes the length of saying, that a wife may join her husband in an action upon an unwritten promise to the wife, made upon a consideration moving from the husband. Nor do we propose to discuss this question, for we are not able to ascertain from the evidence that there was an express promise to defendant in error, rather than her husband. She testifies that plaintiff in error promised to pay her, but the plaintiff denies it. And if we concede that her statement is true, it by no means follows that there was an undertaking to pay the wife instead of the husband. One who is dealing with a wife, acting for her husband, will ordinarily address her in the second person singular, without any intention to engage with her instead of her husband. So a purchaser of dry goods will promise payment to the owner's clerk, but no lawyer would bring an action upon such promise in the name of the clerk. To enable a wife to join with her husband in an action upon an undertaking, the engagement must have been with her distinctly and unquestionably, and the evidence in this case does not show such an undertaking. Again, the jury were not instructed that an express undertaking to pay defendant in error for this merchandise was essential to her right of recovery; but they were told, that if plaintiff in error took and used the property of defendant in error, he was liable to her for its value. The instruction, as an abstract proposition of law, is not to be denied, but it is not applicable to the facts of this case. There was nothing to show that defendant in error owned the goods, and under this instruction the jury may have given undue weight to the evidence. The judgment of the district court is reversed with costs, and the cause is remanded.

JONES v. CARRUTHERS.

DIMINUTION OF RECORD — will not be noticed if error appear. A bill of exceptions in the record was not questioned, but it was alleged that another bill of exceptions remained in the court below. Error appearing in the bill of exceptions contained in the transcript on file a suggestion of diminution of the record will not be noticed.

DEPOSITIONS — taken without notice. Unless notice of the time and place of taking depositions be given to the opposite party, they cannot be read upon the trial of the cause.

Error to Probate Court, Park County.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. MARSHALL PAUL and Mr. S. E. BROWN, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. This cause was submitted to the court upon the twenty-eighth day of July last, and the parties then entered into a written stipulation to the effect that the plaintiff in error should file abstracts and copies of his arguments by the first day of October following, and that the defendant in error should join in error and file copies of his argument by the first day of November following. The argument of counsel for plaintiff in error was filed on the thirtieth day of September last, according to the terms of the agreement, but no argument upon the error assigned has been filed by counsel for defendant in error. We find among the papers in the cause a suggestion of diminution of the record filed October 31, 1870, which charges that a bill of exceptions, differing from that now before us, has been omitted from the transcript of the record. Nothing is said as to the nature of the difference between the omitted exceptions and those now before us, nor is it alleged that the bill of exceptions given in the transcript of the record on file in this court is incorrect in any particular. Accepting the present exceptions, which we find in the transcript, as truly taken, we perceive that there is error in the record, and therefore it is not necessary to await the production of other portions of the record. Upon the trial of the cause, certain depositions were read in evidence on behalf of defendant in error, and it does not appear that plaintiff in error ever had notice of the time and place of taking such depositions. It is hardly necessary to say that depositions of witnesses cannot be given in evidence unless notice be given of the time and place of taking them, according to the provisions of the statute. Counsel for plaintiff in error objected to the reading of these depositions upon the trial below, and excepted to the ruling of the court in admitting them to be read in evidence, and therefore he may renew his objection here.

The judgment of the probate court is reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded.

PRACTICE — assessing damages on default. In trespass de bonis upon defaulting the defendant, the damages must be assessed by a jury.

Error to Probate Court, Fremont County.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, for plaintiff in error.

Per CURIAM. This was an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, brought by George G. Wilder and others, as trustees of "The Colorado Oil Association," against Francis Gallup et al. There was a judgment taken in the court below by default, and the damages assessed without the intervention of a jury. In a case of this kind the assessment of damages by the court was clearly erroneous. A jury should have been called. See the case of Jones v. Stevens, ante, 67, decided by this court. The judgment of the court below is reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

FOSTER v. THE PEOPLE.

CONSTRUCTION of section 43 of Criminal Code, relating to mayhem. The effect of the proviso in section 43 of the Criminal Code (Rev. Stat. 202) is to reduce the crime in certain specified cases from a higher to a lower grade.

MISDEMEANOR — conviction may be had upon indictment for felony. A conviction for misdemeanor may be had upon an indictment for felony in case where the misdemeanor is included in the higher offense.

INDICTMENT for mayhem need not negative circumstances mentioned in proviso to section 43. An indictment for mayhem, in which the fact and the intent are charged, is good for the principal crime, mentioned in section 43, and also for the misdemeanor mentioned in the last clause of that section.

INSTRUCTION erroneous as to higher offense, but not as to the lesser. The jury were instructed that, if the injury was inflicted during a fight between the prisoner and the prosecuting witness had by consent, and the prisoner was the assailant, or the prosecuting witness declined further combat at the time the fact occurred, the prisoner was guilty. This charge, if applied to the higher offense, is erroneous, but, if applied to the inferior offense, it is too favorable to the prisoner.

VERDICT OF GUILTY — a conviction of the inferior offense. The evidence being clear that the prisoner bit off the ear of the prosecuting witness during a fight between them, assuming that the jury intended to find that the fight was by consent, which is the view most favorable to the prisoner, the verdict is still sufficient for the misdemeanor defined in the last clause of the proviso to section 43.

PRACTICE — error in entering judgment. The judgment of the district court, being for the higher offense, was set aside, and the court below was directed to pronounce judgment on the verdict for the misdemeanor specified in the last clause of section 43 of the Criminal Code.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. V. D. MARKHAM, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The indictment in this case is founded upon section 43 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

“Mayhem consists in the unlawfully depriving a human being of a member of his or her body, or disfiguring or rendering it useless. If any person shall unlawfully cut out or disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, ear or lip, or disable any limb or member of another, or shall voluntarily and of purpose put out an eye or eyes, every such person shall be guilty of mayhem, and on conviction shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than one year nor more than three years; provided that no person shall be found guilty of mayhem where the fact occurred during a fight had by consent, nor unless it appear that the person accused shall have been the assailant, or that the party maimed had, in good faith, endeavored to decline further combat; but, in all other cases where the fact shall happen in actual fight, the party accused, being thereof duly convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, and be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars.”

Our first duty is to ascertain the true meaning of the proviso in this section which has been the subject of much discussion at the bar, and by which the sufficiency of this record is to be tested. In the first place, it is to be observed that in that part of the section which precedes the proviso, mayhem is defined and punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than one year nor more than three years. If the proviso were struck out of the section the crime and its punishment would remain clearly ascertained ; but it is said, that the proviso creates an exception in the statute, which ought to have been negatived in the indictment. In the printed copy of the statute a period is inserted after the word "combat," and thus the proviso is divided into two sentences, while it is very evident, from the language used, that but one was intended. If mistakes of this kind were less common it would hardly be necessary to comment upon the necessity of overlooking this one, and I shall pass to the consideration of the proviso, as if it were properly punctuated. Reading the proviso connectedly, we find in the first place that no person shall be found guilty of mayhem where the fact occurred during a fight had by consent, concerning which it is only necessary to remark that the reference is to the crime of mayhem as previously defined and punished. The language of the proviso then succeeding is as follows : "Nor unless it appear that the person accused shall have been the assailant, or that the party maimed had in good faith endeavored to decline further combat."

The negative particle which connects this clause with the preceding, shows that this also is a limitation upon the crime defined and punished in the clause which stands before the word provided. These two clauses of the proviso being connected by the disjunctive nor, we cannot say that either limits or qualifies the other, but both of them must be regarded as qualifying what comes before them. We come now to the third and last clause of the proviso, beginning with the words, "but in all other cases where the fact shall happen in actual fight," etc, and this, it will be observed, is not a denial or limitation of any thing which stands before it. It is a substantial clause prescribing a punishment different from that first mentioned, in certain cases "where the fact shall happen in actual fight." Now, we cannot say that the "other cases where the fact shall happen in actual fight," here referred to, are those previously mentioned in the proviso, because certain of those thus mentioned, to wit: the cases in which the party maimed declines the combat before the fact, are expressly included in the punishment first prescribed.

Another construction is, however, open to us, which is so reasonable and just, and accords so perfectly with the import of the language, that we do not hesitate to adopt it. By the terms of the preceding clauses, where the injury is inflicted during a fight, had by consent, and where the accused was not the assailant, and the injured party did not decline combat before the fact, the offender is not punishable according to the provisions of the first part of the section, and these are the other cases referred to in the last clause of the proviso. The cases excepted out of the first part of the section, on account of the mitigating circumstances attending them, are visited with milder punishment. The only effect of the proviso, then, is to reduce the offense in certain specified cases, from a higher to a lower grade. Whether the higher offense is a felony, appears to be an open question. Commonwealth v. Newell, 7 Mass. 244. But this is not important, except with reference to the old rule, that a conviction for misdemeanor could not be had upon an indictment for felony. As we are not disposed to adopt that rule, it seems unnecessary to inquire whether mayhem is felony under our law. Upon the point that a conviction for misdemeanor may be had upon an indictment for felony in cases where the misdemeanor is included in the higher offense, counsel are referred to People v. Jackson, 3 Hill, 92; Stewart v. State, 5 Ohio, 145. Upon what has been said of the interpretation of the statute, we are now prepared to speak of the sufficiency of this indictment. The criminal acts prohibited by the law are: cutting out or disabling the tongue, putting out an eye, slitting the nose, ear or lip, and the circumstances attending the act, as whether it be done in a fight had by consent, whether the accused were the assailant, etc., determine the nature and aggravation of the crime and the punishment to be administered.

The acts prohibited are criminal in a degree determinable by the circumstances attending them. Now it is always sufficient in pleading to charge the fact, leaving matters of excuse to come in by way of defense. Mr. STARKIE says "that no indictment is sufficient which alleges an act or omission in itself innocent, unless it proceed to disclose circumstances which render such act or omission illegal," and it would be difficult to find a better statement of the rule. But when the act is in itself criminal, it is sufficient to charge it, leaving the prisoner to excuse himself if he can. In Ree v. Pemberton, 2 Burr. 1036, the rule is laid down as follows: "It is enough for the prosecutor to bring the case within the general purview of the statute, upon which the indictment is founded; if that statute has general prohibitory words in it. For where an indictment is brought upon a statute which has general prohibitory words in it, it is sufficient to charge the offense generally in the words of the statute, and if a subsequent statute or (as Mr. Justice FOSTER and Mr. Justice WILMOT, who spoke after Lord MANSFIELD and Mr. Justice DENNISON, added), even a clause of exception, contained in the same statute, excuses persons under such and such circumstances, or gives license to persons so and so qualified so as to excuse or except them out of the general prohibitory words, that must come by way of plea or evidence, that the party is not within such general prohibition but excepted out of it."

So Mr. CHITTY (1 C. L. 231 a), "In general all matters of defense must come from the defendant and need not be anticipated or stated by the prosecutor."

See, also, Commonwealth v. Hart, 11 Cush. 130. The application of this rule to the case under consideration is obvious. The act prohibited by the law and charged in this indictment is biting off the ear of the prosecuting witness Thompson, and this act is criminal in a high or low degree, according to the relations of the parties, as whether they were in combat, etc., at the time of the injury. In either case, the prosecutor can do no more than charge the fact with the intent, because this is all that is necessary to make out the crime. To require the pleader to negative the circumstances, which would reduce the crime to the lower grade, would be to anticipate the defendant's case, and this is as unnecessary as it is unreasonable.

We think that the indictment is good, not only for the principal crime, but also for the misdemeanor defined in the last clause of the proviso. As before observed, the criminal act is the same whatever the circumstances attending its commission. It is like a case of homicide which may be murder or manslaughter, according to the relations of the prisoner and deceased at the time of the fact. As we have seen, the pleader could not do more than negative the circumstances which will reduce the crime, and if this had been done the indictment would still be good for the smaller offense. The greater includes the less, and the indictment without such negative averments must still be good for the smaller offense.

Upon the trial below, the jury were instructed that if the injury was inflicted during a fight between Foster and Thompson, had by consent, and Foster was the assailant, or Thompson declined the combat at the time the fact occurred, the accused was guilty. Considered with reference to the higher crime, this charge does not conform to the views expressed in this opinion, but applied to the inferior offense, the charge is too favorable to the plaintiff in error. There is evidence tending to show, and probably the jury found, that Thompson, the prosecuting witness, entered into the combat voluntarily. That Foster and Thompson did fight, and that during the struggle the former bit off the ear of the latter, under circumstances peculiarly atrocious, is upon the evidence beyond all doubt. Whether the fight was by consent is not so clear, but upon the evidence and the instructions of the court the jury may have found that fact. Assuming that the jury intended to find that the fight was by consent, which is the view most favorable to the plaintiff in error, this verdict is still sufficient for the misdemeanor defined in the last clause of the proviso. Beyond all doubt he is guilty of the inferior offense, and admitting the full force of every objection that he makes to this record, he stands convicted of it. The new testimony which he desires to introduce upon another trial of the cause would not free him from this guilt, and therefore it would be useless to give him an opportunity to present it. The judgment of the district court is too large, and therefore it must be reversed and set aside. But the ends of justice do not require that another trial of the cause shall be had, and therefore the district court of Arapahoe county is directed to enter judgment upon the verdict of the jury, as for the misdemeanor mentioned in the last clause of section 43 of the Criminal Code, and the said plaintiff in error shall attend before said district court on the first day of the next term thereof, and from day to day thereafter until discharged by that court, in order that judgment may be pronounced against him.

DEITSOH v. WIGGINS et al.

TRESPASS — plea of justification. In trespass de bonis against an attaching creditor who justifies under the writ he must aver and prove a debt due from the attachment defendant to him.

PLEADING — must be good as to all. If two or more in pleading join in a defense which is sufficient for one but not for others, the plea is bad as to all.

The sheriff who levied the writ of attachment joined with the attaching creditor in a plea of justification insufficient as to the latter, and the defense was not available to either of them.

PLEA DEFECTIVE — issue thereon. A plea defective in substance is not cured by joining issue thereon unless the defects are supplied in the replication.

Plea defective in substance. A plea substantially defective presents no defense to the action, and evidence of the facts alleged therein, or of those omitted therefrom, cannot be received although issue is joined thereon.

In trespass de bonis by a vendee of goods against creditors of the vendor, who have taken the goods in attachment, the latter cannot show that an agent who made the sale acted without authority from the vendor, unless they also show a debt due from the vendor to them.

PLEA OF JUSTIFICATION must be special. In trespass de bonis the defense that the goods were taken under attachment against a third person is not admissible under the general issue.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES in trespass. In trespass de bonis the plaintiff may recover the highest market price of the goods taken.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

TRESPASS by the vendees of merchandise against creditors of the vendor, who had taken the goods in attachment and the sheriff who levied the writ.

The pleadings are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

P. M. Martin testified, that the goods were taken by the sheriff from the possession of appellee's agent, and that he invoiced the goods by the direction of the sheriff, at cost and freight added; that the invoice price was $2,315.90; that the goods might be sold for this amount with good management; but that he did not think them worth more than seventy-five cents on the dollar of the invoice price; that he would not give more than that amount; but that it would not be difficult to get cost for them, that the cash valuation is the amount added upon the invoice.

Charles C. Post testified, that he was present when the goods were taken away, and saw the sheriff and appellant there, that appellant was engaged in selecting the goods from the shelves as they were being packed.

Defendants below offered to prove, by Charles E. Sherman, that the goods taken were part of the stock of merchandise of Oliver S. Buell, who did business under the name and style of O. S. Buell & Co.; that the witness, Charles E. Sherman, was the clerk of said O. S. Buell for the space of about six months prior to the 6th day of May, 1867; that for two or three months prior to the 2d or 6th day of May, 1867, the said Buell was absent from the said territory of Colorado; that during the absence of the said Buell, said Sherman was the clerk of said Buell, to carry on the regular business of said Buell in Central City, which was retailing clothing and merchandise; that the said Sherman had no right or authority whatever to sell or dispose of the entire stock of goods of said Buell, but was only authorized to sell in the regular course of business; that on the 29th day of April, 1867, John Q. Hart, agent of the plaintiffs, well knowing that the said Sherman was not authorized to sell the entire stock of goods, fraudulently agreed and combined and confederated with the said Sherman to make a pretended purchase of the entire stock of goods, for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the defendants, Moritz Deitsch, Isidor Deitsch and Jonas Deitsch, defendants herein, and other creditors; that the said Hart well knew that the said Jonas Deitsch, Moritz Deitsch and Isidor Deitsch were creditors of said Buell to a large amount, and that such sale was designed by him to cheat, hinder and defraud said defendants; that said stock of goods was worth $10,000, but was sold to said Hart, Wiggins & Co., for a grossly inadequate sum; that whatever money was paid, if any, or securities given, were so concealed, smuggled and managed as to protect and place it beyond the reach of the defendants and for the benefit of the said Buell, Hart, Wiggins & Co., John Q. Hart and said Sherman, to which evidence plaintiffs objected, and the court sustained the objection.

Defendants then offered the affidavit, bond and sheriff's return in the suit of Deitsch & Bros. against Buell, to which plaintiffs objected, and the objection was sustained.

The court gave the following instructions to the jury at the request of the plaintiffs below:

The court is asked to instruct the jury, that the defendants are not entitled to have the goods and chattels taken by them appraised or valued at the wholesale price, but the jury may find the goods and chattels of the value they would bring in market at retail.

If the jury believe, from the evidence in the case, that before the commencement of this suit the plaintiffs were possessed of a quantity of personal property, and the defendants, William Z. Cozens and Moritz Deitsch, took the said goods and chattels, and carried the same away without the consent of the plaintiffs, such acts were acts of trespass.

The court instructs the jury, that, when the goods of another are taken without his consent, and against his will, and it is shown that the taking was wrongful, the highest market price or value of the goods so taken, at the time of the taking, will be allowed to the owner.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that, at the time defendant, Cozens, was packing up the goods and chattels mentioned in the declaration, Moritz Deitsch was there, assisting in selecting the same, without the consent of plaintiffs, then he was guilty of trespass, and, if he had the consent of plaintiffs, it is incumbent on the defendant Deitsch to prove such consent.

The court instructs the jury, that if they believe, from the evidence, that the goods mentioned in the declaration were in the possession of the plaintiffs at the time of the taking of the goods by the defendants, or either of them, if said goods were taken by them, or either of them, the law presumes they, the said plaintiffs, were the owners of said goods, and it is incumbent on the defendants to rebut that presumption by proof that they were not the goods of the plaintiffs, and if said defendants have failed to make such proof, they should find for the plaintiffs such sum as, by the evidence, such goods were shown to be worth.

On behalf of defendants the court gave the following instruction :

To enable the plaintiffs to recover against the defendants in this action, the plaintiffs must show, by evidence to the jury, that the said plaintiffs, at the time of the taking, were rightfully in possession or entitled to the possession of the property alleged to have been taken as against the defendants.

And the said defendants also moved the court to give the jury the following instructions :

Unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that defendant, Moritz Deitsch, was present, in some way aiding, counseling and abetting the taking of the goods in question, they will find defendant, Moritz Deitsch, not guilty.

The jury are instructed by the court, that, to enable plaintiffs to recover in this action, plaintiffs must, at the time of such taking, have had rightful possession of the premises in question.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Moritz Deitsch was present at the time of the alleged taking of the goods in question, but that he neither counseled nor took any part in said taking, they will find defendant, Moritz Deitsch, not guilty.

But the court refused to give said instructions, and defendants excepted.

Messrs. ROYLE & BUTLER, for appellant.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellees.

BELFORD, J. This was an action of trespass, de bonis asportatis, commenced by appellees against William Z. Cozens and Moritz Deitsch, Isidor Deitsch and Jonas Deitsch in the district court of Gilpin county, in which the appellees recovered a judgment against said William Z. Cozens and Moritz Deitsch for the sum of $2,315.90, and from this judgment Deitsch appeals. The declaration alleged that the defendants took and carried away certain goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, on the 4th day of May, 1867, of the value of $2,315.90.

The defendants jointly plead the general issue, and also a special plea alleging that the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned were the goods and chattels of O. S. Buell & Co., on the said 4th day of May, 1867, and that, on the 3d day of May, 1867, a writ of attachment was issued out of the district court of Gilpin county in favor of the firm of Deitsch & Bro., directed to the sheriff of said Gilpin county, commanding him to attach so much of the estate, real and personal, of the said O. S. Buell & Co., as should be of sufficient value to satisfy the sum of $1,478.90, and costs; that, on the said 3d day of May, 1867, the said William Z. Cozens was sheriff of Gilpin county; that, on said day, the writ of attachment was delivered to said Cozens to execute, and that, on the 4th day of May, 1867, he levied upon the goods and chattels mentioned in the declaration as the property of the said O. S. Buell & Co., by virtue of said writ of attachment, which were the supposed trespasses complained of. Appellees filed several replications, denying that the goods and chattels mentioned were the property of O. S. Buell & Co., on the 4th day of May, 1867; also denying that the writ was issued as alleged in said plea, and that Cozens levied upon said goods under and by virtue of such writ, and that Cozens was sheriff of Gilpin county. The above is a brief and, we believe, a correct abstract of the pleadings. During the progress of the trial, the defendants offered in evidence a certain affidavit, bond and writ of attachment, and sheriff's return indorsed thereon, in case of Moritz Deitsch, Jonas Deitsch and Isidor Deitsch, against said Oliver S. Buell & Co., then pending in said court, and being the writ of attachment under which the defendants sought to justify. To the introduction of this evidence the plaintiffs objected. The objection was sustained and the defendants excepted. The action of the court in excluding this evidence is the principal matter complained of.

It is urged by the appellant that the appellee, having joined issue on the special plea, was by the joinder precluded from objecting to the introduction of evidence under it; that the filing of the replication cured whatever defects existed in the special plea. Under the ruling of the court below three questions present themselves. First, was the special plea defective in substance? Second, did the appellee, by pleading over, waive any substantial defects that existed in the special plea? Third, the plea being defective, could the appellees object to the introduction of evidence under it? It must be admitted, at least it will so appear after a careful examination, that there is no allegation in the special plea that O. S. Buell & Co. were, at the time of the alleged trespass, indebted to Deitsch & Bro. Giving the plea the most liberal construction, it simply avers that on the 3d day of May, 1867, a writ of attachment was issued out of the district court of Gilpin county, at the suit of Moritz Deitsch, in favor of said Moritz Deitsch, Isidor Deitsch and Jonas Deitsch, partners doing business under the firm name of Deitsch & Bro., and which said writ commanded the sheriff to attach as much of the estate, real and personal, of Oliver S. Buell & Co., as should be of the value sufficient to satisfy the sum of $1,478. It might be inferred that this sum of money was due from Buell & Co. to Deitsch & Bro., but it is not so averred. The omission to aver an indebtedness we regard as a substantial and fatal defect. When a creditor, sued in trespass by a vendee of goods, contests the plaintiff's title on the ground of fraud, if he justifies under a writ of attachment against the vendor he must show a debt against him, or a judgment if he justifies under an execution. Damon v. Bryant, 2 Pickering, 411, and authorities cited; Noble v. Holmes, 3 Hill, 194. There was no allegation of an existing debt in the plea, nor was there any offer made to prove one on the trial. The plea is bad for another reason. It does not show that an affidavit was filed before the writ was issued, nor does it show the return of the writ. Davis v. Bush, 4 Blackford, 330. But there is still another objection which we regard as fatal, and one that applies equally to Cozens & Deitsch. They both joined in the special plea. In the case of Moors v. Parker et al., 3 Mass. 310, it is held, that when several defendants join in pleading in bar, if the plea is bad as to one defendant it is bad as to them all. The rule on which it is founded is correctly laid down in 1 Saund. 28, n. 2. "If two or more in pleading join in a defense which is sufficient for one but not for others, the plea is bad as to all—for the court cannot sever it, and say that one is guilty and the others not, when they all put themselves upon the same terms." This is upon the principle that a plea is entire and not divisible, and, therefore, if bad in part is bad in whole.

In the case of Bradley v. Powers, 7 Cow. 330, it is held, that when two plead a justification jointly or a plea involving a justification which fails as to one, the plea, being entire, fails as to both. To the same effect is Middleton v. Price, 11 Strange, 1184, and see Merrill v. Forbes, 5 Wend. 238. Were it deemed necessary, authorities on this point might be greatly multiplied. The plea being thus substantially defective, was it cured by pleading over? We think not. A judgment entered on the plea could have been arrested. While all merely formal defects in a pleading are aided and cured by pleading over, except on special demurrer, assigning this for cause, yet such defects as would be fatal on general demurrer are not aided or cured by pleading over. Gould on Pleading, § 11, p. 496. While a plea that states a fact, but states it defectively, would be cured by pleading over, still the authorities nowhere hold, that an omission to state a substantial and material fact will be cured by pleading over, unless the party replying to the plea affected by the omission supplies the omitted fact by setting it up in his own plea. If one party expressly avers a material fact, before omitted on the other side, the omission is cured. For the defect in the pleading of the one party is thus supplied by the other; and it may thus appear from the pleadings on both sides taken together, that he, on whose part the omission occurs, is entitled to judgment, although his own pleading, taken by itself, be insufficient. Thus, when in trespass the plaintiff complained of the defendant for taking a certain iron hook without alleging possession in himself (which in that action is material), the defendant's plea, in which he confessed and justified the taking of the hook from the plaintiff's hand, was held to aid the declaration, inasmuch as it expressly acknowledged the plaintiff's possession. Gould on Pleading, § 192, p. 166.

The special plea being defective, could the plaintiff below object to the introduction of evidence under it?

It is claimed by the appellant that the plaintiff below, having failed to demur, and having joined issue on this plea, was estopped from objecting to the introduction in evidence of matters alleged in it. If the plea was substantially defective, and so we adjudge it to be, and was not cured by pleading over, then it was no defense to the action, and being no defense to the action, it was entirely competent for the court to disregard it and exclude the evidence sought to be introduced under it. Kemp v. Moundel, 9 Leigh, 12. The mere fact that a party joins issue on a plea fatally defective does not and cannot impose upon a court the duty of hearing and admitting evidence under it, when it becomes apparent that no judgment could be sustained if rendered on such plea. Having said this much on the subject of the special plea, it is proper to inquire, whether, under the general issue, it was competent for the defendants to introduce in evidence the writ of attachment with the affidavit annexed. In the case of Rosenburg v. Angel, 6 Mich. 509, it is said: "In trespass de bonis, the defense that the goods were taken under attachment against a third person, alleged to be the owner, is not admissible under the general issue."

The same rule is laid down in Chitty's Pl., vol. 1, p. 500, 502. In an action for trespass for injuries to real or personal property, the plea of not guilty puts in issue the trespass alleged in the place mentioned, and operates as a denial of the plaintiff's possession or right of possession. The substance of the declaration is, that the defendant has forcibly and wrongfully injured property in the possession of the plaintiff, and under the general issue the plaintiff must prove, first, that the property was in his possession at the time of the injury, and this rightfully as against the defendant. Second, that the injury was committed by the defendant with force. Under the general issue the defendant may give in evidence any facts tending to disprove either of the propositions which we have seen the plaintiff is obliged to make out to maintain his action. Every defense which admits the defendant to have been prima facie a trespasser must be pleaded specially, but any matters which go to show that he never did the act complained of may be given in evidence under the general issue. Puterbaugh's Pr. 464. In the extended examination given this subject, we have found but two cases where proof tending to justify a trespass has been allowed to be introduced under the general issue. The first is the case of

Anthony v. Gilbert, 4 Blackf. 348, in which the supreme court of Indiana held, that "the defendant may show, in mitigation of damages, under the general issue, that the goods at the time of taking belonged to a third person, and that the plaintiff was not liable for them to the owner."

In the case of Squire v. Hallenbeck, 9 Pick. 551, it is held that "in trespass de bonis asportatis the defendant may prove, in mitigation of damages, that the goods did not belong to the plaintiff, and that they came to the use of the owner, although in taking them the defendant acted without authority." But the ruling in each of these cases is made to rest on special grounds. In New York, by statutory provision, the plea of not guilty is equivalent to a plea of justification. Merrill v. Forbes, 5 Wend. 239. It is further claimed by the appellant that the court erred in refusing to allow the defendants below to introduce proof of Sherman's want of authority to sell the goods to Hart, Wiggins & Co. It must be borne in mind, that Deitsch's interference with the property in controversy could only be justified on the ground that he was a creditor; that he had a valid subsisting debt against O. S. Buell & Co., and that, as such creditor, he was assailing the title of Hart, Wiggins & Co. These matters could only be introduced under a special plea, and we have already held that the special plea was fatally defective and no proof could be admitted under it. It is therefore not necessary for us to discuss or decide whether the sale made by Sherman to plaintiffs below was a valid sale, or whether it could or ought to be upheld against existing creditors of Buell. It is further urged by the appellant that the court below erred in the instructions given the jury on the subject of damages. We have carefully considered this point and find no error. In the case of Anthony v. Gilbert, supra, it is said: "We know of no standard by which damages in action of trespass can at all times be measured. The nature of the injury complained of renders it impracticable to establish such a rule. the first inquiry should be the amount of injury actually sustained, which, together with interest, is a good general measure of damages in the absence of circumstances of aggravation. But to limit the investigation to the pecuniary loss of a plaintiff would frequently do him injustice, and always to extend it beyond such loss would as often be unjust to the defendant." If, however, we confine the measure of damages to the value of the property when taken, we see no injury sustained by the defendant for the reason that the damages assessed by the jury did not exceed in amount the value of the goods as fixed by the evidence.

We have carefully considered the other objections urged, and find no reasons why the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

FARNUM v. UNITED STATES.

AMENDMENT of caption of indictment. If in the caption of an indictment the court is misdescribed, it may be amended on motion of the district attorney.

INDICTMENT for secreting or embezzling letters—description of letters. In an indictment against a mail carrier, for secreting or embezzling letters deposited in the mail, and intrusted to him to be carried, it is not necessary to describe the letters by stating to whom they were addressed, and by whom they were written.

CONSTRUCTION of section 13, act of 1864—what is an offense by mail carrier.

A mail carrier who secretes, embezzles or destroys a letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters intrusted to him to be carried, offends against the first clause of section 12 of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. at Large, 336), and if the letter, packet, bag or mail of letters contain any article of value, he offends against the last clause of that section.

INDICTMENT under section 12, act of 1864—what it must contain. In order to convict under the last clause of that section, it must be alleged in the indictment that the letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters contained an article of value.

EVIDENCE—under same section. And the evidence must support the allegation at the trial.

PRACTICE—where the conviction was proper, but the law was misapplied.

Where the law of the case was misconceived in the court below and the judgment is erroneous, a new trial will be granted, although the evidence was sufficient to warrant a conviction upon two counts in the indictment.

Error to District Court, First Judicial District.

THE indictment was entitled, "The district court of the United States of America, within and for the first judicial district of Colorado territory, of the term of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy. At a regular term of the district court of the United States of America, within and for the first judicial district of Colorado territory, begun and held at Denver City, on the fourteenth day of June," etc., etc.

The defendant below moved to quash the indictment, upon the ground that it was entitled of a court not known to the law. He also objected, that there was no offense charged. The district attorney filed a cross-motion to amend the caption of the indictment by striking out the words "of the United States of America," so as to make the same read "the district court within and for the first judicial district."

Defendant's motion was overruled, and the cross-motion allowed. The evidence and the indictment are sufficiently set forth in the opinion. The jury found the defendant guilty.

MESSRS. BROWN, HARRISON & PUTNAM, for plaintiff in error.

MR. L. C. ROCKWELL, U. S. District Attorney, for defendant in error.

BELFORD, J. The defendant was indicted at the July term, 1869, of the Arapahoe district court, for secreting and embezzling one package of letters and two sacks of gold dust, with which he had been intrusted, as mail carrier, and which were intended to be conveyed by post. There are seven counts in the indictment, all charging the same offense, but in the first, sixth and seventh counts, the defendant is charged as a carrier of the mail on the route from Fairplay to Helena, and as being then and there a person employed in a department of the post-office establishment of the United States. The defendant moved to quash the indictment for error in the caption, whereupon the attorney-general filed a cross motion and asked leave to amend the caption, which leave was granted, and the motion to quash overruled. The defendant then entered a plea of not guilty, and was put upon his trial. The jury found him guilty on the first, third, sixth and seventh counts, and not guilty on the second, fourth and fifth counts. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled.

The first error assigned is the overruling of the motion to quash and permitting the attorney-general to amend the caption of the indictment. It is claimed by the plaintiff in error, that the caption is a part of the indictment, and cannot be amended. In this view we are unable to concur. Bishop in his work on Criminal Procedure, vol. 1, sec. 151, says: "In matter of legal principle, this extended commencement or caption is no part of the indictment, as sworn to by the grand jury; it is a mere formal statement, which, though placed at the head of the indictment, is still of no higher nature than is an entry on the docket, made in court by the clerk—a thing, which, if erroneous, is subject like a docket entry to be corrected by an order of the judge, or, when it becomes transferred into the permanent records, to be amended to the same extent as any other part of those records. And it is believed, that though the decided cases may not be very distinct to this effect, and though some of them may even seem to come short, this doctrine is, on the whole, sustained by adjudged law."

In Archibald's Criminal Practice, vol. 1, page 260, it is said: "But, though the caption, like the indictment itself, may, if defective, be either quashed by the court or demurred to on the part of the defendant, it differs materially from it in its capacity of amendment, for the return to the court is merely a ministerial act and ministerial acts may be amended at any time according to the common law."

In the case of the United States v. Thompson, 6 McLean, 57, the same objection urged to this indictment, namely, "that the court is not properly entitled," was passed upon, and Judge WILKINS says: "We consider that this objection has been long settled, both in England and in this country." The caption forms no part of the indictment or presentment of the grand jury, and he adds: "It is only matter of astonishment, that such a technical exception should now be gravely urged in court." Moody v. The State, 7 Blackf. 424; The State v. Gilbert, 13 Vt. 647.

Before proceeding to examine the action of the court in overruling the motion for new trial, and in arrest of judgment, it may be proper to allude to some objections made to the form of the indictment. It is claimed by the plaintiff in error, that the indictment is bad, because it fails to describe the letters which it is alleged the defendant secreted and embezzled. In the case of the United States v. Lancaster, 2 McLean, 438, the court say: "Is it essential that the letter charged to have been embezzled should be described by stating to whom it was directed, and by whom it was written? This description is generally given when it is procurable. But it is seldom in the power of the prosecuting attorney to state these facts, much less to prove them. A post-master or carrier, after having stolen a letter from the mail, will not be likely to preserve it as the evidence of his guilt. When the act is done deliberately, as may be presumed to be the case, generally, when done by a post-master there is not one instance in a thousand perhaps, when the letter is not destroyed. And, if a particular description of it be essential to the validity of the indictment, a conviction under this or any other similar provisions of the act would be hopeless. The security of individuals does not seem to demand this particular description of the letter, and to require it would, in most instances, defeat the great purposes of justice."

It is further claimed by the plaintiff in error that the evidence shows that the route over which Farnum carried the mail is different than that described in the indictment. We do not think so. The indictment would be good if the description of the route had been entirely omitted. It has been held, that whatever is not necessary to constitute the offense may be treated as surplusage. This is particularly the case when the offense is statutory, and in such a case it is always sufficient to charge the offense in the words of the statute, although more particularity is required in bringing the offense within it. Whenever, as in this case, more words are used than are necessary to make out the offense, I think the remaining may be rejected as surplusage. Crichton v. The People, 6 Parker's Crim. Rep. 370. If reference is had to the evidence of Taber, it will be seen that a description of the route, as laid in the indictment, was proven.

In the case of the United States v. Paterson, 6 McLean, 466, it was held that a general averment that the party was employed in the post-office establishment of the United States is sufficient.

Did the court err in overruling the motion for a new trial? Inasmuch as the defendant was acquitted on the second, fourth and fifth counts, it will not be necessary to advert to them in this opinion. In the first count it is charged that Henry P. Farnum, being a person then and there employed in a department of the post-office establishment as mail carrier, etc., did embezzle and destroy two packages of letters and two packages of gold dust and two sacks of gold dust, with which he was then and there intrusted, and which packages of letters and packages of gold dust had then and there come to his possession, and was then and there intended to be conveyed by post, etc. The third count charges that the defendant did feloniously take the mail of the United States of America, and two certain packages of letters, and two certain sacks of gold dust, and packets therefrom, and did open, embezzle and destroy such mail, packages, letters, sacks of gold dust and packets; the said two packages of letters and packet containing articles of value, and the said two sacks of gold dust being of the aggregate value of $1,200. In this count it is not alleged that he is an employee of the post-office establishment. The sixth count charges that the defendant, being employed in a department of the post-office establishment.

did embezzle and destroy a letter and two sacks of gold dust with which he was then and there intrusted, and which had then and there come into his possession, and were then and there intended to be conveyed by post, etc. The seventh count charges that the defendant, being a person employed in a department of the post-office establishment, did, with force and arms, secrete and embezzle two sacks of gold dust of the value, etc., with which he had been intrusted, and which was intended to be conveyed by post, etc. The evidence in the case was substantially as follows: Horace A. W. Tabor testifies that, on the 21st day of June, 1869, the day named in the indictment, he was postmaster at Oro city, Lake county, Colorado; that, on the morning of that day, he put the mail up and put in the mail sack two bags of gold dust; they were tied with a string, and to them a tab was attached, on which were the directions; an envelope was wrapped around them. When Farnum reached the post-office at Granite, and the mail sack was opened, a package of letters and the sacks of gold dust were missing. It further appears that there was a rent in the mail bag. Search was instituted for the missing letters and gold dust, and, at a point between Oro and Granite, and some distance from the trail usually pursued by Farnum in carrying the mail, a package of letters was found, which Tabor swears was mailed by him on the twenty-first.

The defendant was thereupon arrested, and a few days subsequently search was made for the missing gold dust on Farnum's premises, and discovered in a tin can under a corn chest in Farnum's stable. There was evidence also going to show that Farnum had previously stated, that, unless he was paid for the labor he had performed in transporting the mail, "a mail bag would turn up missing some day." It nowhere appears that the letters, which it is alleged Farnum secreted and embezzled, contained any article of value. To the introduction of evidence in reference to the bags of gold dust, the defendant below objected, on the ground that the same was not mailable matter. This objection was overruled, and this ruling is assigned for error. The statute on which the first, sixth and seventh counts of this indictment are based will be found in the thirteenth volume of the United States Statutes at large, page 337, section 12, which reads as follows: "That if any person employed in any department of the post-office establishment shall unlawfully detain, delay or open any letter, packet, bag or mail of letters with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post; or if any such person shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter or packet intrusted to such person as aforesaid, and which shall not contain any security for, or assurance relating to, money as hereinafter described, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $300, or imprisoned not less than six months, or both. And if any person employed as aforesaid shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter, packet, bag or mail of letters with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall come to his or her possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note, * * * or any other article of value, such person shall, on conviction, be imprisoned not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years."

It will be observed that this section defines different offenses, and prescribes different punishment. The secretion, embezzling or destroying of a letter containing no article of value is defined to be one offense, and the punishment adjudged is fine not less than $300, and imprisonment not less than six months.

The secreting, embezzling or destroying a letter containing any article of value is another offense, and a different punishment is prescribed.

It must be further observed that this section applies to persons employed in the departments of the post-office and to none others.

In neither of the counts in the indictment, in which the defendant is designated as a person employed in the departments of the post-office, and on which he has been adjudged guilty, is it alleged that the letters secreted and embezzled contained any article of value, nor is it charged that the gold dust was contained in any letter or packet of letters, or bag or mail of letters. Before a jury can find a person guilty under the latter portion of this section, which adjudges a ten years' term of imprisonment, they must find that he secreted, embezzled or destroyed a letter or packet of letters, or bag or mail of letters containing some articles of value. It must be so charged in the indictment, and so established in the evidence. After a careful examination of this provision we have reached the conclusion that the secreting and embezzling of the gold dust by the defendant is not an offense against the law under consideration, for the reason that it nowhere appears that the gold dust was contained in a letter or packet of letters, and for the further reason that it is not charged in any of the counts of the indictment that the defendant secreted, embezzled or destroyed any bag or mail of letters containing the gold dust.

If the defendant is liable to conviction and punishment at all, it must be under that provision of the section which declares that, if any person employed in any of the departments of the post-office establishment shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter or packet intrusted to such person as aforesaid, and which shall not contain any article of value, such person shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $300, or imprisoned not less than six months.

The cause seems to have been tried entirely upon the hypothesis that the defendant was answerable, as charged in the indictment, for the embezzling of the gold dust. On this theory the instructions were based and given, and on this theory the jury acted in making up their verdict, and the court in assessing the punishment.

The third count of the indictment, and on which he was adjudged guilty, charges him with secreting and embezzling a letter containing an article of value, but it does not charge that he was employed in any department of the post-office establishment. This count is based on the eighty-first section of the act defining crimes. 1 Brightley's Digest, 217. The conviction on this count cannot be supported. There is not a shred of testimony tending to show that the letters secreted and embezzled contained any article of value. The seventh count cannot be sustained, for the reason that it refers exclusively to secreting and embezzling the gold dust, and does not allege that it was contained in any letter, packet of letters, bag or mail of letters.

We have, then, the first and sixth counts left, with the defendant charged in each with secreting and embezzling a packet of letters containing no article of value.

If the defendant, under the evidence, could have been convicted at all, it must have been under these counts and for the offense of secreting letters containing no article of value, and for this crime he could only be punished by the imposition of a fine not less than $300, or imprisonment not less than six months, or both. The judgment of the court, in sentencing him to ten years' imprisonment, is not warranted by the law. Inasmuch as this case has been tried under a misconception of the law, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the same remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

PAUL v. LUTTRELL.

REPLEVIN will not lie for taking without detention. Under the statute the action of replevin, whether in the cepit or detinet lies, as at common law, only for the recovery of goods in specie, and a mere unlawful taking not followed by detention will not suffice to maintain it.

PLEADING IN REPLEVIN—detention of property may be put in issue. The detention of the goods is a material fact, necessary in either form of action to maintain the plaintiff's case, and may always be put in issue, either by the plea of non detinet, or, perhaps by the plea of non cepit, where the plaintiff declares in the cepit or by special plea.

EVIDENCE OF DETENTION in replevin—what shall be. Upon such issue the plaintiff may maintain the affirmative, by proof of the taking, or by proof of demand and refusal before action brought, or by proof of other circumstances warranting the inference that a demand would have been unavailing. Upon such issue the defendant may maintain the negative by showing that, before suit brought, he restored the goods to the plaintiff's possession, or that the goods were, before action brought, destroyed by the act of God, or possibly by his own act.

PLEADING—a fact in issue shall not be regarded as admitted by previous pleading. Where any particular fact is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other, no previous admission in the pleadings can be taken as evidence of the existence or non-existence of that fact.

PLEADING IN REPLEVIN. Non detinet is good. Therefore if, to a declaration in the cepi, the defendant plead non detinet, this shall not be regarded as an admission of the taking alleged in the declaration in such sense as to relieve the plaintiff from making proof of the detention.

NEW TRIAL—evidence insufficient in replevin. In replevin in the cepi and issue joined upon plea of non detinet, if there is no proof of the taking or of demand and refusal, or of equivalent circumstances to show detention, the evidence is not sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, and a new trial should be awarded.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

At the trial the evidence was, in substance, as follows :

John D. Parmelee testified that the property in controversy was a small portable engine, with saw-mill attached, circular saw, lath saw and belting ; in the fall of 1867 it was in possession of Hendry ; in September it passed into the hands of plaintiff ; in January, 1868, it was sold by the sheriff, and passed into defendant's hands ; plaintiff bought the saw which was there in January, 1868 ; there was a saw carriage, made partly by Hendry and completed by plaintiff ; plaintiff set up the mill the second time ; it was done in January, 1868 ; there was some belting bought by plaintiff, also a new truck ; I hired the property from plaintiff in December, 1867, for six months ; was to pay $150 per month.

James S. Danford testified that the mill was in plaintiff's possession in September, 1867 ; that the property was worth $1,000 in January, 1868.

The plaintiff introduced a letter from Paul, the defendant below, to the witness Parmelee, in which the latter was notified by Paul that he had purchased the property at the sheriff's sale ; that the property had been sold under an execution, issued out of the probate court of Park county, in favor of Alex. Ray & Co. and against the Union Mill Company, and that he should not pay rent for the mill.

The defendant offered a certified copy of an alias execution, issued out of the probate court of Park county, with the officer's return thereon, against the property of the Union Mill Company and in favor of Alexander Ray and William Shellinger, also a transcript of the judgment in the same cause, which is authenticated by the clerk's certificate in the following form: "I certify that the preceding is a true copy of the docket of an original record of judgment remaining on the files of this office."

The defendant also offered the original execution and the officer's return thereon in the same cause; the defendant also offered an appeal bond in the same cause, all of which were, upon plaintiff's objection, excluded by the court. The defendant also offered to prove, by the sheriff of Jefferson county, that he sold the property under the execution before offered in evidence, but the court refused to receive the testimony.

Mr. J. MARSHALL PAUL, pro se.

Mr. S. E. BROWN, for appellee.

WELLS, J. The defendant in error brought replevin against plaintiff in error, and declared in the cepit; defendant in the court below pleaded non detinet and property in himself; issue was joined upon these pleas, and the cause was submitted to a jury, who found for the plaintiff below upon both issues. Upon the trial, the evidence offered by the defendant in support of his plea of property was excluded, and we think properly; there was also evidence of a possession by the plaintiff of the goods in controversy at some time prior to the bringing of his action; the finding of the jury upon the second issue is therefore supported by the evidence.

But we think there is no evidence to support the finding upon the plea of non detinet.

All of the evidence which can, in any way, be applied to this issue is entirely consistent with the supposition, that the defendant derived possession of the goods in controversy (if indeed he ever had possession of them) by a delivery; there was no evidence given of a taking by the defendant, or of a demand and refusal to surrender them, or of equivalent circumstances.

The question is, therefore, presented, whether in this form of action the plea of non detinet presents a material issue.

In this territory replevin lies "whenever any goods or chattels have been wrongfully distrained or otherwise wrongfully taken, or shall be wrongfully detained." According therefore as the plaintiff declares in the cepit or in the detinet, either the taking or the detention is the gist of the action; but we think that the plaintiff must establish a detention in either case, if put in issue, for the words of the statute above quoted are manifestly qualified by other words which follow in the same section, whereby it is provided that, in the cases before therein specified, "an action of replevin may be brought for the recovery of such goods and chattels." That is to say, the action of replevin in either form lies, as at common law, only for the recovery of goods in specie; and a mere unlawful taking, not followed by a detention, will not suffice to maintain it. It follows, therefore, that the detention of the goods is a material fact necessary in either form of the action to maintain the plaintiff's case, and may always be put in issue, either by the plea of non detinet, or perhaps by the plea of non cepit, where the plaintiff declares in the cepit, per ROGERS, J., in MacKinley v. McGregor, 3 Whart. 398, or we think by special plea, and when so put in issue the plaintiff may maintain the affirmative by a mere proof of the taking, from which the law presumes that the goods continue in the defendant's possession, and that the defendant remains of the purpose in which he committed the wrong, and intends to retain them, or by proof of demand and refusal before action brought, or by proof of other circumstances warranting the inference that a demand would have been unavailing. Johnson v. Howe, 2 Gilm. 342.

The defendant, on the other hand, may maintain the negative of the issue by showing, if he can, that, before suit brought, he restored the goods to the plaintiff's possession, or that the goods were before action brought destroyed by the act of God, or possibly by his own act, for it cannot well be said that one unlawfully detains that which is not in being.

It is argued, however, that, by his failure to traverse the taking, the defendant has admitted the allegations of the declaration in this regard, and that from this admission a detention may as properly be inferred as if the taking had been affirmatively proven upon the trial.

But we cannot subscribe to this conclusion. It is every day practice that a defendant pleads two pleas, one admitting material facts denied by the other: e. g., in assumpsit, the general issue and payment, or accord and satisfaction; in trespass, not guilty and a justification, and the like in other cases; yet it never was thought that, in such case, the latter plea might be read to the jury to establish the affirmative of the issue under the former, or could operate against the defendant in any way. If this were so, manifestly the affirmative would in such cases rest wholly with the defendant, and he, it might well be said, would be entitled to begin and conclude to the jury, which was never seen.

The approved doctrine is, that, "where any particular fact is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other, no previous admission in the pleadings can be taken as evidence of the existence or non-existence of that fact." 1 Phill. Ev. (5th Am. ed.) 796; *ALDERSON, B., in Edmunds v. Gores, 2 Mees. & Wels. 642; CRESSWELL, J., in Fearn v. Filica, 7 M. & G. 513; Kirk v. Newell, 1 Term R. 125; Harrington v. McNaughton, 5 Taunt. 232; Whittaker v. Freeman, 1 Dev. 271.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the admission of the taking cannot be received to supplement the defect in the plaintiff's proofs upon the issue under the first plea, and because there is no evidence to support the finding upon this issue the judgment of the district court must be reversed with costs in this court and this cause remanded, with directions to that court to award a new trial.

ROACH v. BINDER.

REPLEVIN in detinet—demand and refusal. In replevin against one who has acquired the property replevied in good faith, it is necessary to prove a demand before suit brought or something equivalent to it.

EVIDENCE—acts and declarations of plaintiff not admissible in his favor. An instruction to the jury that a demand may be inferred from the actions, conduct and conversation of the parties is erroneous.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for appellant.

Messrs. MILLER & MARKHAM, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. Replevin before a justice of the peace, to recover a cow and calf, thence removed to the district court by appeal. The calf was not found, and appellee took judgment for the cow. It seems that the animal strayed from appellee's herd, and subsequently appellant purchased her from one Rooney who had possession of her, and who in turn had purchased her from some other person. As appellant acquired the animal in good faith by purchase from one in possession, we do not understand that he can be made liable in replevin, unless upon demand before suit or something equivalent to it. Ingalls v. Bulkly, 13 Ill. 315; Clark v. Lewis, 85 id. 423, is not opposed to this view. In that case the purchase was made at a sale under a town ordinance, and the purchaser was affected with notice of the illegality of the proceeding.

The district court instructed the jury that a demand was necessary, and added: "The jury may infer a demand of the property from the actions, conduct and conversation of the parties.”

In so far as this comprehends the actions, conduct and conversation of the appellee, who was plaintiff below, which did not occur in the presence of appellant, it is of course erroneous. We regret that the evidence of demand and refusal is not clear enough to authorize us to overlook this error, but, as the jury may have been misled by the instruction, the judgment of the district court must be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded.

DEITZ v. CITY OF CENTRAL.

LEGISLATIVE POWER — to create a city. Under the organic act the legislative assembly has power to establish a municipal corporation.

LEGISLATIVE POWER — to change the official title of a justice of the peace. The legislative assembly has no power to confer upon a justice of the peace a denomination not warranted by the organic act, and, in so far as the charter of the City of Central confers upon the justice of the peace exercising jurisdiction under the ordinances thereof, the name of police magistrate, it is void.

JURISDICTION of justice of the peace under ordinances of city. But, notwithstanding the attempt of the legislative assembly to confer a wrong name upon him, the justice of the peace has jurisdiction of cases arising under the ordinances of the city.

ORDINANCES of city — when reasonable. Where authority was conferred upon a corporation to suppress and prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks, as well as to license the same, an ordinance which imposes a penalty for selling such drinks without license, which penalty exceeds that fixed by the general law of the territory, is reasonable.

INTEREST OF MAGISTRATE in result of suit — what will disqualify. Where a citizen of a municipality is elected a justice of the peace, according to the charter, that he is, in virtue of his citizenship, entitled to share in the penalties adjudged against the accused, is no objection to his competency. In such case the provisions of the charter amount to an express declaration that interest shall not disqualify.

WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS — on appeal from justice of the peace. Section 46, chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes, 407, relating to proceedings in district court on appeal from justice of the peace, is applicable to cases arising under the ordinances of the city of Central.

Objection that summons was returnable on the day it was issued, cannot be made in district court.

Nor that the justice of the peace assumed a title not warranted by law.

Nor that the plaintiff's demand was not indorsed on the summons.

PRACTICE in actions to recover penalty under city ordinances. Where the charter of a city provides that to recover a penalty, fine or forfeiture, prescribed by ordinance, it shall be sufficient to declare generally, in debt, it is not necessary to file a written declaration in the common-law form.

PRACTICE — when to make objections. Objections to the competency of witnesses must be made at the trial.

PLEADING AND PROOF — as to time. In an action to recover a penalty for selling intoxicating liquor without license, evidence may be introduced of sales made anterior to the earliest day named in the complaint.

EVIDENCE of refusal of city officers to issue license. In such action the defendant cannot show that the city clerk improperly refused to issue a license to him.

VERDICT — in an action of debt to recover a penalty. In such action a verdict of guilty is substantially responsive to the issue.

JUDGMENT — when defendant may be imprisoned. Where the charter provides that if the defendant has no property whereof the judgment can be collected, the defendant may be committed to jail, it is error to enter judgment that the defendant stand committed until the fine and costs are paid. In such case execution should be awarded, and if no property can be found the defendant may be committed to jail.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

ACTION of debt upon an ordinance of the city of Central, which provides that if any person shall sell or give away any intoxicating or fermented liquors without license, in quantities less than one quart, without first obtaining a license therefor, he shall for each offense forfeit and pay to the city a sum of not less than $25, nor more than $50.

This ordinance is based upon section 20 of the charter of the city (3 Sess. 245), which is as follows: "To license, restrain, regulate, prohibit, and suppress tippling houses, gambling houses, bawdy houses, and other disorderly houses, and the selling and giving away of any intoxicating or malt liquors by any person within the city, except by persons duly licensed."

A general law of the territory authorized the county commissioners in each county to license the sale of intoxicating liquors, and imposed a penalty of $20 for the violation of its provisions.

Mr. Justice BELFORD dissented from so much of this opinion as affirms the lawful existence and powers of the person styling himself police judge, before whom these proceedings were instituted.

Mr. I. N. WILCOXEN and Mr. S. B. HAHN, for appellant.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellee.

WELLS, J. The errors assigned in this case question, first, the existence of the corporation which was plaintiff below ; second, the reasonableness and validity of the ordinance under which the conviction was had ; third, the existence and powers of the functionary before whom the process was instituted ; fourth, the regularity of the proceedings.

We have examined the multitude of questions urged in this case, with the careful consideration to which the elaborate diligence of counsel entitles them.

As to the first question : It is solemnly argued that the legislature of this territory have no authority to create municipal corporations, for that congress, not having such power, could not confer it upon the legislature of the territory, which is its mere creature.

But upon what ground of reason can it be said that congress has not such authority ?

Whether it be referred to an express constitutional grant or to necessity arising out of its sovereignty and proprietorship, we think it can scarcely, at this day, be doubted that the authority of congress to govern the territories is absolute and supreme.

It may be that the inhibition against laws prohibiting the free exercise of religion, or abridging the freedom of the press, against the taking of private property without compensation, and the other express restraints imposed by the constitution, extend as has been contended, proprio vigore, to the territories, but beyond these, the power of congress to govern in the territories by such means and agencies as in its wisdom it may select, is indisputable.

They might themselves enact laws operating directly in the territory, or appoint a governor and judges invested with legislative powers, both of which were done in the north-west territory.

Or they might enact, that all authority, whatever, should be invested in such person or persons as the president might appoint; this was done in the case of Florida.

Or they might provide for a legislature to be appointed by the president, as was done, in the first instance, for the Territory of Louisiana.

Or they might, we conceive, organize each community in any or all of the territories into a municipality, with power of local self-government.

The whole of this authority, so far as concerns the local affairs of the citizens, and within the restrictions contained in the organic act, congress has conferred upon the legislative assembly of this territory, subject at all times to a revocation of the grant in its own pleasure, and subject, in its exercise, to a conformity with the constitution and the acts of congress, including the organic act.

Within these restrictions and limitations, and subject to the power of revocation in congress, the legislature of this territory may do whatever congress might do, if assuming to govern by its own enactments.

It is said, that, admitting the power of congress, the legislative authority of the territory rests upon other grounds; and being a mere delegated authority cannot, itself, be the subject of a delegation.

But the authority of every State legislature is also a derivative and delegated authority, and the maxim here relied upon has always, in a proper case, been held to avoid their enactments when in conflict with its principle; nevertheless it may safely be assumed, that in no State of the Union was there ever an express constitutional provision authorizing the erection of municipal corporations, nor probably is there any State in which the legislative authority has not, from the earliest periods, assumed and exercised the power now brought in question. In no case to which we have been referred have the courts denied its existence; and, on the contrary, in numerous cases and by the most respectable courts, it has been expressly affirmed.

And, if we shall now declare, that in this territory the power does not exist, it will be to destroy and prohibit within our borders all these local municipalities and miniature republics, which are the very womb and nursery of our free institutions.

The reasonableness of the ordinance under which appellant was prosecuted is denied, upon the ground that it imposes a penalty greater than that provided by the law of the territory.

But when we consider, that, by the express words of the statute, this corporation is authorized not only to license, but to suppress and prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, which the legislature has not attempted to do, how can it reasonably be said, that the general law is, in any respect, the measure of the powers of the corporation? In no one of the cases relied upon by counsel has this been decided.

In Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick, 121, the by-law was held void because not warranted by the charter, while the amount of the penalty did not come in question.

In Mayor of New York v. Nichols, 4 Hill, 209, the ordinance in question prohibited any sale of hay without having the same inspected and weighed; the court held it to be void as against the provisions of the general statute, which expressly provided that hay pressed and put up in a particular manner might be sold "by any standard weight which shall be agreed upon between the buyer and seller."

In The City of Boston v. Shaw, 1 Metc. 180, the only question was, whether the method prescribed by the ordinance for the apportionment of the expenses of sewerage among property owners was or was not a reasonable one.

In Dunham v. Robertson, 5 Cow. 462, the charter authorized the village to make such prudential by-laws as they may from time to time deem meet * * * relative to taverns, gin shops and hucksters' shops in said village * * * provided, always, that such by-laws be not contrary to, or inconsistent with, the law of this State. The by-law provided that hucksters should be licensed, and that every person keeping a huckster's shop without license should pay a penalty named. The court held the ordinance void, as in restraint of a trade upon which no restriction was apparently necessary.

By-laws, the court say, must accord with the laws of the State and the general principles of law; and by this we understand that the by-law must not countervail any express provision of the statute or the recognized principles of common law; not that necessarily the corporation may not go further in legislating for their own members than the legislation of the State upon like subjects.

If we admit the rule contended for, we practically nullify a very large part of the provisions of this charter. Here is an express authority given to suppress tippling houses and to do many other things that no law of the territory has yet assumed to do, and if the penalty recovered in this case was unauthorized, then, for the same reason, every attempt of the corporation to exercise the numerous special powers contained in the charter relating to subjects, upon which the legislature has not prescribed a rule, must be forever ineffectual.

The cases of City of Pekin v. Smelzel, 21 Ill. 465; City of Burlington v. Keller, 17 Iowa, 369; S. C., 18 id., are directly in point, and, we think, directly against the position assumed by counsel for the appellant.

As to whether there is such an officer as the one before whom this prosecution was instituted, it will be observed that the officer subscribes himself in the process police magistrate. It is said that by the organic act of the territory no such officer is recognized, but that all judicial power is vested in the supreme court, district courts, probate courts and justices of the peace.

By the charter of this corporation it is provided that at the first election there shall be elected, among other officers,

“one justice of the peace, to be denominated police judge for the city of Central, * * * and on the first Monday of April, in every second year, one police judge,” and in another section, that “the police judge shall have jurisdiction in all cases of violation of the city ordinances, and shall have the same jurisdiction in all civil and criminal proceedings as is now, or hereafter shall be, conferred upon other justices of the peace of this territory, and in all courts of this territory, said police magistrate shall be held to be a justice of the peace.”

In other portions of the charter, as well as in the section just quoted, the officer is termed, as will be observed, indiscriminately, a police judge and police magistrate.

The majority of the court think that so much of the charter as confers or authorizes the power to assume a denomination not warranted by the organic act may well be held void; but, in determining whether the office exists or not, we are inclined to the opinion, that we ought to look rather to the substance of the powers conferred upon the incumbent, than to the name by which he is designated; guided by this principle, we have no difficulty in concluding that the officer designated by the charter police justice or police magistrate lawfully possessed the powers which he assumed in this proceeding.

Whether in the exercise of this power he is not required to act as, and assume to be, a justice of the peace, and to disregard the unwarranted title with which the legislature have invested him, is a question which, in the view we take of this case, it is not necessary for us to determine.

It is said, that the police judge, being entitled to participate in the penalties adjudged against the defendant, was interested in the event of the prosecution, and was therefore incompetent to give judgment, or issue process, or entertain the proceeding in any stage. The argument assumes (what is not shown in the record) that the magistrate was a citizen of this municipality, and this we think it is fair to assume, and perhaps the necessary conclusion from the fact of his incumbency in the office; for the charter clearly contem plates that all officials therein provided for should be elected by the qualified voters of the city from among their own number; but if we are correct in this, then the provisions which confer jurisdiction upon the police judge, in causes arising under the charter and ordinances, is equivalent to an express declaration that his interest in the penalties shall not disqualify.

The objections as to the existence and competency of the officer are thereupon overruled.

As to the manner of the proceedings it is objected that the summons was made returnable on the day of its issuance. If in this proceeding the justice was bound to observe the rule prescribed by the general law, upon which we express no opinion, the judgment might for this reason have been set aside upon certiorari brought, or the defendant might have disregarded the judgment and brought his action against the justice if he issued execution thereon.

But, by appealing from the judgment of the justice, he has, we think, waived all irregularities in the process by which he was brought into that court.

The statute declares that no exception shall be taken to the form or service of the summons issued by the justice of the peace, nor to any of the proceedings before him, but the court shall hear and determine the cause in a summary way, without pleadings in writing, and nothing can be clearer, we think, than that the intention of the legislature was to require a trial upon the merits, without objections to any of the proceedings before the justice.

We do not feel called upon to reconcile with this statute what is said by the supreme court of Illinois. County Commissioners, etc. v. Robertson, 5 Gilm. 563; Adams v. Miller, 12 Ill. 27; Walsen v. Nettleton, 19 id. 62.

It is sufficient to say that the construction we have given the statute appears to us the true one, and we are supported by the later cases of Swingley v. Haynes, 22 Ill. 216, and Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company v. McOutchin, 27 id. 9.

It is urged that the provisions of the justices' act were intended to apply only to civil causes, and that this prosecution is a criminal one ; and the case of Edwards v. Vanderwurck, 13 Ill. 633, is referred to ; but we are not prepared to admit that this is not a civil case in such sort that an appeal might not lie even though not allowed by the charter ; and by that section of the charter which allows the appeal, it is expressly declared that appeals "shall be granted in the same manner and with like effect as appeals are taken from and granted by justices of the peace, under the laws of this territory."

This disposes of the objection, that the process was signed with a title which the officer had no right to assume, and that no demand was indorsed thereon ; as to this latter the statute has been held to be directory merely, and a failure to comply with it immaterial. Eaton v. Graham, 11 Ill. 620.

As to the complaint, the charter provides that "it shall be lawful to declare generally in debt for such penalty, fine or forfeiture, stating the clause of this act, or the by-laws or ordinance, etc., and to give the special matter in evidence."

It is argued that under this provision the city attorney should be required to file a declaration, as in the common-law action of debt ; but we think the statement, account or complaint which was filed in this cause, indefinite and informal as it is, must be regarded as a compliance with the intention of the legislature. We cannot believe that the legislature intended to introduce into a court not of record, and in this class of proceedings, which, in many instances, must be summary in their nature or else altogether ineffectual, the subtleties of the common-law action of debt, with the delays incident to it. Having reference to the subject-matter to which this legislation is applied, we think the language may well receive a construction less restricted than in another case we might be compelled to adopt.

As for the objection, that inhabitants of the city were permitted to testify on behalf of the prosecution, it is a sufficient answer to say that no objection to their competency was made upon the trial.

It is further urged that the prosecution upon the trial were permitted to put in evidence of sales by the plaintiff, anterior to the earliest day named in the complaint. The cases from Massachusetts, which were cited in support of this objection, are not in accord with the authorities elsewhere, and we are not satisfied with the reasons upon which that court proceeds.

As for the objection that the absence of the license to the plaintiff was not established, we think that if the burden of proof, as to this, rested in the first instance upon the prosecution, upon which we express no opinion, sufficient was shown to devolve upon the defendant the duty of establishing the fact of his license, if he had one. It was proved that by the ordinance of the city, the city clerk was required to keep a register of all licenses issued by him; that register was produced, and the clerk testified, as we understand him, though his testimony was conflicting, that no license had in fact been issued to the defendant for the period in which the alleged unlawful sales were made. The jury were the proper judges of the effect to be given to the whole testimony, and they have found that the defendant had no license.

On the trial the defendant offered to show that, before the sales charged, he had applied to the mayor for license to sell intoxicating liquors, and that his application was approved; that thereupon he had made application to the clerk of the city to issue the license, and made tender in gold coin of the proper license fee, but that the clerk refused him such license.

This evidence, it is assigned for error, the court below excluded.

We think the ruling of the district court was correct.

If the clerk refused to issue the license where the defendant was entitled to it, the remedy was by mandamus to compel the clerk to perform his duty, or by action on the case for the wrongful refusal.

It cannot be said that this was the act or default of the corporation, for the clerk, if the agent of the corporation in any sense, was so only within the limit of his duty. If he refused to issue the license, where he was bound by law to issue, it was of his own wrong, and the defendant must seek his remedy against him alone.

The verdict seems to us to be substantially responsive to the issue. Although the proceeding is in form of an action of debt, the real question in issue was, whether the defendant had been guilty of a violation of the ordinance, and this issue is certainly settled by the verdict of guilty. The only other finding which, upon any principle, could have been made, is the common-law verdict, in the action of debt, that "the defendant doth owe the said plaintiff the said sum of, etc., above demanded," but it cannot be said that there is any specific debt or sum certain sought or demanded in such prosecution as this: the fine to be imposed, which is the only thing recovered, might be greater or less within certain limits, and in the absence of any regulation by ordinance, it appears to us that the jury could have nothing to do with fixing the amount of this fine.

No such regulation is shown by the record, and we express no opinion as to its effect if it were shown.

The proceedings were, therefore, we think, sufficiently regular in these respects.

But in the entry of the judgment the court clearly erred.

The charter warrants a commitment of the accused in prosecutions of this sort only when he has no real or personal estate which can be taken to satisfy the judgment, and the district court in this case ordered that the defendant stand committed until the payment of the fine and costs, without reference to whether he had property liable to execution or not.

For this error the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the district court to enter judgment upon the verdict, and to award execution thereon to the sheriff of Gilpin county, and to further order that in case estate of the defendant sufficient to satisfy the judgment and costs be not found, execution issue against the body of the defendant, and that thereon the defendant be committed to the common jail of Gilpin county, there to be confined, until at the rate of one day's confinement, for each dollar of the said fine and costs, the judgment be fully satisfied, such imprisonment not to exceed, however, the term of six months.

The judgment is reversed, with costs, in this court. Reversed.

MILLS et ux. v. ANGELA.

MARRIED WOMAN—may defend actions. A married woman is under no disability in respect to the time or manner of making her defense to an action brought against her.

PRACTICE—defense must be interposed at earliest opportunity. An objection which was not made in the court below will not be considered in this court.

DEMURRER TO BILL IN CHANCERY—does not reach defects not apparent in the bill. In a bill against husband and wife to foreclose a mortgage, it was averred that the defendants made, executed, acknowledged and delivered the mortgage to complainant. No copy of the mortgage was attached to the bill. Objections to the sufficiency of the certificate of acknowledgment appended to the mortgage were not raised by demurrer to the bill.

PRACTICE—bill to foreclose need not be put in under oath. A bill to foreclose a mortgage need not be put in under oath. The signature of counsel is a sufficient authentication.

Appeal from District Court, Clear Creek County.

Mr. Justice WELLS, having been of counsel, did not participate in the decision of this cause.

Mr. R. S. MORRISON and Mr. HUGH BUTLER, for appellants.

Mr. H. R. HUNT, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. This was a bill to foreclose a mortgage to which appellants demurred, and the demurrer was overruled. No other defense being made, the bill was taken pro confesso. The argument at the bar was mainly directed to the certificate of acknowledgment attached to the mortgage, which is said to be insufficient as to Emiline, one of the appellants. If, however, it shall appear that this question was not presented in the court below, upon what ground may appellants base their claim to be heard in this court?

Generally a party must seek the earliest opportunity to make his defense, and if he does not do so, the law will presume that he has none. This salutary rule ought not to be disregarded unless the case is exceptional, and we do not see that the coverture of Mrs. Mills makes this one so. A married woman is under no disability in respect to the time or manner of putting in her defense to an action brought against her. In the absence of statutory regulation, the husband must be joined with her as a defendant, but this was doubtless for his protection as well as hers, and did not interfere with her defense. 1 Daniell's Ch. Pr. 140.

But our statute admits a married woman to the courts upon the same terms as if she were sole, and for this reason, if for no other, she cannot claim indulgence on the ground of coverture. She is not like an infant, who is incapable of acting for himself, and is compelled to rely upon a guardian ad litem, who may be careless or unfaithful. The law clothes her with power to manage her own affairs, and she ought to accept the responsibility which attends upon free agency. If the sufficiency of the certificate of acknowledgment was denied in the court below, it must have been by the demurrer, for appellants made no other appearance in that court. The certificate is not in terms referred to in the demurrer, and the defect of which complaint is made does not appear in the bill. It is alleged that "appellants made, executed, acknowledged and delivered to the complainant their mortgage deed of conveyance," and although it is stated that a copy of the mortgage is attached to the bill, no such copy appears in the record. Granting that every matter appearing in the bill was questioned ore tenus upon the argument of the demurrer the certificate of acknowledgment was not reached. That the allegation in the bill of the execution of the instrument was sufficient upon demurrer, see Moore et ux. v. Titman, 33 Ill. 364. In this case, a copy of the mortgage was attached to the bill, and the court examined the certificate of acknowledgment, but they, at the same time, declare that the sufficiency of the acknowledgment could not be questioned after default in answering. In the case at bar there was no exhibit attached to the bill, and therefore no question as to the propriety of examining a copy of a mortgage accompanying a bill upon demurrer to the bill, or otherwise, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proof supports the allegation. In demurring to the bill, appellants admitted the averment of the acknowledgment of the mortgage to be true, and they did not afterward deny that averment. The master's report, which contained the mortgage, passed unchallenged, and appellants have come here in search of relief, for which they should have asked in the court below. Reigard v. McNeil, 38 Ill. 401.

These remarks apply also to the objection respecting appellee's name, concerning which, as well as the certificate of acknowledgment, appellants were wholly indifferent in the district court.

As to the fourth assignment of error, we are not acquainted with any rule which requires a bill for foreclosure to be put in under oath, or signed by the complainant. The signature of counsel appears to furnish sufficient authentication. Story's Eq. Pl., § 47.

The decree of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

CITY OF DENVER v. KENT et al.

TRUST—TOWN SITE—under legislative control. Under the act of congress of May 23, 1844 (5 Stat. at Large, 657), and the amendatory act of May 28, 1864 (13 Stat. at Large, 94), the execution of the trust is under the sole and exclusive direction of the legislative assembly.

TRUST — TOWN SITE — who are beneficiaries. Portions of the town site of Denver, not subject to individual claim, are held by the trustee for the use and benefit of the community at large.*

TRUST — unauthorized sale by trustee. A sale by the trustee of any portion of the town site of Denver, not according to the rules and regulations prescribed by the legislative assembly, is wholly unwarranted and absolutely void.

TRUST — duty of trustee. In the absence of authority to sell any portion of the town site of Denver, it was the duty of the trustee to await the action of the legislative assembly.

STATUTE — repugnant to acts of congress. Section 8 of the act of the assembly of 1866 (5 Sess. 88), by which unclaimed lots were granted to the city of Denver for the use of common schools, is repugnant to the acts of congress relating thereto and therefore void.

TRUST — abuse by trustee — who may bring suit. The city of Denver, in its corporate capacity, may institute and maintain suits to set aside sales of unclaimed lots made by the trustee of the town site of Denver, without authority of law, and may keep watch over the property until the legislature shall authorize the sale thereof.

TRUST — town site — disposition of estate. The legislative assembly has power to direct the sale of unclaimed lots in the city of Denver, and may apply the proceeds of such sales to the erection of public buildings for the use of the city, or for the support of its public schools, or any other general purpose that will conduce to the interests of the community.

BILL IN CHANCERY — multifarious. Several plaintiffs cannot demand by one bill several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected against one defendant, nor can one plaintiff demand several matters of different nature against several defendants.

A bill to set aside and cancel several conveyances alleged to have been fraudulently made to different parties at several times by the trustee of the town site of Denver, is multifarious and cannot be maintained.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE bill was filed by the city of Denver, as trustee for the use of common schools, against Omer O. Kent, probate judge, and a large number of persons, who, it was alleged, had obtained title to lots in the city of Denver. The several acts of congress and of the legislative assembly, relating to the matter of town sites, were referred to in the bill. It was alleged that James Hall was probate judge of the county of Arapahoe when the act of congress of 1864 was passed, and that he entered the lands mentioned in that act with the funds of the city and obtained title to the same ; that the trust was not fully executed by him ; that he was succeeded by Omer O. Kent, who proceeded in the execution of the trust until his term of office expired in September, 1867 ; that Jacob Downing then succeeded to the office and remained in office until the bill was filed in September, 1868 ; that about seven hundred and thirty-five lots have been wrongfully conveyed to persons having no right to the same ; that these lots belonged to the city as trustee for common schools ; that the probate court combined and confederated with the persons to whom such lots had been conveyed, to defraud the city and the common school fund of the proceeds of such lots ; that many persons named as grantees in the conveyances made by the probate judge have no existence, and that such conveyances were made with intent to defraud the city and the common school fund.

Numerous conveyances alleged to have been fraudulently made were described in the bill. It was also alleged that a large number of lots, within the tract of land mentioned in the act of congress, had not been conveyed, and that the city of Denver was entitled to the same for the use and benefit of common schools ; the prayer of the bill was that the several conveyances, made by the probate judge in fraud of the several acts of congress and of the legislative assembly, be declared void, and that the title of the city of Denver be perfected ; that the probate judge be directed to convey to the city all lots so wrongfully disposed of, and all lots to which the city was entitled under the said acts, etc.

The bill was taken as confessed by some of the defendants and other defendants demurred. The district court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the bill.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for appellant.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for appellees.

Mr. Justice WELLS dissented.

BELFORD, J. The bill in this case was filed by the city of Denver, as trustee for the use of the common schools, etc., against Omer O. Kent and others, to set aside and cancel a large number of deeds made by different probate judges to various persons. Separate demurrers were filed, assigning as grounds of demurrer :

First, that the complainant had no right to maintain the suit; and secondly, that the bill was multifarious. The demurrers were sustained, and this action of the court constitutes the error complained of.

The bill alleges that in 1865, James Hall, being probate judge of Arapahoe county, under and by virtue of an act of congress passed the previous year, entered a large tract of land that had been occupied as a town site by the citizens of Denver, and that he held that land in trust for such purposes. It is further alleged that he and his successors in office greatly abused their trust by making deeds of conveyance to numerous parties who were not entitled to receive them, and that, by reason of these fraudulent deeds, the community has been greatly injured. It further appears, that on the 9th day of February, 1866, the territorial legislature passed an act having direct reference to the disposition of certain portions of this land, and in which act it is provided that all lots and parts of lots in the city of Denver then held by Hall in trust by virtue of said act of congress, and to which there was no claimant, and to which no valid claim could be shown, should vest in the city of Denver for the use of the common schools of said city; and that the city of Denver should have the power, by suit, in any court having competent jurisdiction, to secure and perfect the legal title to the same.

The bill prays that these fraudulent conveyances be set aside, and that the title of the city to the lots in controversy be established and quieted. On behalf of the appellees it is insisted that the city of Denver has no title; that the act of the legislature was ultra vires and void, and that the claims of those now exercising ownership over these lots cannot be called in question. A correct decision of this case involves a review of the legislation of congress so far as the same is applicable to the entry of lands for town sites.

At an early period in our national history, it became the fixed policy of the government to aid in the settlement of the public domain. To this end, at various times laws were passed by which settlers upon such lands might, upon showing a compliance with certain prescribed rules, and for a small consideration, acquire the legal title to one hundred and sixty acres. These laws and rules, however, were only for the benefit of such persons as settled upon the public domain for agricultural purposes. In process of time settlements of widely different character were made. In eligible places large numbers of persons congregated, and towns and cities were built up. This kind of settlement was outside of the contemplation of the pre-emption laws, as they then existed, and it soon became a serious question how the title to this land so occupied should be secured. To meet this question congress passed the act of May 23, 1844, which provides :

That whenever any portion of the surveyed public lands has been or shall be settled upon and occupied as a town site, and therefore not subject to entry under the existing pre-emption laws, it shall be lawful, in case such town or place shall be incorporated, for the corporate authorities thereof, and if not incorporated, the judges of the county court of the county in which such town may be situated, to enter at the proper land office, and at the minimum price, the lands so settled and occupied, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests. * * * The execution of which trust, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be provided by the legislative authority of the State or territory in which the same is situated : Provided, that the entry of the land intended by this act be made prior to the commencement of the public sale of the body of land in which it is included, and that the entry shall include only such land as is already occupied by the town, and be made in conformity to the legal subdivision of the public lands authorized by the acts of the 24th of April, 1820. * * *

And provided further, that any act of said trustees, not made in conformity to the rules and regulations herein alluded to, shall be void and of no effect." Under the terms and provisions of this law, the lands embraced in many town sites that had been theretofore settled, and of many towns subsequently settled and occupied, were conveyed to the proper and rightful occupants thereof. In the year 1850, a large number of persons associated together, under the name of the Denver Town Company, and took possession of a portion of the public domain now known as the city of Denver, which they surveyed and laid off into streets, alleys, blocks and lots, and which they commenced to improve as a town, by the erection of dwelling-houses, stores and offices. When the lands on which this city was built became surveyed, and the lots and buildings acquired value, the owners became anxious for a title. The laws of 1844 limited the entry for town purposes to three hundred and twenty acres, and the city of Denver covered more than a thousand; so that there was no law by which a proper title to this land could be made to the men who were the occupants of the same, and the owners of the improvements thereon. To remedy this difficulty congress was applied to, and in response to this application passed the act May 28, 1864, which provides :

"That the provisions of an act of congress entitled 'an act for the relief of the citizens of towns upon the land of the United States, under certain circumstances, approved May 28, 1844,' be so extended as to authorize the probate judge of Arapahoe county, in the territory of Colorado, to enter at the minimum price in trust for the several use and benefit of the rightful occupants of said land and the bona fide owners of the improvements thereon, according to their respective interests, the following subdivisions of land, or such portions thereof as are settled and actually occupied for town purposes by the town of Denver aforesaid, to wit : Section number 33, and the west half of section number 34, in township number 8 south of range number 68, west of the sixth principal meridian. That in all respects, except as herein modified, the execution of the foregoing provisions shall be controlled by the provisions of said act of the 28d of May, 1844, and the rules and regulations of the commissioner of the general land office." From an examination of these two acts it will be observed that the power of the "corporate authorities" mentioned in the law of 1844, and the probate judge in that of 1864, is limited to the act of entry, and when the land is entered the party or parties so entering it become invested with a trust, the execution of which is under the sole and exclusive direction of the local legislature. Until the legislature points out the method and prescribes the rules of procedure, the trustees are wholly incapable of conveying the legal title to the beneficiaries of the trust, or of disposing of the land for any purpose, or to any person. But what is the character of this trust? It will be observed that, while the entry under the act of 1844 is only allowed to cover such land as is actually occupied by the settlers, it must nevertheless be made according to government subdivisions, as the law does not permit them to be broken in upon. Under this rule some land would be found in each subdivision not actually built upon or otherwise occupied for town purposes. What, then, is to be done with this land not occupied or improved? To whom is it to go? Clearly not to general government, for its title has ceased by the issuing of the patent. Not to the territory, for it never had any interest. Not to the trustee, for he is a mere conduit or channel through which the title passes from the government to the cestuis que trust. Not to the individual citizen, for the act of congress defines the extent of his individual interest. The trust is manifestly a double one. The first, a trust for the occupants of the town as individuals; the other, a trust for them collectively, as a community; the act authorizing the corporate authorities to enter the land in the first case, and making them trustees, and the judge of the probate court to enter the land and become the trustee in the other. If we pass from the law of 1844 to that of 1864, we find that the land to be entered is designated by sections and subdivisions, and we encounter the same question: What becomes of the land not occupied and covered with improvements? And to this question we are forced to answer that the probate judge holds it in trust for the community. In neither of the laws does congress attempt to define or mark out the line that distinguishes the individual from the public trust; that is, to what extent individual occupancy shall be permitted to displace public occupancy or the occupancy of the community as such. This whole matter is left to the local legislature. To it belongs the creation of the tribunal before whom individual rights shall be adjudicated. It prescribes the kind of evidence necessary to make good a claim of title. It prescribes what kind of disposition shall be made of the money arising from the sale of lots, and, in fact, has full and plenary power over the whole subject-matter of the trust, and to strengthen this power conferred by congress the law declares that any act done by the trustee, inconsistent with or in violation of the rules and regulations prescribed by the legislature for the execution of the trust, shall be void and of none effect. Congress seems to have contented itself with declaring simply who might enter the land and denominating the cestuis que trust, all else it hands over to the territorial legislature, which is better fitted, on account of its proximity to the subject-matter of the trust, to supervise and direct its details. There can be but little difficulty in comprehending the whole subject if we keep steadily in view the object had in the passage of the acts, namely: To extend protection to citizens of the towns and cities that had grown up on the government lands for commercial and mechanical purposes, and to secure to them severally, at the minimum price, all land actually occupied by them respectively for city or town purposes, and to them collectively such other lands as might be included within the limits of the town or city.

Before the rights of the individual claimants could be fully secured it became the duty of the legislature to prescribe the rules and regulations which would not only put the trustee in motion, but define the manner and extent of his action. This it did. It pointed out the method in which the trust as to these parties should be executed. It prescribed what steps should be taken to secure their legal titles, and empowered the probate judge or trustees to make conveyances to those justly and rightfully entitled to receive them. These rules and regulations were imperative upon him. They were the charter of his power and could not be disregarded. What they authorized, he could do, and beyond them he could take no step. By an oversight, the legislature made no provision for the disposition of portions of this land to which no individual claim existed, and there is nothing in either act of congress from which a power of sale in the trustee can be inferred, and much to repel such an inference. The acts of congress leave it altogether to the territorial legislature to determine what disposition shall be made within the objects of the trust of town lots belonging to the community at large, and of the proceeds of such of them as may be sold. This part of the trust most clearly cannot be executed without the intervention of local legislation.

The trustee cannot sell under the acts of congress, because they do not authorize him to sell any portion of the trust property, or to make any disposition whatever of moneys that might come into his possession on such sale. It being evident that it was the intent of congress that the lands included within the town site, and to which no rightful claim exists on the part of any individual, should be sold and the proceeds disposed of under the directions prescribed by the legislature, who are to establish rules and regulations for the whole execution of the trust, and it being further evident that the legislature failed to provide for the disposition of the same, it is clear to us that any sale of such land, made by the probate judge or trustee, in the absence of these rules and regulations, was wholly unwarranted, and absolutely void. It was an exercise of power of which he was not possessed. It was entirely competent for him to make conveyances to those having a valid and rightful claim to land at the date of the entry, provided they furnished the proper and requisite proof—beyond this, his acts were ultra vires, and could in no manner affect the rights of the community. It was his duty to await the action of the legislature. Section 6 of the act of February 9, 1866, does not provide for a sale of this land, but affects to give the lots to the city of Denver, and is, therefore, void.

But, notwithstanding this fact, we are clearly of the opinion that if the probate judge made sales of these lands, it is competent for the city of Denver, in its corporate authority, standing as the guardian of the interests of the community within the limits, to institute and maintain suits to have such sales set aside, and conveyances canceled, and to keep watch over this property until such time as the legislature shall authorize the sale, and when sold it is competent for the legislature to order that the money arising therefrom shall be applied to the erection of public buildings, for the use of said city, or be appropriated for the support of its public schools, or any other general purpose that will conduce to the interests of the community.

While we are thus clear that the city of Denver is entitled to relief, another question remains, namely, whether it must seek it by separate suits against each individual implicated in the transactions, or whether it is at liberty to bring them all into court at one time. The bill in this case charges that the conveyances which are sought to be set aside were made by different probate judges, at different times, and to numerous persons, and it is, therefore, claimed by the appellees that the bill is multifarious. In the case of Salvidge v. Hode, 5 Maddock's Ch. 94, the vice-chancellor says: "In order to determine whether a suit is multifarious, or, in other words, contains distinct matters, the inquiry is not whether the plaintiff's bill seeks relief in respect of matters which are in their nature separate and distinct. If the object of the bill be single, but it happens that different persons have separate interests in distinct questions, which arise out of that single object, it necessarily follows that such different persons must be brought before the court, in order that the suit may conclude the whole subject." The case of Brooks v. Lord Whitworth et al. was a case where an estate was put up and sold in several lots, and the bill was filed against various purchasers, six in number, praying that an account might be taken, and that the sales to the purchasers might be completed, and the remainder of the purchase-money paid in. To this bill a demurrer was filed, charging that it contained several and distinct matters that had no relation to each other, and in the greater part of which the defendant was in no way interested, and ought not to have been implicated. In deciding upon this demurrer the vice-chancellor says: "The court is always averse to a multiplicity of suits; but certainly a defendant has a right to insist that he is not bound to answer a bill containing several distinct and separate matters relating to individuals with whom he has no concern. A decisive objection to the bill is that the purchases of the different lots were made by distinct persons, each agreement being separate and distinct. The circumstances attending the sale of one lot may be very different from those relating to other lots. One may have objections, another has not." 1 Maddock's Ch. 58. In the case of Rayner v. Julian, 2 Dickens, 677, the bill was demurred to on the ground that it was multifarious. Lord KENYON says: "Suppose an estate is sold to different persons, a plaintiff could not include them all in one bill for specific performance; for each party's case would be distinct, and would depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, and there must have been a distinct bill upon each contract." See, also, West v. Randall et al., 2 Mason, 200. We cannot see why a different rule should apply in this case.

We are aware that it is a favorite object with courts of equity to prevent multiplicity of suits. For this purpose it is a general rule in chancery that all persons materially interested must be made parties; the forms of proceeding in chancery and the power of the court to mold its decrees, so as to suit the various equities of the case as established by the proof, enable it advantageously to settle and adjust in a single suit, rights and interests which, according to the rules of pleading in the courts of common law, would necessarily result in various issues incapable of being tried in a single case and disposed of by a single judgment. But, notwithstanding this disposition of a court of equity to prevent the multiplication of suits, it will not permit several plaintiffs to demand by one bill several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected against one defendant, nor one plaintiff to demand several matters of different natures against several defendants; and the reason of the rule is said to be that such a proceeding would tend to load each defendant with an unnecessary burden of costs, by swelling the pleadings with a statement of the several claims against the other defendants with which he has no connection, and also to prevent confusion and to preserve some analogy to the comparative simplicity of declarations at common law. See Fellows v. Fellows, 4 Cowen, 680.

We see no error in the action of the court in sustaining the demurrers to this bill, on the ground that the same was multifarious; we have not considered whether an absolute dismissal of the bill may prejudice the right of the city to institute another suit, but, to save all questions of that nature, we reverse the decree of the district court and direct that court to enter a new decree dismissing the bill without prejudice to the rights of the complainant therein, this, of course, without costs.

WELLS, J., dissenting. I think the complainant's bill shows no equity, and that the decree of peremptory dismissal, given in the district court, ought to be affirmed.

The question turns upon the construction to be given to the act of May 23, 1844, and as this case is one of great importance, I shall briefly set forth the reasons which compel me to differ from the other members of the court.

No bill in regard to the subject-matter of this action will lie at the suit of the present complainant, unless by the act of congress a trust was created in some portion of the town site for the citizens of Denver as a community ; or unless the legislature are by that act authorized to create such a trust.

I think that neither of these positions can be maintained.

The act of May 23, 1844 (5 Stats. at Large, 657), was intended to supply a defect in existing pre-emption laws. It is part of a system. It declares, in the opening clause, that, because lands settled upon as a town site are not subject to entry under existing pre-emption laws, therefore this legislation ; it must therefore be supposed to have been inspired by the same reasons of policy, as the several preceding acts in addition and supplement to which it was enacted, that is to say, to encourage actual settlement in the public domain, and it ought not to be taken by intendment that the purpose of congress was to encourage or permit speculation in town sites, or to give special bounties to a few ; or to so provide, that a few or many speculators might engross great tracts of the public domain, the prospective centers of population, which before that act were the common property of all citizens of the United States. The consequences here alluded to are, I think, the legitimate and almost necessary result of the doctrine of the majority opinion in this case ; for, as I understand that opinion, the first ten men, or a less number, who settle at a frontier post may engross the whole of three hundred and twenty contiguous acres : so much as they severally occupy they may procure to be conveyed to them in severalty, and the residue which no one occupies and in which but for this enactment certainly no one of them, nor all of them collectively, would have any right whatever, is to be sold for their benefit, and they themselves may become the purchasers at nominal prices.

It is not certain of course, that such an abuse of the supposed donation will in any case occur ; but it will be exceedingly probable in every case, and the more certain the future of the particular location and the greater the necessity and the propriety that it should not be engrossed by a few for purposes of speculation, the greater is the probability that it will be.

Before I can accede to the doctrine that it was the intent of congress to create a trust so liable to fraud and abuses, and so contrary in its probable results to the spirit of all prior legislation, I must find a clear warrant for it in the words of the act, and I think the words of the act admit of no such interpretation.

The act declares that the entry of the town site shall be made "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests."

Now, when ten or twenty or more families or individuals congregate and so form what is termed a town or vill, there is always an occupation of lands in severalty by each of the community ; this is the usage of our race. Generally, I believe, at least in the west, a survey into lots and blocks has preceded or shortly followed the first settlement, in order to precisely mark out and ascertain the bounds and extent of the right and possession of each individual settler, but whether there be such survey or not, I think it may be said invariably, the right and occupation of each settler has been wholly several and separate ; there are no common fields as with the early settlers of French and Spanish extraction, but they hold their lands like their goods, each his own, to and for himself.

This habit and usage of severalty in the occupation and ownership of lands was certainly within the knowledge of congress, and from the language used may be inferred to have been in contemplation in the passage of this act ; and it was, I think, the several and separate occupancies of the individual settlers, which it was intended to protect and secure.

Nor do I think, that it was the intent of the act to extend its benefits beyond this ; for beyond those separate lots and parcels which come within the several occupancy of the individual settlers, every thing is vacant ; it cannot be fairly said that, in such case, the community collectively occupy the whole of the town site. An invading army are said to occupy the towns and cities of the nation invaded, and each individual settler or inhabitant of the town occupies his own close and premises ; but if this word is ever used to express the residence of the whole population of a town upon the several quarter sections of land upon which it is built, this is not the common and ordinary use of the word, and it is the common and ordinary sense in which the words of the statute are to be received. But the statute limits the trust estate to the several use and benefit of the occupants, according to their respective interests ; beyond the several occupation of the individual settlers as before shown, there is no occupation, and beyond this, no settler has any interest whatever.

It follows then, that, except as to those lots which are actually occupied at the date of the entry, the trust does not then inure. But there is no provision that the land shall revert, nor certainly can the trustee hold it discharged of the trust ; the result is, that the trust remains in abeyance until, by subsequent occupations from time to time, the beneficiaries are appointed.

But, in the clause of the act which follows what I have already quoted, it is provided that the execution of the trust "as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the State or territory," etc.

It is thought that by these words it was contemplated that some portions of the domain shall be sold, and the argument is, that there can be no sale of the occupied lots ; that, as to them, the sole duty of the trustee is to convey to the several occupants ; that whatever is implied from the words now under consideration, must therefore apply to the unoccupied portions only, and herefrom is deduced a power and duty in the local legislature to direct a sale of these portions, and prescribe the manner of it and the disposition of the proceeds which it is said may be appropriated to any public uses in their discretion.

The reasons which compel me to dissent from these conclusions are, briefly, as follows :

The clause of the act now under consideration relates to a matter merely incidental and subordinate to what precedes it. In what precedes this clause, as I have attempted to show, the trust estate is granted, and the trustee and the beneficiaries are appointed, and the several interests of the latter are fixed and determined. What follows relates merely to the execution of the trust ; and I take it to be a rule of construction that, where, by statute, a particular thing is clearly granted, and other words follow regulating the mere incidents of the principal thing, such as time, place, manner, etc., the latter word shall not have the effect to enlarge or limit what is before granted or prescribed, unless this is necessary to give them effect.

Is it necessary, in order to give effect to this latter clause, to say that there should be a sale of some portion of the several lots within the location ? I think not. In order to every entry of a town site under this act, the minimum price for the lands must first be paid by the trustee, either of his own moneys, or by provision of the State or territorial authorities, or of the citizens of the town or some of them ; these moneys, at least it will be agreed, the local legislature may require the occupant to pay to the trustee before he shall be entitled to receive a conveyance ; and this is the price which each occupant pays for his several interest and portion. The transaction may, I think, be fairly enough termed a sale, and the moneys paid by the settler to the trustee the proceeds of such sale. Unless the trustee had advanced his own moneys, legislation would be necessary to insure the proper disposition of the proceeds in his hands, and this is, I think, what was intended by the words in question. If, however, I am in error as to the construction to be placed upon these latter words—if it was contemplated that, under the act, there must be a sale of all lots which might in any particular case be unoccupied at the date of the entry—then I am clearly of the opinion that the proceeds must be divided among those who were occupants at the date of the entry (or possibly at the inception of the proceedings for entry), and that no other persons are, or can become, entitled to share therein, for the trust is expressly declared to be for the "several use and benefit of the occupants," and there is no syllable in the act which negatives or qualifies this intention, or gives color to the idea that a joint use was intended either in the lands or their proceeds.

The city of Denver, therefore, has no interest whatever in these lots or their proceeds, and can have none by any legislation of the territory, for this would be to create a joint use where the statute has prescribed a several one, and a use not alone to the occupants at the date of entry (who, according to the majority opinion in this case, are the sole beneficiaries), but to them and to all who may come after them to the end of time.

I dissent, therefore, from the reasoning of the court, and from so much of the order as directs a modification of the decree which was given in the court below. Reversed.

THE proceeding was against the chief justice, and BELFORD and WELLS, JJ., were not agreed upon the principal point, and therefore the writ was denied.

BELFORD, J. This is an application for a peremptory writ of mandamus to issue against Moses Hallett, judge of the third judicial district, to compel him to recognize Marmaduke Green as the prosecuting attorney of that district.

It appears that at the election, held in September, 1870, Green was, by the votes of the qualified electors of the third district, elected prosecuting attorney. He received his certificate, took the prescribed oath, filed a suitable bond, received his commission from the governor, and entered upon the discharge of his duties. At the December term of the Pueblo district court the respondent, then presiding as judge, refused to recognize Green as such prosecuting attorney, because he was not, as the order of the court alleges, an attorney of said court, or authorized to appear therein. It is admitted on both sides that, at the date of the election, Green was not a licensed attorney. On behalf of the relators, it is claimed that the people having elected him to this office, he is entitled to discharge the duties and receive the emoluments of the same, and that the action of the court in refusing to recognize him is not only revolutionary in its character, but, if permitted to ripen into a precedent, would subvert the principles of our government and overthrow the rights of its citizens. On the other hand, it is contended that the statutes of the territory prescribe who shall be attorneys, and make it an indispensable prerequisite to the practice of the law in our courts, that a license shall be obtained from the supreme court, and until it is obtained, no man, however great may be his abilities, is entitled to standing or recognition at the bar of the judiciary. I fully conceive the vast importance of the principles involved, but shall not shrink from their discussion. If permitted to have any choice as to the causes that should come before me, this is one of the last I would desire to entertain, but no choice is left. This court is bound to a single duty, and that is, to decide the causes brought before it according to law, leaving the consequences to fall where they may.

It has been well said that, in order to maintain a system of government which will be able to secure to the citizen his rights, it is necessary to have persons appointed or chosen to administer the law. And, when persons are thus clothed with the power and have assumed the duties of a public officer, they have taken upon themselves the obligation to perform those duties, and if they neglect or refuse to do so, any one whose rights are thereby injuriously affected is entitled to demand relief. The remedy provided by our system of law, as well as that of England, is a process, issuing from the judicial branch of the government, which seeks to compel the officer to go forward and to do that which is enjoined upon him by the position he holds. This process is denominated a writ of mandamus, and when there is a right to execute an office, perform a service, or exercise a function, more especially if it be a matter of public concern or attended with profit, and a person having such right is wrongfully kept out of possession or dispossessed of such right, and has no other specific legal remedy, the court will interfere by mandamus upon reasons of justice and of public policy to preserve peace, order and good government. But, while the judiciary is thus clothed with this extraordinary power, it is never exercised, except to enforce a legal right. It cannot be invoked to place one in office or to secure him in the enjoyment of the same, if it is manifest that he has no title. If, at the date of the election, Green was an ineligible candidate, and legally disqualified from holding the office of prosecuting attorney, the people who elected him were bound to take notice of this ineligibility and disqualification, and no vote that they could cast and no commission that he could receive could remove or cure the infirmities or disabilities which attached to him. While the will of the people is sovereign, still it must be expressed in accordance with recognized public law, and when it exceeds the limits of this, it is the duty of courts to interfere and by judicial checks afford the people time for reason and reflection. Before proceeding to an examination of our statutes on this subject, it will not be out of place to inquire what an attorney is. "An attorney at law," says Blackstone, "answers to the procurator or proctor of the civilians and canonists. And he is one who is put in the place, stead or turn of another, to manage his matters of law. These attorneys," he adds, "are now formed into a regular corps; they are admitted to the execution of their office by the superior courts of Westminster Hall and are in all points officers of the respective courts in which they are admitted, and as they have many privileges on account of their attendance there, so they are peculiarly subject to censure and animadversion of the judges. No man can practice as an attorney in any of those courts but such as have been admitted and sworn an attorney." So early as the statute 4 Henry IV, chapter 18, it was enacted that attorneys should be examined by the judges, and none admitted but such as were virtuous, learned and sworn to do their duty. And many subsequent statutes have laid them under further regulations. The statute in this territory is not much unlike those in England. Section 1 provides: No person shall be permitted to practice as an attorney or counselor at law, or to commence, conduct or defend any action, suit or plaint in which he is not a party concerned, in any court of record within this territory, either by using or subscribing his own name or the name of any other person, without having previously obtained a license for that purpose from some two of the justices of the supreme court, which license shall constitute the person receiving the same an attorney and counselor at law, and shall authorize him to appear in all courts of record within this territory and there to practice as an attorney and counselor at law, according to the laws and customs thereof; * * * and to demand and receive all such fees as are or hereafter may be established for any services which he shall or may render as an attorney and counselor at law in this territory. Section 2 provides that no person shall be entitled to receive a license until he shall have obtained a certificate from the court of some county of his good moral character, and also a certificate from one or more respectable counselors at law, that he has been engaged in the study of the law for two successive years prior to the making of such application. Section 4 makes it the duty of the clerk of the supreme court to make and keep a roll or record, stating that the persons whose names are therein written have been regularly licensed and admitted to practice as attorneys at law within this territory. Section 5 provides: And no person, whose name is not subscribed to or written on said roll, with the day and year when the same was subscribed thereto or written thereon, shall be suffered or admitted to practice as an attorney or counselor at law within this territory.

From reading this statute it is evident that the intent of the legislature in passing it was to elevate the standard of the legal profession, by excluding from it those who had not made the science of the law a matter of study. To guard the interest of the community, and to preserve from violence and injustice the rights of individuals, the legislature emphatically declares that no person shall be permitted to practice as an attorney at law, or to commence, conduct or defend any action in which he is not a party concerned, without having previously obtained a license. He may commence and manage his own case, but if he declines to do this, he cannot employ another individual to attend it for him, unless that individual has qualified himself for the task by two years' study. This evidence is the license under the sign manual of two of the justices of the supreme court, and, in the language of the statute, "this license shall constitute the person receiving the same an attorney at law, and authorize him to appear in court." Without that license he cannot appear; it is his passport to the bar. It is the charter that gives him a right to be heard; it is the authority which empowers him to collect fees for services rendered, and if he does not have it, the court can rightfully and properly refuse to recognize him, although his talents may not be inferior to those of a Webster or a Choate.

Can it be said that the legislature intended to confine this statute to civil suits alone? Does all this legislative solicitude center upon dollars and cents, while the rights of life and liberty are turned adrift to be sported and trifled with by any one whom the people in their partisan madness and frenzy may elect and call prosecuting attorney? And, can it be said that this court ought to issue a writ of mandate to compel the judge below to violate this clearly-expressed public law? When the statute says, "that no person shall be permitted to commence, conduct or defend any action without a license as an attorney," do the words, "any action," simply mean any civil action, or do they apply to all kinds of actions entertained and heard in courts? Is there any less necessity for a knowledge of the law when a man is on trial for his life than there is when the contest is confined to property? Shall we impute to the legislature a shameful disregard of man's dearest and most vital interests, by holding that an act, designedly passed, to preserve the character and dignity of a profession that in all ages has been the bulwark of society, and into whose hands the most sacred trusts are and have been committed, fails to give protection when protection is most required? And this we will do, if this statute is so construed as to confine its provisions to attorneys merely employed in the trial of civil cases. It must be observed, also, that this act, defining the duties of the district attorney, devolves upon him the necessity of appearing in behalf of the territory and the several counties of his district in all indictments, suits and proceedings, where the territory or the people thereof, or any county of his said district may be a party. His duties, therefore, embrace something more than criminal business. It touches upon—nay, he must enter into the domain, where admission as to all others is only secured by a license. But it is contended that the act creating the office of district attorney does not require that such officer shall have been admitted and licensed as an attorney. True, it does not, but it is a well-settled principle that, in giving construction to any statute, the legislature must be understood to have used terms and phrases in the sense in which those terms and phrases for long years prior had been understood and received in relation to a particular subject. Another well-established and fundamental rule of construction is, that all acts and provisions of the law, in part materia, are to be taken and considered together. It follows, therefore, that, in construing the act under examination, we must look to the object and purpose of the legislature as gathered from the light of surrounding circumstances, and as illustrated and explained by the previous legislation in this and other States relating to the same subject.

Another rule of construction is, that where the same or similar words are used in a statute, which are found in a previous statute, relating to the same subject-matter, the latter act must receive the same construction as the former. In many of the States this representative of the people is selected by the courts. The manner of creating the office can make no difference; the question is, can such an officer be selected from among those who are not attorneys — officers of the court? It cannot be done, because no attorney can appear as an officer of the court who has not been admitted to practice. Appointment by the governor or election by the people confers no authority to appear in court. The person elected is not called prosecutor but prosecuting or district attorney. The very words pre-suppose the individual to be an attorney, and, while in such capacity, to be elected a district attorney or an attorney to prosecute the pleas of the territory. The election does not confer on the individual the privilege of being considered an attorney if he was not one before, but, having the attorney's privilege in court, he can, by appointment or election, appear in behalf of the people to prosecute and have his designation "district attorney" or "prosecuting attorney." The experience of every member of the bar will teach him that this is the universal and accepted construction given to acts of the character now under consideration. But, to make clearer this principle, let me illustrate it by an example: A B is elected prosecuting attorney, qualifies and enters upon the discharge of his duties. During a term of court he is disabled and becomes incapable of attending to his duties. To prevent a failure of justice, the court must appoint a prosecutor; can it be contended that the judge could appoint to such office one who had never been admitted to practice law, or, if he should assume to do so, would it not be an abuse of his powers? But, it is said, that the statute fixes no grade of ability for this office. True, it does not, and, generally speaking, eminent qualifications have nowhere been held to be indispensable to the occupation of office; but the statute has, at least, enjoined one thing, and that is, whether the individual has one or ten or twenty talents, he shall not be permitted to display them, as an attorney at law, in the courts of justice, until he has spent two years in burnishing them up, and has a certificate to that effect. Fortunately we are not without authority on this subject.

In the case of The People ex rel. Hughes v. May, 3 Mich. 598, it is held by the court that no person who has not been previously admitted as an attorney at law is eligible to the office of prosecuting attorney. The Michigan statute is like our own. The people there elected May district attorney. Prior to the election, he had not been admitted as a member of the bar, and had not received a license, and the supreme court held that he was clearly ineligible, and sustained a judgment of quash on that ground. MARTIN, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Among the well-settled rules of construction of statutes are these: 1st. The natural import of the words of any legislative act, according to the common use of them when applied to the subject-matter of the act, is to be taken as expressing the intention of the legislature, unless the intention so resulting from the ordinary import of the words be repugnant to sound acknowledged principles of public policy."

"The natural import of words is that which their utterance promptly and uniformly suggests to the mind, that which common use has affixed to them; the technical is that which is suggested by their use in reference to a science or profession, that which particular use has fixed to them, and when the natural and technical import unite upon a word both their rules combine to control its construction, and, indeed, it is difficult to understand how any other signification, than that which they suggest, can be affixed to it, unless upon the most positive declaration, that a different one was designed. Now, the word "attorney," when used in connection with the proceedings of courts, and the authority to conduct business in them, as well as when employed in a general sense with reference to the transaction of business, usually and almost necessarily confided to members of the legal profession, has a fixed and universal signification on which the technical and popular sense unite. The legislature and the judge, the lawyer and the layman, understand it alike as having reference to a class of persons who are, by license, constituted officers of courts of justice, and who are empowered to appear and prosecute, and defend, and upon whom peculiar duties, responsibilities and liabilities are devolved by law in consequence. That the natural and technical import of the words or title "prosecuting attorney," are identical, I shall not stop to argue at length, and common experience teaches us that they suggest to every person alike the idea of an attorney at law, set apart to conduct the public business, whether of a civil or criminal nature, and perhaps primarily, that of a criminal character."

In the case of The Commonwealth v. Adams, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 6, it was held that one elected to the office of county attorney to which he was ineligible, not having been a licensed practicing attorney for two years, and exercising the functions and receiving the enrolments of the office, is guilty of usurpation of office and liable to indictment. It is insisted, however, that the right to an office cannot be determined by an action, other than a proceeding in the nature of a writ of quo warranto. Mr. Blackwell, in his treatise on tax titles, says, in writing of officers de facto, "the only appropriate mode of testing the title of a person to an office is, by an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, in which, after notice and impartial hearing, he will be ousted from the office, if it turns out that he has been exercising official functions without the warrant of the law. Until then, he holds the office by sufferance of the State, and the silence of the government is construed by the courts as a ratification of his acts. When the government acquiesces in the acts of such an officer, third persons ought not to be permitted to question them." Id. 117. While I yield my assent to the doctrine here enunciated in the broadest extent, I am not unmindful of the existence of another principle equally well settled, namely, that when a party having been deprived of the use of an office comes into a court and applies for a writ of mandamus to restore him, the writ will never be awarded when it is clear and manifest that the party applying for the same was, at the date of his election, ineligible, and when it is patent that if restored he could be immediately ousted by a writ of quo warranto.

The papers in this case show that, at the date of Green's election, he was not a licensed attorney, and he was not entitled to practice in the courts of this territory, and, I think, I have already shown that the absence of this license rendered him incompetent to exercise the office of district attorney. Can it be said that one who shows himself not entitled to an office has a right to this writ? I know of no case that sanctions such a claim. It is, perhaps, the correct theory in reference to an office elective by the people, that the fact that an eligible person is duly chosen to fill the same, confers upon him the right, the title to such office, or the certificate of election or commission, is, in some respects, something like a deed to land, the mere evidence of such title. This title gives the right to exercise the accustomed or fixed duties of the office, and receive the fees and emoluments therefor. In this right, it has been often contended, there may exist a franchise to which the rights of property may attach for certain purposes. But this title vests in and these rights inure only to an eligible person. See Glasscock v. Lyons, 20 Ind. 2; Allen v. McKean, 1 Sumn. 317.

In coming to the conclusion that I have reached, I have not been unmindful of the delicacy and importance of this question, nor regardless of the rights of the people to exercise the electoral right, untrammelled by any conditions or restrictions, except such as are expressed by law. But such conditions and restrictions, when established, are to be enforced as well as the right itself. I am not at liberty to disobey the law as an individual, nor do I possess that right when acting with thousands of others. Nor can I consent that a writ of mandamus shall issue to the judge below, when its force and effect is to compel him to do an act, the performance of which is a palpable violation of law. For the reasons I have given the writ should be denied.

WELLS, J. Although I at first doubted, I am now satisfied that the court has jurisdiction to entertain this application; the court to which the writ is prayed is within the supervisory jurisdiction of this court; the duty sought to be enforced is of public concern, and is not judicial in its nature, nor one about which that court is called upon to exercise a discretion.

The election of Mr. Green, his qualification in office, and his entry upon the duties thereof, are admitted, and the sole ground of his exclusion was that he had not been admitted to the bar of this court, and that, by reason of ignorance of the law and the usage and practice of courts, he was incompetent to discharge the duties of his position.

But the statute has not prescribed any qualification of learning or admission as an attorney, to confer eligibility to this office, and I think courts ought to be slow to give to the general words of a statute such effect as to limit the right of the people to exercise their preference in filling the offices within their gift. Undoubtedly it is more proper that the person elected to manage the causes of the people should be a member of the bar and in practice, for this affords an assurance in some degree of his competency to discharge the duties of that position. Probably, too, it was generally supposed, when the act creating the office of district attorney was passed, that an attorney at law would be chosen by the people, but I see nothing in this mere propriety, nor in the name by which the law designates the official, to warrant me in concluding that the legislature intended to restrict the suffrage of the people to a single class. The people have the power and the right, both by their inherent sovereignty and by prescriptive usage, to elect incompetent men to office; and if the legislature may lawfully limit the exercise of this right, and say that certain privileged classes shall exclusively exercise certain offices, they have not clearly said so as to this particular office, and I think we ought not to strain the text of the statute to limit the exercise of the elective franchise. It is a precedent full of danger. The authorities which are cited in support of the contrary view are not, in my opinion, entitled to controlling consideration.

In May's case, 3 Mich. 598, the opinion of the court is based upon the construction of a series of statutes which never were in force here.

In Adam's case, 3 Metc. 7, it appears that there was an express statute prohibiting any one not a licensed attorney from exercising this office. The opinion of my associate, therefore, rests solely upon the fitness and propriety that the legislature should have made this restriction and the mere circumstance or accident, that the legislature in denominating this office have used a word which indicates a person licensed by the courts to manage the causes of others for a reward.

But however this may be, it appears that in this case Mr. Green had not only been elected and commissioned, but he had entered upon his office and was in the actual exercise of its duties and functions. He was, therefore, an officer de facto by a colorable title, and he had a property in his possession of the office, however ineligible, of which he could lawfully be ousted only by due process of law, and due process of law is, in this case, nothing less than the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in a direct proceeding after notice to the incumbent and opportunity given him to be heard upon the question of his right.

It is not as if the prior incumbent had refused to yield the office and asserted the invalidity of Mr. Green's election; in such case upon quo warranto brought, I apprehend the court might have investigated the question of the relator's eligibility.

But the prior incumbent yielded the office, and Green entered into it and had possession, and whether lawfully elected or not, he had a property in that mere possession of which he could no more be deprived by a summary order of court than of a freehold in lands. It is idle to say that he does not now show a lawful title to the office, his possession was his title, and that must suffice until lawfully dispossessed. If the courts may, for any supposed disqualification, exclude by a mere order the district attorney elected by the people, the same power certainly extends to the sheriff, and for any thing I can see, if Mr. Green may be excluded of his office, so may the attorney of the United States; the official denomination of the two is identical; the statutes of this territory, upon which the opinion of my associate is based, certainly govern both; the one is as much an officer of the court as the other, and the former, quite as truly as the latter, holds his office from a power above and beyond the courts.

And if the authority which was claimed and exercised in the case of Mr. Green exists at all, it is difficult indeed to say that it does not extend to all public officers whatever; unless those who exercise their functions beyond the precincts of the courts of law hold by some superior tenure, and this cannot be admitted.

I am of opinion that Mr. Green was unlawfully excluded from the office of district attorney, and that a peremptory mandamus ought to issue according to the prayer of the relator.

Writ denied.

THACKERAY v. HANSON.

CONTINUANCE — affidavit must set out material facts. If the facts set out in an affidavit for continuance are not competent in defense under the state of the pleadings, the continuance should be denied.

In an action on a promissory note, one of the defendants moved for continuance upon the ground, that an absent witness would testify that the words "president" and "secretary" had been cut from the signatures to the note. These facts were not material except to show that the note was executed on behalf of a corporation, and was not the note of the defendants. The execution of the note was not denied by plea, verified by affidavit, and therefore the evidence was not admissible, and the motion for continuance was properly overruled.

PROMISSORY NOTES — all are negotiable. Under our statute (Rev. Stat. ch. 1064), all promissory notes and instruments for the payment of money are negotiable, whether so expressed or not, and a note which does not contain the words "or order," is negotiable in the same manner as if it did contain those words.

PLEADING AND PROOF — variance in description of promissory note. A promissory note expressed to be given for cash borrowed may be described in the declaration as given for value received.

Error to Probate Court, Clear Creek County.

Mr. HUGH BUTLER and Mr. R. S. MORRISON, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. The defendant, in his affidavit for continuance, swore that he expected to show, by the absent witness, that the promissory note sued upon was executed by the witness and defendant as president and secretary respectively of a certain mining corporation, and on behalf thereof, and that after its execution, and before the commencement of the action, it had been fraudulently altered without the knowledge or consent of either witness or defendant, by cutting from the end thereof the words "president" and "secretary" appended to the signatures of witness and defendant respectively.

A continuance ought not to have been granted, unless the facts set forth by the affidavit were competent matters in defense, under the state of pleadings. These matters cannot be said to be competent or admissible, except as tending to show that the note declared upon never was the undertaking of the defendant, for the liability of the defendant was not affected by the alteration, unless made in a material part, and there was nothing material in the words stricken from the note, unless they are to receive effect as rendering parol evidence admissible to show that the note was executed in a representative capacity, and was, therefore, the note of the principal and not of the agent. It is manifest, therefore, that the evidence to obtain which a continuance was sought, whether directed to the avoidance of the note by reason of the alteration, or to the capacity in which the defendant contracted, involves the same substantial matter of defense, that is, that the note was not the undertaking of the defendant, and in either view, the defendant having failed to verify his plea, such evidence could not be received even though the witness had been present.

What is here said will not, however, be understood as going beyond the particular case here presented, nor certainly as impairing or denying the rule that an alteration apparent on the face of the instrument must be explained in order to its admission in evidence, for, whether such apparent alteration may or may not be taken advantage of under an unsworn plea, is a question not presented by this record, the alteration alleged in this case being one which it seems to us could not be apparent upon the face of the paper.

The motion for a continuance was, therefore, properly overruled.

The note counted upon is described in the declaration as payable to the order of the plaintiff for value received; the note offered in evidence upon the trial was payable to the plaintiff without other words, and was expressed to be for cash borrowed; objection was made on the ground of variance in these respects, which objection being overruled, an exception was saved, and this decision of the court is now assigned for error.

Under the English statutes, and in most of the States of the Union, words of negotiability are requisite to give an assignable quality to commercial paper; where the law is so, such words are a material part of the note, and the instrument must, in pleading, be correctly described in this respect. Under our statute, however, all promissory notes and instruments for the payment of money are negotiable whether so expressed or not, and whether the particular instrument contains the words "or order," or equivalent words or not, its legal effect is the same as if it did contain such words. In describing such instrument, therefore, if it be declared upon as payable to the plaintiff directly, when, in fact, it is payable to his order, or, as payable to his order, when, in fact, payable to him directly, in either case there is no variance, for the contract is described according to its legal effect.

The second allegation of variance seems to be equally without foundation. It is said, in Byles on Bills, 64,* that, "though the nature or particulars of the consideration appears on the bill or note, it is not necessary to state it in the declaration, or it may be stated generally as value received."

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

PROMISSORY NOTES—WHAT NEGOTIABLE.—All promissory notes and instruments for the payment of money are negotiable in Colorado, whether so expressed or not, and a note which does not contain the words "or order" is negotiable in the same manner as if it did contain these words: Cowan v. Halleck, 9 Colo. 577.

SCHOOL DISTRICT No. 8, JEFFERSON COUNTY, v. ERSKIN.

ATTORNEY IN FACT—to execute appeal bond. If authority is given by statute to the president of a school district to execute an appeal bond on behalf of the district, the district may nevertheless confer the same authority upon its secretary. A party may have several agents appointed to do the same thing.

APPEAL BOND may be amended. If, on appeal from a justice of the peace, the bond was executed by the secretary of the district in good faith, but without authority from the district, it was amendable. The statute (Rev. Stat ch. 50, § 45, 407) on this subject applies to every case in which an honest effort is made to appeal the cause.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

Mr. A. H. DE FRANCE, for appellant.

No appearance for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. Appellee brought suit against the school district before a justice of the peace, and recovered judgment, from which the latter appealed to the district court, and filed a bond, to which the name of the district was signed by the secretary thereof.

In the district court, appellee moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the bond was not executed by appellant, which motion was allowed, and a motion by appellant for leave to file a good and sufficient bond was denied.

The school law (Rev. Stat. 580) provides as follows: "The president shall appear in behalf of his district in all suits brought by or against the same, but when he is individually a party this duty shall be performed by the secretary;" and probably it was thought that this conferred upon the president alone power to execute an appeal bond in behalf of the district, and that such power could not be exercised by any other person.

Under the law, school districts are simple democracies in which educational matters are managed by the electors themselves, or by a district board composed of the president, secretary and treasurer, if the electors shall so declare. With such an organization it is convenient, if not necessary, to clothe an officer with power to conduct all legal proceedings on behalf of the district, and it is reasonable to presume that the section recited was intended to supply this want. It will be observed that the president is to appear on behalf of the district, that is, as the agent of the district and obviously for the purpose of protecting the interest of his principal. While the president is thus made the agent of the district to attend to its legal controversies, we do not discover in the act any limitation upon the power of the district to act through other agencies. The appointment of the president is made to serve the convenience and to protect the interests of the district and not to circumscribe its powers in the matter of choosing its agents. If it be granted that the president has power to appear in behalf of and conduct the causes of the district, non constat, that such authority is not possessed by any other person, for a principal may have several agents appointed to do the same thing. The authority of the secretary to execute the appeal bond in this case was denied upon the ground, that such authority could not be conferred upon him, which is not tenable. If he had authority to execute the bond it was binding upon the district, and before appellee could call upon the court to dismiss the appeal, the absence of authority in the secretary must have been shown at least prima facie. In some courts a rule obtains which requires that evidence of the authority under which an agent acts shall be filed with the instrument executed by him, but, in the absence of any such rule, courts will not assume that an agent has acted without authority from the principal until a showing is made.

Upon proper application the district court would doubtless require appellant to exhibit the authority under which the secretary acted, or the want of such authority may be shown by affidavit.

But if the bond was executed in good faith it was amendable even if the secretary had no authority from the district to sign it. The statute upon this subject is very liberal, and it applies to every case in which an honest effort is made to appeal the cause. Patty v. Winchester, 20 Ill. 261.

The judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause is remanded with directions to the district court to permit appellant to file a new bond, according to the prayer of its motion.

Reversed.

COFIELD v. MCCLELLAN et al.

DENVER TOWN SITE — title to. When title was acquired to the town site of Denver, under the act of May 23, 1864 (13 Stat. at Large, 94), the prior act of the legislative assembly of the territory (3 Sess. 189), came into effect and governed the trustee in the disposal of lots within the town site.

By the act of congress the regulation of the details of executing the trust was entirely remitted to the territorial legislature, and it was eminently proper that in the very threshold they should fix a period within which the claim of every beneficiary should be asserted.

TERRITORIAL ACT — regulating execution of trust. The provision of the fourth section of the act of the territorial assembly, requiring claimants of land within the town site to assert their claims within ninety days after notice of the entry, was as to claims and rights existing at the date of the entry dictated by public interest and clearly within the power delegated by congress to the territorial legislature.

Every person who, in virtue of an occupancy or improvement existing at the date of the entry of the town site or prior thereto, seeks to bring in question the right of one holding by conveyance from the trustee, must show affirmatively a compliance on his part, with the requirements of the fourth section of the act of assembly, or at least must excuse his failure to comply therewith.

FAILURE TO OBSERVE — section 4 of act of assembly. Where a bill was filed against one who had obtained title, under the act of congress and of the territorial assembly, to a lot in the city of Denver, by one who claimed title to the same lot which accrued in the year 1869, to have the defendant declared a trustee for the benefit of the complainant, and it was not averred that the complainant or his grantors had filed a declaratory statement, as required by the fourth section of the act of the assembly, the relief was denied.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

MR. ALFRED SAYRE and MR. H. R. HUNT, for appellants.

MR. S. E. BROWNE and MR. G. W. PURKINS, for appellees.

WELLS, J. The act for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the territory of Colorado (13 Statute at Large, 94), authorizes the probate judge of Arapahoe county to enter certain specified lands, the site of the city, in trust for the occupants and the bona fide owners of improvements thereon, and declares in substance that the execution of the provisions shall be controlled by the provisions of "An act for the relief of the citizens of towns upon lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," approved May 23, 1844. This latter act (5 Statutes at Large, 657), provides, that, upon the entry, in pursuance of its provisions, of any town site upon the public domain, the execution of the trust for the occupants therein created shall be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the State or territory within which the same is situated.

In pursuance of this delegation, the legislature of this territory, by the act of March 11, 1864 (Laws 1864, p. 139), had, in advance of the passage of the act of congress for the relief of the citizens of Denver, prescribed rules and regulations for the administration of the trust, in case of the entry thereafter of any town site, in pursuance of the act of congress of May 23, 1844.

There can be little question, we think, that, upon the entry of the town site of Denver (which was made in pursuance of the act of May 23, 1864), the act of the territorial legislature came into application and governed the trustee in the disposal of the lots within the town site; and, in order to the determination of this case, it is necessary, therefore, to refer to the provisions of that act.

By this act, then, it was provided that, in case of the entry of any town site under the act of congress, May 23, 1844, the corporate authorities or the probate judge making such entry should, within thirty days, give notice thereof by posting in three public places within the town, and by publication in a newspaper printed and published within the county; and by the fourth section it was provided, that "each and every person or association, or company of persons claiming to be an occupant or occupants, or to have possession, or to be entitled to the occupancy or possession of such lands, or to any lot, block, share or parcel thereof, shall, within ninety days after the first publication of such notice, in person, or by his, her or their duly authorized agent or attorney, sign a statement in writing containing an accurate description of the particular parcel or parts of land in which he, she or they claim to have an interest and the specific right, interest or estate therein, which he, she or they claim to be entitled to receive, and deliver the same to or into the office of such corporate authorities, judge or judges; and all persons failing to deliver such statement within the time specified in this section shall be forever barred the right of claiming or recovering such lands or any interest or estate therein, or in any part, parcel or share thereof, in any court of law or equity."

By the act of congress, the regulation of the details of executing the trust was entirely remitted to the territorial legislature, and it was eminently proper that, in the very threshold, they should fix a period within which the claim of every beneficiary, or one pretending to be such, should be asserted; for, in the absence of such a limitation, neither could the trustee understandingly determine at what period he might lawfully perform the trust, and convey to an occupant the lots within his occupancy, nor could any citizen, whether before or after such conveyance, at no matter how remote a period, be confident that his title might not be clouded by assertion of an adverse claim. To have omitted such legislation would have been to encourage the prosecution, in later years, of dormant claims and possessory rights long before abandoned, and to render doubtful and uncertain all titles accruing under the trust. Such a regulation as that contained in the fourth section before quoted was, therefore, as to claims and possessory rights, existing at the date of the entry, dictated by public interest, and as to those claims and rights, was clearly within the power delegated by congress to the territorial legislature. Whether any several beneficial interests in the trust could, under any circumstances, arise subsequent to the entry, is a question upon which I have heretofore expressed my opinion in The City of Denver v. Kent et al., ante, 336, decided at the present term, and the effect of this legislation upon rights not acquired or asserted to be acquired, until after the date of the entry, it is not necessary in this cause to advert to.

And, though the period fixed within which those claiming to be entitled to share in the trust may appear to be a more limited one than a liberal policy might have dictated, yet we cannot, for this reason, declare the statute invalid ; for this, like all other questions of mere detail, was exclusively within the legislative discretion.

We are of opinion, therefore, that every person who, in virtue of an occupancy or improvement existing at the date of the entry of the town site, or prior thereto, seeks to bring in question the right of one holding by conveyance from the trustee, must show affirmatively a compliance on his part with the requirements of the fourth section of the act of the territorial legislature of March 11, 1864, or at least must excuse his failure to comply therewith. As to what state of circumstances will amount to such excuse, or whether any circumstances whatever will excuse such omission, is a question not presented by this record, and upon which, therefore, we express no opinion.

Now, in this case, the entry of the town site was made on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1865, and though there is no proof that notices of the entry were posted, as required by the act, yet we think that, in support of the subsequent proceedings of the probate judge, we ought to indulge the presumption that he performed what the law required of him in this respect. On the 11th day of August, A. D. 1865, the probate judge conveyed the premises in controversy to the defendant Louisa McClellan, who subsequently conveyed to the defendant Mary Davis.

The complainant now seeks to have this defendant declared a trustee, for his benefit, on the strength of a prior occupancy and improvement of the premises by one Preston, under whom he claims. It is averred that Preston erected a cabin upon the premises in the year 1859, and in the same year conveyed to one Hall, who, by tenants, occupied the cabin, at different times, down to about the year 1862 ; in October, 1866, Hall conveyed to Felter, and subsequently, Felter to Bates, and Bates to the complainant ; in April, 1869, Felter, Bates and the complainant, being, at the date of the several conveyances to them, respectively residents of the city of Denver.

The bill which was filed on the 22d day of April, 1869, nowhere avers that Hall ever presented to the probate judge his declaratory statement required by the fourth section of the act of March 11, 1864; nor is any excuse shown for his omission so to do, or for the long delay of the complainant and those under whom he claims to assert their right.

The complainant is, therefore, not entitled to the relief prayed, and the decree of the district court dismissing the bill must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

DENVER TOWN SITE, TITLE TO.—On appeal to the United States supreme court, it was held that the bill to compel a conveyance from the defendant, to whom the probate judge had in pursuance of the statute conveyed a lot, was properly dismissed. The judgment below was affirmed: Coffield v. McNeel, 18 Wall. 331. In Tucker v. McCoy, 3 Colo. 236, also, it was held that a failure to file the statement within the time prescribed would operate to forever bar the right of the claimant, both at law and in equity.

CLEAR CREEK, COLORADO, GOLD AND SILVER MINING COMPANY et al. v. ROOT et al.

PRACTICE — assigning errors. Errors should be assigned with such particularity as to give information of the objections to the record upon which the plaintiff intends to rely.

PRACTICE in cases of mechanic's lien. In cases arising under the act relating to mechanic's liens (Rev. Stat., ch. 54, 487) the chancery practice is to be observed.

PRACTICE — evidence to support bill confessed. Upon bill confessed, the court may proceed to a decree, with or without evidence, to support the bill, and this rule is applicable to lien cases.

INTEREST on demand secured by lien. A debtor may agree to pay interest on a demand secured by mechanic's lien as well as upon any other, and, whatever its effect among creditors, the debtor cannot object to pay the interest.

PLEADING AND PROOF — decrees must not exceed demand in bill. A decree cannot be entered for more than is claimed in the bill.

SERVICE BY PUBLICATION — what evidence sufficient. Where the decree requires this there was notice by publication, and the record is not complete, the decree will not be reversed because the certificate of publication is not found in the record.

TIME TO REDEEM — discretionary. Where the court has allowed ninety days before sale in which the premises may be redeemed, the decree will not be disturbed on that account.

Error to District Court, Clear Creek County.

MR. L. O. ROCKWELL, for plaintiff in error.

MR. WILLARD TELLER, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The sufficiency of the petition, and the extent of the premises subjected to the lien, are not questioned by the assignment of errors, and although allusion has been made to those questions in the argument, we shall not consider them. The first, second and third causes of error are upon the sufficiency or the want of evidence to support the decree. The fourth cause appeals to the service of process, and the sixth to the time allowed for payment of the sums found due. The only assignment upon which other objections to the record can be founded, is the fifth, and this is substantially quod in omnibus erratum est, and bad according to Bacon's Abridgment.

To say that the decree is contrary to law, equity and good conscience, without specifying in what particular, serves no practical purpose. The plaintiff in error might as well refuse to state his objection as state it in such general terms, and, if such practice were allowed, defendants in error would never know, in advance of the argument, what points were in issue. Errors should be assigned with such particularity as to give information of the objections to the record upon which the plaintiff intends to rely.

By the twenty-third section of the chapter of the Revised Statutes relating to liens, it is provided, that in proceedings under the act courts are vested with all the powers of courts of chancery, and shall be governed by the rules of proceeding and decision in those courts, so far as those rules of proceeding and decision are applicable to cases and questions presented for adjudication and decision under the act.

With propriety, this has been regarded as establishing the chancery practice in cases of this kind, subject, of course, to such modifications as are provided by the act relating to liens. Sutherland et al. v. Ryerson et al., 24 Ill. 517.

The nineteenth section of the act relating to chancery practice has been held to confer upon the court power to proceed to a decree, upon bill confessed, with or without evidence to support the bill, as the court shall, in its discretion, deem best. Stevens v. Bicknell, 27 Ill. 444.

It is contended that a different rule should be applied to lien cases, but we do not discover any ground for doing so. The rule in question is quite as applicable to this proceeding as any other rule of chancery practice, and it is therefore precisely within the terms of section 23 of the act relating to liens. The bill in this case having been taken as confessed by plaintiffs in error, the want of evidence to support it is no ground for reversal.

Another question arises as to the amounts of money awarded to defendants in error respectively by the court below, which, it is said, exceed the demands of the bill. It appears that a portion of Root's demand was secured by promissory note, bearing interest at the rate of two per cent per month after maturity, and as this contract for interest was within the provisions of the statute upon that subject, we see no objection to its allowance. Surely a debtor may agree to pay interest upon a demand secured by mechanics' lien as well as upon any other.

Perhaps a question might arise among creditors or subsequent incumbrancers as to the effect of an agreement by the debtor to pay interest, by which the demand of one creditor would be increased to the prejudice of another. But no such question is presented in this case, as we are confident that the debtor himself cannot rely upon such an objection. It may be well to notice, in this connection, that the Franklin Silver Mining Company, one of the plaintiffs in error, has not disclosed any connection with the property mentioned in the bill, or shown any right to complain of the amount of the demands of defendants in error. We do not perceive that the amount adjudged to Root exceeds the claim made by the bill, for it is no more than the note with interest, and the account which was not included in the note added. But Waterman claims in the bill $168.42, and the decree in his favor is for $192. There was no agreement to pay interest to him, nor was there any settlement of the account upon which such an agreement could have been implied. In so far, then, as the decree exceeds the demand stated in the bill it is erroneous and must be modified.

The next question in the order in which they are presented by the assignment of errors relates to the service of process, which, we think, was not deficient, or, at all events, no deficiency was shown. The Franklin Company appeared voluntarily in the court below, and, as to the other, the decree shows that there was notice by publication. Perhaps this would not be sufficient, without the certificate of publication itself, if the record was full and complete. But the certificate of the clerk does not show this to be a full and complete record, and we will, therefore, presume that the court below acted upon sufficient evidence of the notice by publication.

As to the last point, it was within the discretion of the court to fix the time for the payment of the sums found due to defendants in error, although it has been held that the time ought not to be less than the life of an execution upon a judgment at law. This period was allowed in this case, and there appears to be no reason for questioning the correctness of the decree in this respect.

The decree is reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a decree according to the view here expressed. Reversed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—EQUITY PRACTICE.—Statutory proceedings to enforce mechanics' liens are in their nature equitable, and prior to the code practice were, as is held in the principal case, administered by the chancery side of the court, and governed by the chancery rules of practice; San Juan & St. L. M. & S. Co. v. Colo. 221.

CODY v. BUTTERFIELD.

CONTINUANCE to obtain testimony of absent witnesses. A party seeking a continuance to obtain the testimony of absent witnesses must, in his affidavit, set forth the facts to be proven with such particularity that the opposite party may, if he see fit, admit them and proceed to trial.

Action upon a promissory note; defense, that note was given for the carriage of certain goods which were damaged in transitu through the negligence and carelessness of the carrier. Affidavit for continuance to obtain testi-many of absent witnesses did not set forth to what extent the goods were injured, nor that the defendant could show, by these or other witnesses, the amount of the damage occasioned by the alleged negligence of the plaintiff, nor what the amount of this damage was. Held, that the continuance was properly denied.

The party seeking a continuance ought to make it appear affirmatively to the court, not only that, upon a possible or supposable state of facts, the testimony may become important, but that, upon the facts as they are, it is and will be so.

CONTINUANCE—diligence in obtaining depositions. Where the issues were made up in February, 1868, and application for continuance in June, 1869, and the defendant made no effort to obtain the testimony of absent witnesses until some three months before the sitting of the court, there was not sufficient diligence.

The matter of diligence in obtaining testimony discussed.

PRACTION—ground of objection to testimony should be stated. If the nature of an objection to testimony is such that, by the production of further testimony, the evidence objected to is susceptible of being made admissible, the particular ground of objection must be stated, and, if it is not stated, a court of review ought to regard the evidence as properly admitted.

In an action upon a promissory note against a woman, it appeared that she was married previous to the execution of the note, and it did not appear that the note was executed in or about the sole trade or business of defendant, or in relation to her separate estate; and it was urged in this court that, upon these facts, a presumption arises that the marriage existed at the time of the execution of the note, and that the burden of showing that the note was given in relation to the separate business or estate rested upon the plaintiff. These objections, not having been made in the court below cannot be urged here.

EVIDENCE OF PAROL ASSIGNMENT in action by one to use of others. In an action upon a promissory note, brought by one for the use of others, it is not necessary at the trial to prove a parol assignment of the note to the persons to whose use the suit is prosecuted.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellant.

Mr. HUGH BUTLER, for appellee.

WELLS, J. This was an action of assumpsit commenced in the Arapahoe district court; the venue was afterward changed to the Gilpin district court, where a trial was had and judgment given for the plaintiff.

The plaintiff below, in several counts, declared upon a promissory note, purporting to have been executed to him by the defendant by one Elijah Cody, her agent. The defendant pleaded the general issue, without verification and payment post diem. The cause was put at issue on the 20th day of February, A. D. 1868.

On the 3d day of June, A. D. 1869, and at the May term in that year of the Gilpin district court, the defendant moved for a continuance, upon her own affidavit of the absence of certain witnesses, the material portions of which are hereafter set forth; this motion the court overruled.

On the trial the plaintiff produced a note corresponding to that described in the declaration, and proved that the signature thereto was in the handwriting of Elijah Cody. That, from 1861 to 1866, Elijah Cody resided in Denver, and was the agent of plaintiff, who was engaged in the sale of millinery and dry goods; that, in 1865, defendant had accounts with different banking houses in Denver; that Elijah Cody generally made the deposits which went to the credit of these accounts, and defendant generally checked against them; that Elijah Cody attended to defendant's affairs during the periods of her absence, when engaged in the purchase of goods, that he was about defendant's store both then and at other times; one witness spoke of this relation of the parties as existing from 1861 to 1866, and upon cross-examination, testified that Elijah Cody was the husband of defendant (though at what time, was not expressly stated), and that they resided together. It was further proven that Elijah Cody died at some time prior to the trial, though the date of his decease was not shown.

Upon this evidence, the defendant prayed instructions, substantially as follows: 1st. There is not sufficient evidence in the case to enable plaintiff to recover. 2d. There is no evidence that any of the plaintiffs for whose use this suit is brought have any interest in the note offered in evidence, and unless such interest is shown, they cannot recover in this action. 3d. If defendant, at the time of giving the note offered in evidence, was a married woman, the plaintiffs ought to have sued her husband with her, and unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that her husband was dead at the time of the bringing of this suit, they must find for defendant.

All the instructions were refused ; a verdict was found for the plaintiff and judgment given thereon.

Appellant now assigns for error, among other things: 1st. That the court overruled her motion for a continuance. 2d. That the court erred in refusing the instructions prayed by her counsel. 3d. That the verdict is against the evidence and the damages excessive. 4th. That the court gave judgment upon the verdict, and such judgment is against the law and evidence.

We think the defendant's motion for a continuance was properly overruled.

The affidavit, upon which this application was based sets forth, that defendant could not safely proceed to a trial, on account of the absence of two witnesses named ; that she expected to prove by said witnesses that the claim sued on in this case was for a sum of money alleged to be due for freight upon certain goods freighted by plaintiffs for defendant ; that the witnesses were present at the time the goods were received and assisted in unpacking them and observed their condition, and that said goods were badly damaged by having become wet, and by rough and improper handling on the part of said plaintiffs and their employees, and that defendant had no other witness, etc.

We think the facts intended to be proven by the absent witnesses were not set forth with sufficient particularity ; the rule is, that the party seeking a continuance for the absence of testimony must, in his affidavit, set forth the facts to be proven with such particularity that the opposite party may, if he see fit, admit them and proceed to trial. McBain v. Enloe, 13 Ill. 76.

This is an alternative to which the opposite party is entitled, and he ought to have precise information as to the matters upon which he is to make his election.

Now, in the affidavit, it is not alleged to what extent the goods were injured, nor that defendants could show, by these or other witnesses, the amount of the damages occasioned by the alleged negligence of the plaintiff, nor what the amount of this damage in fact was, but the only allegation is, that the goods were "badly damaged," and if the witnesses had been present, testifying to this and every other fact set forth in the affidavit as to be proven by them, their testimony, of itself, and without other facts shown, could not have either barred the action or mitigated the damages. Not only would it not have been material, but, upon motion, must have been stricken out.

It may be said that the testimony of the particular witness is none the less material to defendant's case, because not sufficient to establish it as a whole; but it was said in Baily v. Hardy, 12 Ill. 459, that "where testimony is important only in connection with certain facts, those facts should be set forth or referred to, so that the materiality of the evidence may be apparent to the court. The court is not to presume that a state of facts may arise which may render the testimony important."

We think this decision ought to be adhered to in our courts; the party seeking a continuance ought to make it appear affirmatively to the court not only that, upon a possible or supposable state of facts, the testimony may become important, but that, upon the facts as they are, it is and will be so.

Upon the question whether the affidavit shows diligence in the efforts made to procure the testimony of these witnesses, we are of the opinion that it does not. The pleadings in this case were brought to an issue on the 29th day of February, 1868. This application for a continuance was interposed on the 10th day of June, A. D. 1869. The affidavit shows that Welch, one of the witnesses, resided at Salt Lake City, in the the territory of Utah, and had resided there for several months then last past; that in February, previous to her making application for continuance, defendant furnished her counsel with the facts to be proven by him and his place of residence; that, as early as April, a comission issued to a commissioner in Salt Lake city to take the deposition of Welch; that said commission was indorsed with the request that, if not called for in ten days, it might be returned to defendant's attorneys; that the deposition had not been returned to the court nor to defendant's attorneys, and that she expected to procure the attendance of Welch, or his deposition, at the next term of the court; that the other witness, Mrs. Anderson Orr, then resided at Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa; that she had formerly resided at Central City, Colorado; that deponent went east in February preceding; that Mrs. Orr was then still a resident of Central City; that deponent had returned from her absence only a few weeks previous to making her affidavit, and had obtained no knowledge of Mrs. Orr's departure until within a few days; that, at the time of defendant's departure for the east, she had no knowledge of any intention on the part of Mrs. Orr to leave the territory, and that sufficient time had not elapsed, since hearing of her departure, to procure her deposition.

We think as to neither of these witnesses was there such a degree of diligence shown as ought to be exerted in a case so long pending and at issue as this had been.

The witness Welch had resided in Utah for several months, and, for any thing that appears, he may have resided there at the time of the commencement of this suit, and always afterward, the defendant being at the time aware of his place of residence; and if, with this cause pending and at issue, she saw fit to defer preparation until within some three months of the sitting of the court and to assume in the mean time the risk of the witnesses' removal or temporary absence, and the delays and uncertainties of communication, she ought now to endure the event with the same equanimity with which, in this game against fortune, she accepted the hazard. Nor was it diligence after this long delay to rest until June in reliance upon the one commission issued in April; after the lapse of a reasonable time for the return of the commission some effort ought to have been put forth to ascertain its whereabouts or to procure another.

As to the witness, Mrs. Orr, there is no sufficient excuse shown, we think, for the omission to serve her with a subpoena, nor is it anywhere alleged that the defendant expected to procure her testimony at any time in the future.

Under the remaining assignments of error it is insisted by counsel that it is shown that defendant was, at some time prior to the trial, a married woman; that, by fair inference upon the testimony, the coverture existed at the time of making the note upon which recovery was had; that the note sued upon was not shown to have been executed in or about the sole trade or business of defendant or in relation to her separate estate; that the statute has repealed the common law only in relation to those contracts, into which the married woman is expressly permitted to enter; that the burden of establishing that in the execution of the note in question, the defendant was acting within the statute rested upon the plaintiff; that this was not established and that therefore the judgment is not supported by the evidence.

We apprehend that the propositions of law maintained by counsel are supported by authority, and certainly they rest upon the soundest reasons; but we think that, admitting the effect of the testimony to be as contended, the defendant cannot now be heard to make these objections: 1st. The plaintiff declared specially upon the writing offered in evidence and under which the recovery was had and the defendant's plea was not verified. The statute of this territory provides that no person shall be permitted to deny on trial the execution of any instrument of writing, whether sealed or not, upon which any action may have been brought, unless the person denying the same shall, if defendant, verify his plea by affidavit. R. S., ch. 70, § 14.

I understand that under this statute a defendant, sued upon a written instrument, must swear his plea, not only in cases where he proposes to deny the mere act of subscribing the instrument, but also in cases where, while the subscription in fact is admitted, it is proposed to assert that for any reason the writing was not the act of the party in such sense as to be a binding and obligatory contract; as, for example, where the defense is that at the time of subscribing the instrument the defendant was drunk or insane, or non compos, or that he was imposed upon, and subscribed under the belief and understanding that the instrument was other and different from what it in fact was, or that the instrument was never delivered, or that for any other reason the defendant did not assent to the instrument in such sense as to execute it within the meaning of the law.

When the legislature adopt technical words in prescribing rules of practice for courts of record, their language must, I apprehend, be received in a technical sense; the word "execution," in the statute, must be understood, therefore, as meaning, not the mere subscription of the parties' name, but the subscription of the name to the instrument, with a knowledge of its contents, or with such opportunity and deliberation that the law implies knowledge, with intent to be bound thereby, and with capacity to exercise that intent; nothing less than this is, in law, an execution of an instrument in writing; and if the party sought to be charged proposes to assert that, for the absence of any of these elements, the instrument is not his act, he must verify his plea; in these positions, however, the other members of the court disagree with me.

Second: The bill of exceptions shows that, after the reception of the parol testimony recited in this opinion, the plaintiff below offered to read to the jury the promissory note, about which the witnesses had testified, and that the defendant objected thereto; but it nowhere appears what ground or reason was assigned for this objection, or that any reason whatever was assigned.

If the objection, which is now alleged against the sufficiency of the evidence, had been then stated, the plaintiff's counsel might have, perhaps, supplemented the alleged deficiencies in the proofs; opportunity would have, at least, been afforded to produce the evidence, for the absence of which error is now assigned; and if the defendant desired to insist that the proper preliminary proofs had not been made, it was her duty to have then asserted it.

When, upon trial, objection is made to the admission of testimony, and the nature of the objection is such that, by the production of further testimony, the evidence objected to is susceptible of being made admissible, the particular ground of objection must be stated, and if it is not stated, a court of review ought to regard the evidence as properly admitted. We are all of the opinion, therefore, that the promissory note offered in evidence upon the trial was, for the reason last mentioned, properly admitted, and the defendant cannot be heard to say, in this court, that the person assuming to act as her agent was not lawfully authorized, or that it was not shown to have been executed in a case within her legal capacity, or that, for any other reason, the proofs connecting her with the instrument were insufficient.

We see no error in the assessment of damages, nor in the omission to prove the parol transfer of the note to the beneficiaries named in the declaration; it need not have been alleged; and being unnecessary to allege, is certainly not necessary to be proven. The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

CONTINUANCE TO OBTAIN TESTIMONY: Glenn v. Brush, 3 Colo. 31. Objections to admission which may be obviated by introduction of further testimony must be distinctly presented at the time the objectionable testimony is offered (McCraw v. Welch, 2 Colo. 230; Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co., 3 Colo. 87; Tracy v. People, 6 Colo. 155); but where evidence is clearly incompetent a general objection will be sufficient: Webber v. Emmerson, 3 Colo. 252.
IN ACTION FOR ANOTHER'S USE it is unnecessary to allege the use, or if alleged, to prove it: Fallon v. Coen & Ten Broeke C. M. Co., 3 Colo. 269; Board of Commissioners v. Sloan, 5 Colo. 33.

WATSON v. HAHN.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—on promissory note. In action against indorser of a promissory note, judgment having been obtained against the maker the amount of the judgment, with interest, is the measure of damages unless the indorser show that the recovery was wrongful.

EVIDENCE—by parol of contents of record. Parol evidence is not admissible to prove the amount of a judgment or the cause of action upon which it was recovered. The record or a transcript therefrom must be produced.

WITHDRAWING DEMURRER—what shall be regarded as. If, upon overruling demurrer to declaration, an order is made at the instance of the plaintiff requiring the defendant to plead, although the defendant fail to object, he shall not be regarded as withdrawing his demurrer and submitting to the rule.

JUDGMENT UPON DEMURRER—sufficiency. Where two demurrers to the declaration were on file, and the judgment of the court refers to the said de-murrer, without specifying which of them, it will be presumed that the court passed upon both of them.

A judgment upon demurrer that the same be overruled, although informal, will be sustained.

COMMON-LAW FORMS — should be observed. The common-law forms of entries cannot be abandoned without danger to the rights of parties and it is much to be regretted that clerks are not more familiar with them.

WAIVER — of joinder in demurrer. If a party proceed to argue a demurrer without joining in demurrer, he cannot complain of the omission.

ASSIGNOR OF PROMISSORY NOTE — liability of. To charge the assignor of a note suit must be instituted against the maker, at the first term of any court having jurisdiction of the amount, and prosecuted with reasonable diligence to judgment, and the property of the maker, so far as found, must be subjected to the judgment.

Under the statute of this territory the assignor of a promissory note cannot be made liable to the assignee upon notice of dishonor by the maker merely.

DILIGENCE — in prosecuting maker of the note. If the holder of a note obtain judgment by confession of the maker, soon after the maturity of the note, and stay execution thereof, the court will not consider whether execution was obtained as soon as it could have been obtained in the due course of law. In such case the stay of execution is made at the peril of him who grants it.

Delay of seventy days after judgment in obtaining execution is not due diligence.

DILIGENCE AGAINST MAKER — what will discharge assignor. Lack of diligence in prosecuting the maker of a note will not discharge the assignor, unless it has been prejudicial to him.

As a judgment is a lien upon real estate for one year after rendition, and longer, if execution is obtained within the year, execution issued seventy days after judgment may be sufficient to secure the real estate of the maker.

But execution is necessary to secure the personal property of the maker, and if there was delay in issuing execution, in order to show that such delay was not prejudicial to the assignor, it should be averred that all the personality of the maker was ultimately secured, or that he had no such estate at the time judgment was entered.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

S. B. HAHN, pro se.

HALLETT, C. J. There are five special counts in the declaration and the common counts. A demurrer to the special counts was confessed by appellee as to the first count, and by leave of court he amended that count and filed another special count, which I shall call the sixth. A demurrer was interposed to the first count as amended, and the sixth count, and subsequently the first demurrer, remaining undetermined as to the second, third, fourth and fifth counts, and this last demurrer pending, the court made the following order :

“At this day came the said parties by their attorneys aforesaid, and the demurrer of the said defendant to plaintiff's declaration coming on to be heard, was argued by counsel, and the court being fully advised in the matter, and mature deliberation thereon had, is of the opinion that the said demurrer be overruled. Thereupon, on motion of plaintiff, it is ordered by the court that the defendant in this cause plead by the first day of February next.”

At the next term of the court, which occurred after the time limited in this order for pleading, no plea having been filed, appellee discontinued his action upon the common counts and took judgment nil dicat upon the special count, and the damages were assessed by a jury in open court. Upon the assessment of damages, appellant took a bill of exceptions which contains the testimony given upon that occasion, and upon another day of the term he moved to set aside the assessment of damages, but the court refused to do it, and he excepted.

Error has been assigned upon this refusal of the court to set aside the assessment of damages, and we think that appellant has the right to be heard in this court upon that point. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. v. Ward, 16 Ill. 522.

In explanation of the evidence given upon the assessment of damages, it is necessary to remark that, in the first and second counts of the declaration, appellant is charged as indorser of a promissory note, and it is averred that judgment was obtained upon the note by appellee against the maker. Upon the hearing before the jury, a witness testified that he had computed the amount due upon the judgment mentioned in the declaration and found it to be $1,672.84, which is the amount for which the jury returned their verdict. This was all the evidence before the jury, and as there is no other judgment mentioned in the declaration than that obtained by appellee against the maker of the note, the evidence must be taken as referring to that judgment. It is laid down in Corgan v. Frew, 39 Ill. 31, that, in an action against the indorser of a note, judgment having been obtained against the maker, the measure of damages is the amount of the judgment against the maker, and the accruing interest and the costs if unpaid. And this must be the correct rule, for the note being merged in the judgment, at least so far as the maker is concerned, the assignor can have no remedy over against the maker unless he be subrogated to the rights of the assignee in the judgment. Again, if the maker should reduce the recovery against him by set-off, payment or otherwise, the assignor ought to have the benefit of such reduction. As, however, the assignor is not a party to the suit between the assignee and maker, it may be difficult to say that he would at all events be bound by the recovery in that suit. But it will be sufficient for our present purpose to say that the judgment against the maker, with interest, will furnish the amount of damages unless the assignor shows that the recovery was wrongful, leaving the question of his right to contest the amount of the judgment to be determined when it is presented. But if the amount of the judgment against the maker, less the payments made upon it, is the measure of damages, it certainly cannot be established by parol testimony. The rule which requires the best evidence to be produced makes it necessary to produce the record of the judgment or a transcript from the record, not only for the purpose of showing the amount of the judgment, but also that the judgment was in fact recovered upon the promissory note, which is the foundation of the action against the assignor. We think, therefore, that there was error in the assessment of the damages, and the judgment must be reversed for that reason.

And this makes it necessary to examine the whole record, for, while it is true that, if we could maintain this judgment upon any count of the declaration, we should be relieved from consideration of the other counts, yet, as we have not been able to sustain the judgment, we must look into the ruling of the court upon the demurrer, which leads to an examination of the whole declaration. A preliminary question is, however, presented as to the effect of the order upon appellant to plead, made at the time the demurrers were overruled. It is said that appellant submitted to this order or assented to it, and, in so doing, waived his demurrers to the declaration. It is well settled that, if a party plead after his demurrer is overruled, he thereby waives his demurrer, and cannot afterward rely upon it. And probably cases may be found in which it has been held that the same result is attained by a formal application on the part of the demurrant for leave to plead after his demurrer has been passed upon. But it will be observed that in this case the order to plead was made at the instance of appellee. And although appellant was present, and it does not appear that he objected to the order, we think that this is not sufficient to show an intention on his part to abandon his demurrer. To change the character of the defense and substitute an issue of fact for one of law required some act or word on the part of appellant indicative of his intention to make such change. When the order was made he could have done no more than protest against it, and record his protest in the form of a bill of exceptions. To hold that he must have done this in order to prevent the inference that he assented to the order would be to say that he must have protested against any change of the issue, in order to maintain it as it was. This would be preposterous. When a party has taken issue upon a declaration he must be allowed to maintain it until he voluntarily abandons it. Another preliminary question arises upon the form and language of the order of the court above recited. It cannot be contended that this is a formal judgment upon demurrer, and yet we think that, in support of the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction, we must give it the effect of such a judgment. There is sufficient in the order to show that the court passed upon a demurrer, and as it was the duty of counsel to submit all issues proper for the consideration of the court, and then ripe for hearing, we must presume that this was done. Indeed, as the order contains no reference to either demurrer specifically, we must apply it to both of them, in order to give effect to it. The common-law forms of entries cannot be abandoned without danger to the rights of parties, and it is much to be regretted that clerks of courts are not more familiar with them. It is hoped that counsel and judges of courts of original jurisdiction will make an effort to relieve us of the perplexities, often recurring, of such records as this.

Upon the point that there was no joinder in demurrer, we have only to say that appellant, having submitted the demurrers to the court, cannot now complain of the omission. Parker v. Palmer, 22 Ill. 489. From these questions of practice we pass to the weightier matter of the law governing appellant's liability as assignor of a promissory note. In the seventh section of the act relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, it is provided that the assignor of a note shall be liable upon it, if the assignee, by suit against the maker, shall use diligence in collecting it, but such diligence is excused, if at the maturity of the paper it would be unavailing. This statute was borrowed from the State of Illinois, in which State it has received judicial interpretation.

In Indiana, also, the maker of a note must be prosecuted to insolvency before recourse can be had to the indorser, and there are many valuable decisions in the reports of that State upon points arising under our statute. It seems that in order to charge the assignor of a note, suit must be instituted against the maker at the first term of any court having jurisdiction of the amount and prosecuted with reasonable diligence to judgment, and the property of the maker, so far as found, must be subjected to the payment of the judgment. Bestor v. Walker, 4 Gil. 3; Nixon v. Weyhrich, 20 Ill. 600.

In this case the note became due on the 8th of March and on the 22d of that month, and before any term of court in which judgment could have been obtained, Emanuel, the maker of the note, confessed judgment upon it in the district court of Gilpin county, in favor of appellee. In the first count of the declaration it is alleged that, by agreement with Emanuel, execution of the judgment was staid until the first day of June, after the judgment was entered, and in both the first and second counts it appears that execution was not in fact issued until that day.

No laches can be imputed to appellee in respect to the time in which judgment was obtained, but the question arises whether there was diligence in obtaining execution of the judgment. And upon this point it can make no difference whether execution was staid by agreement with Emanuel or not. Appellee was not bound to accept the terms upon which Emanuel confessed judgment. He was at liberty to commence suit in the ordinary way, and if he prosecuted his suit diligently he could not be prejudiced by the laws delay. Nor can we enter into a calculation of chances to ascertain whether execution was obtained as soon as it might have been obtained in the ordinary course of proceeding. We have no means of determining such a question, and if we had, the statute gives no authority for doing it. The statute enjoined diligence in the prosecution of the suit, and if appellee granted a stay of execution, he did so at his peril. In Rives v. Kumber, 27 Ill. 291, a delay of sixty days in issuing execution upon a judgment against the maker of a note was held sufficient, if unexplained, to discharge the assignor. In Spears v. Clark, 7 Blackf. 283, a delay of thirty days was attended with the same result. Upon subsequent proceedings in this cause, however, it appeared that the fl. fa. was issued within fourteen days from the adjournment of the court in which judgment was obtained; this was regarded as sufficient diligence. Spears v. Clark, 3 Ind. 297. In this opinion the Indiana authorities are reviewed, and it seems that a delay of thirty days, after the adjournment of the court, in issuing execution against the maker of a note has not been sanctioned in that State. In the case at bar, as we have seen, execution was delayed from March 22d to June 1st, a period of seventy days, and this, according to the authorities cited, is not due diligence. But lack of diligence on the part of the assignee does not discharge the assignor unless it has been prejudicial to him. The statute requires diligence for the purpose of subjecting the property of the maker to the payment of the note, and if this is accomplished the assignor cannot complain that it was not done as speedily as possible. To this effect are the cases cited, and all others that we have seen, and this is the spirit and intent of the law. As we have seen, judgment was obtained against Emanuel, the maker of the note, in due time, and from the time it was entered by a law of the territory it became a lien upon his real estate, for one year at least, and longer if execution should be issued within one year. Therefore, execution issued seventy days after the judgment was entered was as effectual to secure the real estate of Emanuel as if issued at an earlier day. Upon this point we refer to what is said arguendo in Bank U. S. v. Tyler, 4 Peters, 366.

Therefore, as to the real property of Emanuel, delay in execution could not work injury to appellant. Not so, however, as to the personal estate. To secure that an execution was necessary, and to excuse the delay in issuing it, or rather to show that such delay was not prejudicial to appellant, the declaration should show that all the personalty of Emanuel was ultimately secured, or that he had no such estate at the time judgment was obtained. In this respect the first count is defective. It is averred that Emanuel neither owned or possessed any personal property "liable to be taken in execution," but the pleader neglected to state the time to which this allegation refers. The averment, "that he obtained judgment as aforesaid against said Emanuel, at the earliest time in his power, thereby securing all the property of said Emanuel in said county," is argumentative and otherwise obnoxious to the rules of good pleading.

In the second count it is alleged "that the said Emanuel never had any goods or chattels liable to be taken in execution after the maturity of said note," and this, we think, is substantially good. As we have seen, the judgment, with the executions issued upon it, was sufficient to subject the real property of Emanuel to the payment of the note, and if he had no personal estate the greatest diligence must have been fruitless. While, therefore, we think that the demurrer ought to have been sustained to the first count, we support the ruling of the district court as to the second, and this we infer, from the tenor of the discussion at the bar, is sufficient to determine the rights of these parties. Before passing from these counts we wish to say that, if appellant desired to object to the immaterial matter incorporated in them, there could be no objection to his doing so; but to bring the matter properly before the court he should, in framing his demurrer, have avoided the faults of his adversary.

In the third and fourth counts of the declaration appellee relied upon a promise made in consideration of forbearance to sue. We have given no attention to these counts, as they do not appear to have been relied upon. The fifth count charges liability as indorser, according to the lex mercatoria as it exists in some of the States, by which an indorser becomes liable upon notice of dishonor by the maker. It is hardly necessary to say that under our statute no such liability exists. The sixth count is framed upon that clause of the statute which relieves the assignee from pursuing the maker of a note, when such pursuit would be unavailing. As it conforms to the statute, we do not perceive any objection to it. Our conclusion is, that the district court erred in overruling the demurrer to the first and fifth counts, and for this and the error in assessing damages the judgment must be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded.

Courts — not allowed when amount due has been tendered before suit. Where the jury find that, before suit brought, the amount found to be due the plaintiff was tendered to him, he cannot recover costs.

Error to District Court, Weld County.

Messrs. BROWN & MECHLING, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. L. SMITH, for defendant in error.

Per CURIAM. This was an action in trespass for killing sheep. The trial was had by jury, who found verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $10, and further found, that, before the bringing of the suit, the defendant had tendered to the plaintiff the sum of $10, in payment of the damages done by him. On this verdict the court entered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $10, together with his costs, charges, etc. This judgment, so far as it relates to costs, cannot be sustained.

Section 32, Revised Statutes of Colorado, p. 511, provides: "In all cases where a tender shall be made, and full payment offered, * * and the party to whom such tender shall be made doth refuse the same, and yet, afterward, will sue for the debt or goods so tendered, he shall not recover any costs." It is claimed by the appellee, inasmuch as no motion was made for a new trial before the writ of error was sued out, this court cannot review the judgment. There is nothing in this point. The verdict was regular. A motion for a new trial precedes the entering of the judgment, and cannot well follow it. Besides, there would be nothing to require a new trial. The error is not in the trial, but in the character of the judgment. This cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to vacate so much of said judgment as assesses costs against the defendant below. It is ordered that the appellee pay the cost.

TIGER v. LINCOLN et al.

NEW TRIAL — sufficiency of evidence to support finding. In determining the relative credit to be given to the testimony of conflicting witnesses, so much consideration is due to the manner and bearing of each under exam ination, and their apparent intelligence and candor, or prejudice, that a court of review, to which all these things are hidden, ought not lightly to reject the opinion of either court or jury, before whom the witnesses for both parties have been subjected to examination and cross-examination.

Where a witness for the plaintiff testified that the defendant purchased goods of the plaintiff, and the defendant denied that he had made such purchase, and the court found the issue for the plaintiff, such finding will not be set aside for insufficient testimony.

Where, however, the finding is unsupported as to a portion of the damages assessed, the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the proper sum.

AGENT — who is charged as principal must show previous authority. In an action against T. to recover the price and value of certain goods alleged to have been purchased by him, the defendant alleged that he purchased the goods for B., and as his agent; but there was nothing to show that B. had given to T. authority to purchase such goods. Held, that the defense was not made out.

Nonjoinder of defendants must be pleaded in abatement. Nonjoinder of defendants is never a bar but only matter in abatement.

RELEASE OF DEFENDANT by accepting third party. In an action for the price and value of goods, the defendant alleged that he purchased the goods as agent for B., and it appeared that some time after the purchase was made plaintiffs rendered an account to B. in which he was charged with the balance of defendant's bill, for which action was brought. There being no evidence to show that plaintiffs agreed to accept B. as their debtor, or that B. agreed to pay the debt, the defendant was not thereby discharged.

Appeal from Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

At the trial Alonzo Huxley testified: That he was present at a conversation between the defendant and Mahar, at what is now the place of business of Strickler and Mahar, formerly Lincoln & Strickler. The conversation was in relation to a bill of goods. He, the defendant, admitted the buying of $473 worth of goods on his personal account.

On cross-examination the witness stated: The defendant did not claim that he had paid any part of the money on these goods, nor that any thing had been paid on them. He claimed that he paid $200 on account of Bigelow, or on the Bigelow account. What his statements were I do not remember; I could not swear that he did, or did not, claim that the goods were sold to Bigelow. He claimed that the amount due was the debt of Bigelow; He admitted he had an account there; He claimed these goods were bought for Bigelow.

Re-direct: He said he had bought the goods individually; can't recollect whether he admitted that he owed the amount of the bill or not; Tiger claimed that the goods were bought for Bigelow; the exact amount I do not remember; I do not know that Tiger denied the debt at all; He admitted that he owed for the goods; He also admitted that they had not been paid for; He claimed that he bought the goods for Bigelow; I was present at but one conversation.

Con. J. Mahar testified: I have had a conversation with the defendant in reference to the account sued on in this cause; the defendant agreed to send the money back from Pueblo to pay for the goods mentioned in that account; this was at the time of the sale of the goods; he came back afterward and said he had sold out to Bigelow, and that he wished us (Lincoln & Strickler) to send our bill to Bigelow and try and get our pay for the goods from him (Bigelow). Bigelow had an account with us (Lincoln & Strickler) at the time these goods were sold. I have always understood that Bigelow and Tiger were partners. Peter Tiger came there to Lincoln & Strickler in May, 1868, and bought a bill of goods.

Witness is here shown the account, amounting to $473.11.

I sold these goods to Peter Tiger; they were charged to his private account on the books of Lincoln & Strickler; he (Tiger) agreed to pay for them, and to send the money back from Pueblo on his trip south. At his second conversation with me, which was on his return, he told me he had sold out to Bigelow, and that Bigelow had agreed to pay for these goods, and wanted us (Lincoln & Strickler) to send the bill to Mr. Bigelow; that was on his return; he went on to make a statement when Bigelow would pay it; he stated to me in our (Strickler & Mahar's) office, at the time of the conversation testified to by the witness Huxley, which was after the commencement of this suit, that he had bought the goods, but that he had sold them to Bigelow.

and had never got any pay for them. This is the bill of goods I sold to Tiger (again referring to the above bill of goods), and they were delivered to Tiger. At the time Tiger bought the goods he wanted to get them for Bigelow, and I would not let him have them for Bigelow; I let him have them on his own account.

On cross-examination the witness was shown two bills or accounts which he said were in the handwriting of Strickler, one of the plaintiffs, and another bill or account which he said was in the handwriting of Lincoln, another plaintiff. The witness then stated as follows: Tiger asked us to make out a bill and send to Bigelow; this was after his return; it must have been four weeks after the sale of the goods; John Bigelow owes Lincoln & Strickler an account; Tiger never paid a dollar on those goods to my knowledge.

Plaintiffs then introduced their book of accounts, showing a bill corresponding with that shown the witness Mahar, amounting to $473.07.

The plaintiffs then rested, and the defendant then introduced the three bills or accounts identified by the witness Mahar, and which were entitled.

“Mr. JOHN BIGELOW,

“Bought of Lincoln & Strickler.”

The first contained an item as follows:

“May 27, 1868. To balance bill, P. Tiger, $273.11.”

Alexander DeLappe testified, that he presented these accounts to John Bigelow for payment some time between Christmas, 1868, and New Year, 1869; I presented them on behalf of Lincoln & Strickler.

The defendant testified as follows: I bought these goods for John Bigelow; I had a conversation with Mahar; the plaintiffs never presented any bill to me for this balance; I never had any conversation in 1868 with Mahar, after the time of buying the goods; I left Denver on the 29th of May, 1868, after the purchase of these goods, and did not return to Denver until the 4th of July following, and was not in Denver at any time between those two dates; I never had communication of any kind with either Mahar or Strickler between those dates; I recollect the amount of the bill of goods bought May 28, 1868, it was $473.11; I took the goods away and delivered them to Bigelow; at the time of buying the goods I paid $200, on account of Bigelow, to Lincoln & Strickler, and Bigelow paid me a part of it back; it was after the serving of the attachment in this cause that I had a conversation with Mahar; Mahar asked me if I would not settle; I am not indebted to the plaintiffs one dollar, either on this or any other bill.

Cross-examination: Bigelow had bought goods before that time; Mahar told me, at the time I spoke to him about buying the goods, that I should wait a day or two until he could see whether Bigelow could have any more goods; he did not tell me if I would pay for these goods he would let me have them; he did not tell me when I came to load up these goods that he did not look to Bigelow for the pay for these goods; he asked me if Bigelow would send the money, and I told him I thought he would; I did not agree to send the money from Pueblo; I was not in business of that kind; Bigelow paid $200 on his account, that I agreed to pay for him.

Re-direct: All the goods were delivered to Bigelow, excepting a few that I delivered to a man on the road, by Bigelow's direction; I never agreed to pay for the goods.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellant.

Mr. L. B. FRANOE, for appellee.

WELLS, J. This was an action of assumpsit, to recover the price of goods sold and delivered by appellees to appellant.

The defendant below pleaded the general issue, and, by agreement of parties, the cause was tried by the court without jury, the issues were found for the plaintiffs, and damages were assessed at $473.11, the full amount claimed, and, after overruling a motion for a new trial, judgment was given upon the finding.

The defendant asserted in the court below, that, in the purchase of these goods, he acted as the agent of one Bigelow, and that the credit was extended to Bigelow, and not to defendant.

We see no error in the rulings of the court below, touching the admissibility of evidence, and the only remaining questions which can be said to be presented by the assignment of errors are, first, whether the finding of the court below is sustained by the evidence; second, whether the damages were correctly assessed.

The first question resolves itself into an inquiry as to the weight of evidence, and we are of the opinion that we ought not to reverse the finding of the probate court, unless manifestly erroneous.-

In determining the relative credit to be given to the testimony of conflicting witnesses, so much consideration is due to the manner and bearing of each under examination, and their apparent intelligence and candor or prejudice, that a court of review, to which all these things are hidden, ought not lightly to reject the opinion of either court or jury, before whom the witnesses of both parties have been subjected to both examination and cross-examination. So the rule stands upon grounds of reason, and authorities in support of it are not wanting. Webster v. Vickers, 2 Scam. 295; Harman v. Thornton, id. 351.

With this rule controlling us, we cannot say that the court below erred in preferring the testimony of the witness Mahar, sworn on the part of the plaintiff, to that of the defendant who testified in his own behalf. These were the only witnesses sworn who, so far as appears, had any knowledge of the transaction at the time of its occurrence. We find no difficulty, however, in justifying the finding of the court below, even though the testimony of the defendant be accepted as a true relation of the transaction.

It is admitted by the defendant that he bought and received the goods to the amount for which the recovery was had ; but it is claimed by his counsel that, in this purchase, he acted on behalf of Bigelow, and as his agent. Upon this point the testimony of the defendant is, and we adopt his own language, "that he bought the goods for John Bigelow, and delivered them to him."

He nowhere states that he was ever authorized by Bigelow to purchase these, or any other goods, on his account, nor whether he delivered these goods to Bigelow as belonging to him, or whether the delivery was in pursuance of a sale by himself. The law is well-settled that, where one is sought to be charged for an act done in pursuance and discharge of an alleged agency, the burden is upon him to show the fact of the agency, and that the transaction upon which the action is based was in pursuance and an ostensible discharge of that agency.

And though we should reject the testimony of Mahar, as to the subsequent declarations of the defendant, that he had sold the goods to Bigelow, and accept the fact of Bigelow's having received the goods as an acknowledgment or ratification of defendant's assumed agency, still this, according to the authorities, would not suffice to bar this action.

It must appear that there was an original appointment subsisting at the time of the transaction. Rossiter v. Rossiter, 8 Wend. 494.

It is said, that, by the testimony of Mahar, it appears that defendant and Bigelow were partners. Even if we accept the statement of the witness, as intended to have reference to this particular transaction, still it cannot, we think, defeat this action. Non-joinder of defendants is never a bar, but only matter in abatement.

We must then, upon this evidence, concur in the finding of the court below, that Tiger was originally liable to the plaintiffs, and, if liable originally, he of course remained so unless discharged by the subsequent act of the plaintiffs.

Upon this point it appears by the testimony of DeLappe, that between Christmas, 1868, and January, 1869, he, acting for the plaintiffs, presented to Bigelow an account, bearing date in June previous, and in which, under date of May 27, is charged balance bill, P. Tiger, $273.11.

It is claimed in argument, as we understand counsel, that hereby it appears that Bigelow and not Tiger was responsible for the balance; but this item seems to us to establish the certainty of this, that is to say, that in the first instance at least credit was extended to Tiger and not to Bigelow, and the plaintiffs, by charging the amounts over to Bigelow, have not released the defendant, unless this change in the accounts was made with intent to release him and upon a consideration.

If Bigelow had agreed to pay the demand, and the plaintiffs had agreed to accept him as their debtor in lieu of the defendant, the arrangement would have been an effectual one; but no act or declaration of a creditor, however express, ought to be accepted as a release of his debtor, or as an acceptance of one in substitution for another, unless the person to be substituted assent to the arrangement, or there be some other consideration for the release or substitution, or unless it be evidenced by writing under seal, so importing consideration. We fail to find in this record any evidence that this change in the accounts was made with intent to discharge the defendant, that Bigelow ever assented thereto, or that there was any other consideration therefor. As to the intent of plaintiffs it rather appears that this item was inserted in Bigelow's account in pursuance of defendant's request, spoken of by Mahar, and out of complacency to defendant, to relieve him of the necessity of collecting from Bigelow. If the intent had been to discharge the defendant, whether Bigelow paid the amount or not, defendant would have been credited with the amount charged to Bigelow; but this does not appear. An account was rendered to Bigelow it is true, with this balance set down therein against him, but whether he assented or objected to this item was not shown. It rested upon the defendant below to establish affirmatively that Bigelow assented to the arrangement.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the probate court did not err in finding this issue for the plaintiff. But in the assessment of damages we think there is error.

The bill of goods sold amounted originally to $473.11. The defendant testifies that he paid plaintiffs at the time of the purchase $200, which, he says, was upon Bigelow's account. In the account rendered to Bigelow, and before adverted to, plaintiffs charge Bigelow with the balance of Tiger's bill, $273.11. It is true this charge is under date of May 27, while the transaction in question appears to have taken place on the 28th; but it does not appear that defendant ever had any other bill with plaintiffs than that for these particular goods. The bill rendered Bigelow is proven to be in the handwriting of one of the plaintiffs, and, from all the circumstances in proof, we are compelled to believe that this charge in the account rendered to Bigelow refers to the identical transaction in controversy, that the $200 paid by Tiger, at the time of the purchase (which, it is true, he testified was paid on account of Bigelow, but which appears, nevertheless, to have been his own money and not Bigelow's, for he testifies that Bigelow repaid him part of it), was credited by plaintiffs to this account.

These deductions seem to us inevitable from the evidence contained in the record, and are fortified by the omission of the plaintiffs to explain in the court below, as they might have done by their own testimony, whatever is doubtful.

For the error in the assessment of damages, therefore, the judgment of the probate court is reversed, and the cause will be remanded to that court, with directions to enter judgment upon its finding for the sum of $273.11.

HIRSCH v. FERRIS.

CONTINUANCE to obtain testimony of absent witness. Where a witness departs from the territory without the knowledge of the party desiring his testimony within a few hours after the commencement of suit, the failure to serve him with subpoena cannot be regarded as negligence.

Where process was served July 10th, and motion for continuance was made 17th August, following, and it was alleged that negotiations for settling the matter in controversy had been carried on in the interval with reasonable hope of success, the cause should have been continued to enable the defendant to take the deposition of an absent witness.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. W. C. KINGSLEY, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. This action was brought to the August term, 1869, of the Arapahoe probate court. Process was served on the 10th day of July. On the 17th day of August, being at the return term, the defendant, having pleaded, applied for a continuance, which application was overruled. A trial was afterward had on that same day, and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

The refusal of the application for continuance is the only matter assigned for error.

The ground of continuance set forth in the affidavit was the absence of a material witness; the facts set forth as to be proved by this witness appear to us to be material, and it seems to be admitted by counsel that they are so. The only remaining question is, whether diligence had been used to secure the attendance of the witness.

Upon this point the affidavit sets forth that the absent witness was then, and at the commencement of the suit, a resident of Cheyenne, in the territory of Wyoming; that from the time of the commencement of the suit defendant had been endeavoring to secure a settlement of the matter in controversy, and had hoped and expected to succeed in these efforts until within three secular days next preceding the making of the affidavit, when he learned for the first time, definitely, that an adjustment of the controversy was impossible; that the witness named left the territory to go to Cheyenne within a few hours after the commencement of the action and had never returned, and that he departed without defendant's knowledge, and while defendant was endeavoring to secure a settlement with the plaintiff, and still reasonably supposed that such settlement would be effected.

We think that considering the short period which had elapsed between the commencement of the suit and the departure of the witness, and that such departure was without defendant's knowledge, the failure to serve him with subpoena cannot fairly be said to be negligence.

Nor do we think that for the omission to secure the deposition of the witness the application should have been denied.

But a little more than one month had elapsed between the service of summons and the application; it is true the deposition might, for any thing we can see, have been obtained within that time; but this would have been an exercise of the highest degree of diligence, and this at the first term, especially in a court holding its sittings upon every alternate month.

For this error the judgment of the probate court will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

SHIPTON et al., Trustees, etc., v. NORRIS.

REPLEVIN may be maintained by trustees of chattels. Trustees of chattels, having the legal estate therein, may maintain an action at law for any injury done to or in respect to the chattels, which are the subject of the trust.

A declaration in replevin, in which the plaintiffs describe themselves as "Trustees of the Colored Zion Baptist Church of Denver, who sue for the use and benefit of said church," is good.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

THE plaintiffs brought replevin to recover a melodeon, describing themselves in the writ and declaration as "Trustees of the Colored Zion Baptist Church of Denver." A general demurrer to the declaration was sustained in the court below.

MESSRS. BROWNE, HARRISON & PUTNAM, for plaintiffs in error.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiffs' declaration. If the goods in controversy were the goods of the plaintiffs, and the defendant took them, both which facts are distinctly averred, the plaintiffs may maintain this action, whether their title is an absolute or fiduciary one, or whether, if fiduciary, their cestui que trust is a corporation or a mere voluntary association.

There may exist a trust in chattels as well as in real estate; and if such trust be created for the benefit of a single individual or a corporation, or an association of persons not incorporated, the trustee having the legal estate is, in either case, the proper party plaintiff to an action at law for any injury done to, or in respect to, the chattels which are the subject of the trust. And he need not, in his declaration, set forth how the trust was created or his title accrued, any more than one suing absolutely in his own right. It is sufficient to aver the fact of his property and the injury.

If, upon the trial of this cause, it should appear that the plaintiffs, notwithstanding their trusteeship, had not the property in the goods in controversy, then, indeed, another question will be presented; but, for the present, the property is admitted by the demurrer, and the declaration is clearly sufficient.

The judgment of the probate court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court for further proceedings, in conformity with this opinion.

Mr. H. R. HUNT, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. In this action the defendant was served with process to the August term, 1869, of the court below.

On the first day of that term he appeared and applied for a continuance upon affidavit of the absence of a material witness. The probate court declined to entertain or determine this motion, and immediately gave judgment against the defendant for want of a plea.

This was clearly erroneous. Whether the court could proceed to such judgment without disposing of the motion or not, upon which we express no opinion, we think the defendant was entitled to the whole of the first day of the term in which to plead. A judgment for default of appearance could not have been given upon that day; and we think the defendant was entitled to the same period of time, both to appear and put in his plea.

These two things he was required by the process to do upon that day, and he was entitled to the whole day to comply with the mandate of the writ.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION by increasing amount of ad damnum. After trial and verdict in a cause, the court may, upon setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, allow the plaintiff to amend the declaration by increasing the amount of the ad damnum.

PRACTICE—defendant's right to plead de novo after amendment. In such case, in the absence of any showing as to the necessity for making a new defense after the amendment, the granting or refusing leave to plead anew was in the discretion of the court, of which appellants cannot complain in this court.

APPEARANCE—effect of withdrawal upon issues. If a defendant who has joined issue in a cause, with leave of the court, withdraw his appearance, the issue on his part falls to the ground and judgment of default should be entered against him.

PRACTICE—default must precede final judgment. It is irregular to proceed to final judgment against defendants served with process, without entering judgment of default.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

ASSUMPSIT on a promissory note by Ida Martin against Parker B. Cheney, Wm. N. Shephard and Jno. Good.

Good pleaded the general issue, upon which there was a trial and verdict for plaintiff, which was set aside by the court. Afterward the court allowed the plaintiff to amend the precipe writ and narr., by increasing the amount of damages, and thereupon Good asked leave to plead to the declaration as amended, which was refused by the court.

By leave of the court, Good's attorney then withdrew his appearance, and the court proceeded to try the issue which had been joined upon Good's plea, and to assess damages against Cheney and Shephard.

Judgment of default was not entered against any of the parties.

Mr. E. L. SMITH, for appellants.

Messrs. BROWNE, HARRISON & PUTNAM, for appellee.

HALLERT, C. J. We do not think it necessary to discuss at very great length the numerous questions of practice presented in this record. The motion to suppress the deposition of Atkins was founded upon objections to some of the answers to cross-interrogatories, and was therefore too broad. While the court below might have considered the exceptions to the answers named, we do not see that there was error in refusing to suppress the entire deposition. The amendment of the ad damnum in the declaration, for which leave was obtained, does not appear to have been made, and perhaps we could with propriety pass over that question. But we do not feel at liberty to do so, inasmuch as the parties have dealt with the case as if the amendment had been made, and by passing upon the question now we may facilitate the proceedings in the case, which have been greatly protracted. The power of courts to allow pleadings to be amended is pretty well established, and certainly cannot be denied at this day. Stephen's Pl. 75; Graham's Pr. 654.

It is certainly good practice to give notice of the application for leave to amend, especially when the amendment is of substance, and generally courts should require such notice to be given before the application is entertained. But we are not required to consider whether the omission to give notice in this case would have affected the order made, for it does not appear that there was any such omission. It is true that appellant's attorney makes oath that he was not notified of the intended application, but his clients may have been served with notice, and we must indulge every presumption in support of the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction.

Authorities to support the action of the court below in allowing the ad damnum to be increased are not wanting. Tomlinson v. Blacksmith, 7 T. R. 132; Brown et al. v. Smith et al., 24 Ill. 196; Dox et al. v. Dey, 3 Wend. 357.

In these cases the amendment was after verdict upon payment of costs and granting a new trial, and it is to be observed that these were the only conditions imposed. It does not appear, however, that the defendants demanded greater privileges than were given; and therefore, while these cases show that the court has power to allow the amendment, they are not conclusive upon the right of the defendant to plead de novo after the amendment. We do not doubt that in many cases a defendant may rightfully claim the privilege of pleading anew to an amended declaration, and the refusal of such demand would be cause for reversal. If a new cause of action or substantive fact should be added to the declaration by amendment, the right of the defendant to meet the new case with a new defense would seem to be unquestionable. In this case, however, the amendment introduced no new fact into the declaration. The facts upon which appellant's liability was founded were set out in the declaration as originally framed, and appellee did nothing more than to increase the amount of her demand upon those facts. Appellants were as well informed of the nature of the action against them before the amendment as afterward, and it is difficult to see upon what ground the claim to change the defense, after the amendment, can rest. At all events, in the absence of any showing as to the necessity for making a new defense after the amendment, the granting or refusing leave to plead anew was in the discretion of the court below, of which appellants cannot complain in this court.

After the withdrawal of appearance by the attorney for Good, the issue made by him was tried by a jury and the damages were assessed against Cheney and Shephard, no judgment of default having been taken against any of them. In this we think there was error. Upon withdrawal of Good's appearance, the issue on his part fell to the ground, there being no one in court to maintain it, and judgment of default should have been entered against him. Coffin v. Evansville & Crawfordsville R. R. Co., 7 Ind. 413.

So, also, it was irregular to proceed to final judgment against Cheney and Shephard without entering their default. Crabtree v. Green, 36 Ill. 278.

Through the failure to enter judgment of default against appellants, their right to plead to the action was not determined during the whole course of the proceedings, and therefore, upon the motion made by them, the judgment should have been set aside with leave to appellants to plead.

The judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause is re-

Reversed.

DEFAULT MUST PRECEDE FINAL JUDGMENT.—There being no appearance by one of defendants, it is error to enter final judgment against all, without first entering judgment of default against him: Streeter v. Marshall & Mfg. Co., 4 Colo. 640.

KLOPPER v. KELLER, Administrator.

LEGISLATIVE POWER—authority of district courts to appoint special terms.

The statute (ch. 35, sec. 9, Revised Statutes, 267) which confers authority upon district courts to appoint special terms of such courts is valid.

UNLAWFUL DETAINER before justices of the peace—question of title. In an action of unlawful detainer against a tenant holding over, brought before a justice of the peace, the effect of raising the question of title is to remove the cause to another court, and not to defeat it altogether.

PLEADING AND PROOF—in unlawful detainer. The rule which requires that the proof shall support the allegation is as applicable to the action of unlawful detainer as to any other.

EVIDENCE—to disprove plaintiff's case. In an action of unlawful detainer against a tenant holding over, for the purpose of disproving the tenancy, the defendant may show that he entered as a purchaser and not as a tenant, and this whether the agreement to purchase was good or bad.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

UNLAWFUL detainer against appellant to recover the possession of certain premises alleged to have been let to him for one month, which term had expired.

Mr. E. L. SMITH, for appellant.

Mr. L. B. FRANOE, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. At the threshold of this case we encounter the objection that the proceedings in the court below were coram non judice, having taken place at a special term. The point arises upon the validity of the statute authorizing district courts to appoint special terms of the same court, there being no question in this case as to the manner in which the power was executed. It is within our knowledge that many special terms of court have been held under this statute, and important questions have been determined in them, which, if now disturbed, will occasion much embarrassment, and we have attempted to give the subject such consideration as its importance demands.

In 1856 (11 Stat. 49), congress empowered the justices of the supreme court, in each of the territories, to appoint the times and places of holding courts in the several districts of their territory, and, provided, that courts should be held at but one place in each district. In 1858 (11 Stat. 366), this statute was so far enlarged as to admit courts to be held at the expense of the territory in the several counties in each district. In 1861 the act organizing this territory was passed, which provided: "The said territory shall be divided into three judicial districts and a district court shall be held in each of said districts, by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such time and place as may be provided by law."

The use of the singular instead of the plural number in this clause of the act was, doubtless, through inadvertency, as, in view of the previous legislation of congress to which reference has been made, it is hardly probable that congress intended to limit the number of courts in each district to one. But this act confers upon the legislative assembly power to prescribe the times and places of holding courts, and being inconsistent with the act of 1856, renders the latter act inapplicable to this territory. The power of the legislative assembly to prescribe the times and places of holding courts is conceded, but whether that power is properly exercised in conferring upon the courts authority to appoint terms is a question upon which doubts have arisen.

In Harriman v. The State, 2 G. Greene, 270, this question came before the supreme court of Iowa upon a statute passed by the legislative assembly of Iowa territory, under a provision of the organic act of that territory, similar to our own. In that case the court say: "Finally it is objected that the legislature of the territory had no right, under the ninth section of the organic law, to pass an act authorizing the judges to hold such special terms of the district court, as they were by said section to be held at such times and places as might be prescribed by law. Strictly viewing this clause, it may very plausibly be assumed that the courts may be held at such times only as the appropriate law might fix upon and designate. The application of this principle might safely be admitted so far as the regular terms of the courts are concerned; and this concession would not, in the least, militate against the power of the legislature to authorize the judges to hold special or extra terms of their courts whenever, in their opinion, occasion might require. This would be a rightful subject of legislation within the meaning of the organic law and within the province of the legislative assembly."

In the State of Illinois the constitution of 1818 provided that circuit courts should be held at the times prescribed by law, and with this provision in force the legislature authorized such courts to appoint special terms. The constitutionality of the law does not appear to have been brought in question, although the act was before the supreme court of that State upon other points. Archer v. Ross, 2 Scam. 308.

We find, from an examination of the reports of other States (1 Blackf. 428; 17 Mo. 64; 16 Cal. 186; 3 Wis. 443), that such acts are not uncommon in this country, and the constitutional power of the legislature to pass them is so generally accepted by the profession that it has not been questioned.

Therefore, upon authority, we believe that the question is at rest, and we are not disposed to seek for a new construction which may divest established rights.

A motion was made in the court below to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction in the justice of the peace before whom the suit was originally commenced. It is claimed that an affidavit was filed under the ninth section of the act before the justice of the peace, in which it was asserted that the title to the property described in the complaint was in dispute between the parties. Although such an affidavit was read in the district court, it does not appear that it was ever presented to the justice of the peace. And if it had been so presented, and the justice had refused to act upon it, it is difficult to see upon what ground the dismissal of the cause would result from it. The effect of raising the question of title before a justice of the peace is to remove the cause to another court, and not to defeat it altogether. It is not necessary to point out the various cases in which an action may be maintained under the statute relating to forcible entry and detainer. It is sufficient to say that this action was founded upon section 5 of the act, which relates to cases of tenancy. It is alleged in the complaint, that the premises in controversy were let to appellant for the term of one month, which term had expired, and that appellant refused to surrender the possession upon demand made in writing therefor. This is according to section 11 of the act, which requires that the substantial facts, upon which the plaintiff relies, shall be set out in the complaint. The office of pleading is the same in this action as in every other, and the rule which requires that the proof shall coincide with the allegations is as applicable to this as to any other action. To allow a plaintiff to allege one thing and prove another would be an anomaly in the law, and most mischievous in its consequences. If then the plaintiff must prove his case, as laid in the complaint, it follows that evidence tending to disprove the facts stated in the complaint is admissible on the part of the defendant, although such evidence might also tend to prove another case upon which the plaintiff might, if he had so declared, maintain his action. Upon the trial in the court below, appellant introduced evidence to show that he went into the possession of the premises in controversy as a purchaser. This evidence the court afterward excluded from the consideration of the jury upon the ground, as stated by counsel, that the agreement to purchase was not valid under the statute of frauds. Now the question before the jury was as to the existence of the tenancy set out in the complaint, and whether appellant was holding over after the expiration of his term, and if the agreement between the parties was to purchase and not to let the premises, it can make no difference whether the agreement was void or valid. The object of showing that appellant entered under an agreement to purchase was to disprove the tenancy, and the negative effect of such evidence would be the same whether the agreement was good or bad.

We think that there was error in excluding this testimony from the consideration of the jury, for which the judgment must be reversed with costs and the cause remanded. Reversed.

PHELPS v. SPRUANOE.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT to issue process to foreign county. Under section 2 of the practice act (Rev. Stat. 500), a probate court may issue process to a foreign county.

PRACTICE — variance, how reached. A variance between the writ and declaration cannot be reached by demurrer. It is matter for plea in abatement.

PRACTICE — amended bill of particulars. If the plaintiff file a bill of particulars with his declaration, and the defendant make no objection to such bill, and the plaintiff afterward, and within ten days of the second term, file a more specific bill of particulars, the defendant cannot obtain a continuance at the second term, because of the filing of such amended bill.

VERDICT — what will be sufficient. A verdict which answers all the issues is sufficient.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — in trial to the court without a jury. If a cause is tried to the court without a jury, exception must be taken to the judgment of the court, if the party aggrieved wishes to have it reviewed in this court.

In such case a motion for new trial is unnecessary, but the exception to the judgment of the court is indispensable, if that judgment is to be reviewed here.

Error to Probate Court, Clear Creek County.

Mr. Justice WELLS, having been of counsel, did not sit in this cause.

Mr. GEO. W. PURKINS, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. T. WELLS, for defendant in error.

HALLETT, C. J. The power of the probate court to issue process to a foreign county, under section two of the practice act, has been considered by us at this term in the case of Cody v. Raynaud, and, according to the views there expressed, the probate court had jurisdiction in this case. Variance between the writ and declaration cannot be reached by demurrer. It is matter for plea in abatement. Duvall v. Craig, 2 Wheat. 45.

No objection was made by plaintiff in error to the account filed with the declaration, but, at the second term of the court, he moved to continue, upon the ground that defendant in error had voluntarily filed a more specific bill of particulars within ten days of the term. If a defendant is dissatisfied with the account filed with the declaration, the practice is to move the court for a rule upon the plaintiff to furnish a more specific bill, and, when the new bill comes in, if it differs materially from that first filed, the court will continue the cause upon the application of the defendant. In this case plaintiff in error, who was defendant below, did not ask for a more specific bill of particulars, and defendant in error was under no obligation to file any; therefore no question can be raised in this court in respect to it.

The general issue was pleaded, and also another plea, in which it was alleged that the promises in the declaration mentioned were made by the Phelps & Gillimore Mining Company, and not by the defendants, and that defendants were not partners or joint-contractors, etc. Issue was joined upon these pleas, and, upon trial thereof, the court found that plaintiff in error "did assume and promise, in manner and form, as the said William Spruance hath complained against him." And this, it is said, is not an answer to the issue upon the second plea; but we are of another opinion, for the second plea is, at best, only a repetition of the first. If the finding is true the plea is untrue; for, if plaintiff in error promised in manner and form as alleged in the declaration, he did promise jointly with Gillimore, and it is his promise and not the promise of the mining company. The finding certainly comprehends all that was in issue, and no more is attainable in any form of verdict.

It is also urged that excessive damages were allowed, and this would be a question of some difficulty if it were properly before us. But the question is not presented in the way provided by the law, as we shall endeavor to show. This was a trial by the court without a jury, a proceeding unknown to the common law, and, by the rules of the common law, the decision or finding of the court upon the testimony is not subject to review in another tribunal. Campbell v. Boyreau, 21 How. 226.

But section 22 of our practice act has wrought a change in the common law, as follows:

SEC. 22. "Exceptions taken to opinions and decisions of the district courts, upon the trial of causes, in which the parties agree that both matters of law and fact may be tried by the court, and, in appeal cases, tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, shall be deemed and held to have been properly taken and allowed; and the party excepting may assign for error, before the supreme court, any decision or opinion so excepted to, whether such exception relates to receiving improper or rejecting proper testimony, or to the final judgment of the court upon the law and evidence."

When we consider that the power to review the finding of the court below upon the testimony is derived entirely from this statute, it is not difficult to understand that an exception to the ruling of the court is necessary to give us jurisdiction. In cases of this kind the aggrieved party may except to the decision of the court, and may assign for error the decision so excepted to. But if he fails to except in this, as in every other case in which an exception is necessary, he cannot seek relief in an appellate court. And this is in perfect harmony with the practice which obtains in cases tried by jury. In such cases the party aggrieved must move for new trial, and except to the ruling of the court upon the motion. In cases tried by the court, the motion for new trial may be dispensed with, but the exception to the judgment of the court is indispensable if that judgment is to be reviewed in this court. As in such cases, the court determines both the law and the fact; if an exception were not necessary, it would be a departure from all analogous rules of practice.

There was a motion in arrest of judgment, but it presented only those questions to which we have adverted, and it is not necessary to notice it particularly. Upon this review we have not found error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed with costs.

Affirmed.

DOANE et al. v. GLENN et al.

JUDGMENT — what is final. A judgment in favor of interpleading claimants in an attachment suit is final, and the plaintiff in attachment may prosecute a writ of error to reverse such judgment.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

UPON motion to dismiss the writ of error.

MESSRS. FRANCE & ROGERS, in support of the motion.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, contra.

BELFORD, J. At the December term of the Arapahoe district court, for the year 1870, the plaintiffs in error caused to be sued out of the clerk's office of said court a writ of attachment against Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey, which writ was duly levied on seven hundred head of cattle, alleged to be owned by the defendants in the attachment suit. At the same term of court, Lockhart T. Glenn and George O. Talpey appeared as interpleading claimants under section 21 of the attachment act, alleging that they were the owners of the property theretofore attached, and demanding restitution of the same. Issues were joined, a trial had, a verdict rendered in favor of the interpleading claimants. Motion for new trial overruled and judgment entered on the verdict. From this judgment Doane & Co. have prosecuted a writ of error, and the interpleading claimants having made a motion to dismiss the same, the only subject for present consideration is, does a writ of error lie to a judgment in favor of these claimants, or in other words, is it such a final judgment as can be brought to this court for review.

The authorities all concur in holding that, to authorize a writ of error, it is necessary that there should be a final judgment or determination upon the matter in controversy in the inferior court, and it is never employed merely to bring up interlocutory decisions or discretionary orders made pending the litigation. Usually, this writ, being a common-law writ, is directed only to courts proceeding after the course of the common law. In the cases of For-gay v. Conrad, 6 How. 201, and Beebee v. Russell, 19 id. 283, it is said: When a decree decides the right to property and directs it to be delivered up or sold, and the complainant is entitled to have such decree carried into immediate execution, it is a final decree. The judgment below is in the following form: * * * "Therefore, all and singular, the premises being seen, and by the court here fully understood, it is considered by the court, that the property taken by virtue of the writ of attachment in this cause be delivered up to the said Lockhart T. Glenn and George O. Talpey, and that a writ of retorno habendo be awarded and issued therefor; and it is further considered by the court, that the said interpleading claimants do have and recover, of and from the said plaintiffs, their costs, by them in and about this said suit, in this behalf, laid out and expended, taxed at , and have execution therefor."

This, most clearly, is a complete determination of the rights of the attaching plaintiffs and interpleading claimants.

This judgment would be a bar, in behalf of the latter against any further suits instituted by the former parties. It operates as a release to the attachment lien and leaves the claimants at liberty to take the property when and whithersoever they please. It established their title to the cattle, not only against the attaching plaintiffs but against the attaching defendants, for no court would permit or suffer the defendants in the original suit to assert ownership after standing by, and without interposing any objection or supplying any evidence, allow a third party to make proof of title to the property in litigation, which would result in the ruin of the rights of the attaching plaintiffs.

The rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States is, that when a decree decides the right to property and directs it to be delivered up, it is a final decree, and does not the judgment or decree above set forth come clearly within it?

What remains to be done by the claimants?—nothing, but await delivery. The power of the court in the premises is at an end. The issues formed by the parties have received a judicial determination, that is final, so far as the district court can make a finality, and the judgment so entered must stand as the unquestionable and unassailable evidence of the claimant's right to the property adjudicated, until reversed or set aside by a superior tribunal.

No principle can be more just than the one that asserts that all proceedings of inferior courts, which conclusively affect the rights or property of persons, ought to be subject to the revision or correction of a higher tribunal. Blackstone says: "A judgment is the sentence of the law pronounced by the court on the matter contained in the record." Did not the court pronounce the sentence of the law in the matter before it, and contained in the record made by the parties? Coke says: "A writ of error does not lie, without a judgment or an award in the nature of a judgment." Is not the order of the court below, that the attachment lien be set aside and the property delivered up to the claimants, an award in the nature of a judgment? It was final, as it respected the district court, for it did all it could do in the case.

If we are to be governed by the words which Coke lays down as a test of what is a final judgment, namely, "ideo consideratum est," then we must regard this as a final judgment.

Tidd, in his excellent work on Practice, volume 2, page 1134, says: "A writ of error is an original writ, and lies when a party is aggrieved by an error in the foundation, proceeding, judgment or execution of a suit in a court of record. And whenever a new jurisdiction is erected by act of parliament, and the court or judge that exercise this jurisdiction act as a court or judge of record according to the course of the common law, a writ of error lies on that judgment; but when they act in a summary way, or in a new course different from the common law, then writ of error lies not, but a certiorari."

In Bacon's Abridgment, volume 3, page 330, the doctrine is laid down as follows: "Where the primary tribunal is a court of record, a writ of error is the proper process for the removal of the proceedings when they were according to the course of the common law in the first instance, or have assumed a common-law shape subsequently; but when they are summary, or the magistrate is not the judge of a court of record, the remedy is by certiorari." In the case of Huse v. Grimes, 2 N. H. 210, the court say: "A writ of error is grantable ex debito justicie; it is a matter of right, and lies in all cases where the court, whose proceedings are complained of, acts as a court of record according to the course of the common law."

"A certiorari is said to lie in all cases where a writ of error does not. As it respects individuals, it issues ex mero gratia on petition. It lies to remove indictments from inferior jurisdictions to the court of king's bench for trial; also, to reverse the doings of inferior jurisdictions, whose powers are given them by statute, whose mode of proceeding is unknown to the common law, and who render their doings effectual not by a judgment technically called, but by orders to be executed in a summary way, such as orders for laying out of highways and removal of paupers." While the right to file an interplea in the method pursued below is derived from the statute, yet the statute does not point out the mode of trial or the nature of the judgment to be rendered; these are both governed by the common law. The issues are joined, trial by jury had, verdict pronounced and judgment awarded. The court is a court of record, and its proceedings are all in accordance with the common law. Taking the distinction between a writ of error and a certiorari laid down by the New Hampshire court to be a true one, into which class of cases therein named does the one at bar necessarily fall? Here was a judgment rendered in a court of record proceeding according to the course of the common law. The judg ment was a common-law judgment, and not an order to carry into effect certain proceedings in a summary way. This case then has all the requisites to be the foundation of a writ of error. The other points mentioned by counsel for defendants will be decided when properly brought before us.

The motion to dismiss the writ of error must be denied.

Motion denied.

PEDDIE v. DONNELLY.

PLEADING — variance may be alleged under non est factum. In debt on a promissory note, the defendant may take advantage of a misdescription of the note under the plea of non est factum.

PLEADING — variance in description of note. In an action against two it was alleged "that the defendants made their note, the said Abram D. Bevan by the name and style of A. D. Bevan," and the note was signed by A. D. Bevan and his co-defendant. Held, that there was no variance, and there was no ground of demurrer to the declaration.

PLEADING — contemporaneous agreement as defense to a note. In an action on a promissory note if the defendant sets up a contemporaneous agreement modifying the note, he must allege in his plea that the agreement was in writing.

Error to Probate Court, Jefferson County.

THE first plea of defendant Peddie was non est factum verified by the oath of the defendant. In his second plea defendant Peddie alleged that the action was brought on the note described in the declaration only, and that the note was given by defendant Bevan and himself for money borrowed by Bevan to enable him to go to St. Louis, to sell mining property belonging to the plaintiff, and that it was agreed, between plaintiff, Bevan and himself, at the time the money was borrowed, that the same should be repaid out of the proceeds of the sale of the said mining property, and that said sum of money should not be repaid until Bevan sold the property, which event had not occurred.

It was not alleged that this agreement was in writing.
The promissory note given in evidence was as follows :

"BRECKENRIDGE, 1868.

"Colorado Terry, Oct. 3.

"Four months after date we, or either of us, promise to pay to Charles Donnelly, or order, the sum of ($300) three hundred dollars lawful money, for value received, with interest at the rate of three per cent per month until paid.

"A. D. BEVAN. [L. s.]

"ANDREW PEDDIE." [L. s.]

The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. GEORGE W. PURKINS, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. MILLER & MARKHAM, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. We agree with counsel for the plaintiff in error, that the plea of non est factum was sufficient to give advantage of any variance between the obligation counted upon and the allegations descriptive thereof, but we are not able to agree that the alleged variance exists in this case. The count avers that "the defendants heretofore, to wit, on, etc., at, etc., the said Abram D. Bevan, by the name and style of A. D. Bevan, made their certain writing obligatory," and out of the words "the said Abram D. Bevan, by the name and style of A. D. Bevan," it is argued the variance arises ; for it is said hereby it appears that the obligation was on its face the deed of Bevan only, whereas that offered in evidence was subscribed and sealed by both the defendants. It appears to us, however, that the words of the declaration last quoted are to be read as if written in parenthesis, importing description of the manner in which the defendant Bevan executed the writing, and not as contradicting what is also alleged, "that the defendants made their writing obligatory."

And this disposes of the objection that the demurrer to the special plea, interposed in the court below, should have been sustained to the first count of the declaration. There was no substantial defect in that count to which the demurrer could have been extended. The only question remaining is, as to the sufficiency of the special plea.

If this were a new question we might be inclined to doubt whether the language of the plea ought not to be construed as importing that the supplemental undertaking, upon which the defendant relies, was, as the law requires, in order that it should be effectual, in writing; for, though it appears to be well settled that a promise in writing, absolute, may not, by parol, be turned into a promise upon condition (Hoare v. Graham, 3 Camp. 57; Nausen v. Walker, 1 Stark. 361; Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92; Woodbridge v. Spooner, 3 Barn. & Ald. 283; Mosely v. Robinson, 10 B. & C. 729; Brown v. Langley, 4 M. & Gr. 473), yet this seems to be rather a rule of evidence than of pleading, and the defendant having set forth an agreement which, if established, will bar the plaintiff of his present action, it would seem that this ought to suffice, although he has not shown by what manner of evidence he will sustain his plea.

Nevertheless, it has uniformly been held, so far as the authorities have come to our notice, that, if plaintiff count upon a writing, and the plea show an agreement contemporaneous and modifying its terms, it must show that this agreement also was in writing. Mease, Executor, v. Mease, 1 Cowp. 47; Wells v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 46; Miller v. Wells, 46 Ill. 49. And, if it fail in this, plaintiff may demur generally.

The judgment of the probate court is, therefore, affirmed.

Affirmed.

NACHTRIEB v. STONER.

NEW TRIAL—damages in trespass de bonis. Where it appears that the defendant procured an inferior court to issue an attachment in a case not warranted by law, and to give judgment upon constructive service for a fictitious demand, and sell property of plaintiff of the value of $300, a verdict of $750 damages is not excessive.

POSSESSION in trespass de bonis. In trespass de bonis the plaintiff must show, that at the time of the alleged trespass he was in possession of the property, or that he had the right to the possession, and an outstanding possession in a third person, with the right to retain it until the payment of indebtedness or the happening of some other event will defeat the plaintiff's action.

POSSESSION OF PLEDGEE extinguished by payment. Where the plaintiff pledged property to a third party to secure certain indebtedness, due from him to such party, and the defendant, in order to levy a writ of attachment upon the property, paid to the pledgee the amount due him from the plaintiff, when such payment was made the right of possession reverted to the plaintiff, and he may maintain trespass for the property.

POSSESSION OF PLEDGEE determined by setting up adverse title. In such case the defendant, having set up a title inconsistent with the lien, cannot claim to have acquired the pledgee's right of possession, and hold under the lien.

TRESPASS—justification under process of inferior court. Whoever justifies or asserts any right under the sentence or judgment of a court of inferior jurisdiction ought to be required to show the substantial regularity of its proceedings at every step.

ATTACHMENT WRIT — which recites no cause, is irregular. That the defendants reside out of the county is no ground for issuing an attachment, and a writ, in which this is recited as the cause of attachment, is irregular on its face.

TRESPASS against plaintiff in attachment — when proceedings irregular. Where the proceeding was before a justice of the peace, the cause of attachment set out in the affidavit was insufficient, and it was stated in the writ that the defendants reside out of the county; the plaintiff who procured the writ, the justice of the peace who issued it, and the officer who executed it, are liable to the defendants in trespass.

The affidavit being defective*, the rule is not affected by the power of amendment given by statute, for the court does not know that the facts exist upon which a proper affidavit may be made.

If the affidavit had been sufficient and the writ had falsely recited it, the court might incline to a different opinion.

Error to Probate Court, Lake County

THE record of the court below consisted of certified copies of the papers filed in that court, together with some informal minutes of the proceedings of the court.

The judgment was in the following form: "Thereupon, judgment is entered in favor of the plaintiff, William Stoner, and against the defendant, Charles Nachtrieb; that the said plaintiff have and recover of the said defendant the sum of $750, being the damages assessed by the jury in said case, with costs.”

At the trial the plaintiff gave in evidence that defendant, on the 10th day of November, A. D. 1870, filed an affidavit and bond with George B. Berry, a justice of the peace of Lake county, and that Berry thereupon issued a writ of attachment against the plaintiff, William Stoner, and one Thomas Murphy, which writ was levied on the two mares described in the declaration, and was returned without personal service on Stoner or Murphy; that the cause was continued by the justice at the return day of the writ, and notices were posted as directed by the statute; that, upon the adjourned day, said justice of the peace gave judgment against Stoner and Murphy, and in favor of Nachtrieb, for $300 and costs of suit; that the two mares were sold under said judgment to one George Holger, who was requested to purchase them by Nachtrieb. The plaintiff was sworn, and testified that he purchased the mares of Murphy, on the 1st of October, 1870; that at that time one of the mares was in charge of John Burnett, and we directed him to take charge of the other one; that Burnett had charges against Murphy of $15, and there was an understanding that Burnett was to keep the mare till he got his pay; that the mares were worth $300; that he did not hear of the suit of Nachtrieb against Stoner and Murphy, until about the first of April; that witness did not, nor did witness and Murphy owe Nachtrieb any thing at the time of the commencement of the suit before Berry. Thomas Murphy testified to substantially the same facts.

John Burnett testified that he delivered one of the mares to the constable on payment of his charges, which amounted to $15. The plaintiff also put in evidence the affidavit and bond, filed with the justice of the peace, and also the writ of attachment issued by him. In the affidavit it was alleged: “That Thomas Murphy and William Stoner have departed for the purpose of defrauding their creditors, and are about to remove their property to his, the said Charles Nathrop’s, disadvantage and loss, with the intent of placing it beyond the reach of their creditors." The bond was made to the constable as obligee therein. Plaintiff also gave in evidence a transcript of the docket of the justice of the peace in the case of Nachtrieb v. Stoner and Murphy.

In the writ of attachment the cause recited for the issuing thereof was, "that Thomas Murphy and William Stoner reside out of the county." The defendant gave in evidence that Murphy and Stoner bought a ranche of him for $300, and that the amount was still unpaid; that he commenced suit before the justice of the peace in good faith, and that the mares were worth $240.

The court refused to instruct the jury: "That if any person had a lien upon the property named in the plaintiff's declaration, by which any sum of money was to be paid by the plaintiff before he could reduce the same into his possession, they should find for the defendant."

Upon request of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury: "That by his record, as appears in evidence, the magistrate had no jurisdiction which would justify the seizure of any property of William Stoner, and if the jury believed, from the evidence, that the horses in question were seized in that suit under the affidavit, writ and bond referred to, it does not amount to a justification, and the jury should find for the plaintiff." There were other instructions which it is not necessary to refer to.

Mr. M. BENEDICT, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. HUGHES & MORRISON, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. The record, which has been certified to us, contains many gross irregularities, and the original appears to have been made up without the slightest knowledge of what matters the record of a court ought or ought not to contain. Nevertheless, sufficient appears to show that the judgment complained of was given at a term of the probate court, convened, constituted and held in accordance with law. The objections urged on the part of the plaintiffs in error in this respect are therefore not well taken.

Neither are we disposed to interfere with the judgment in respect of the damages awarded by the jury. The plaintiff in the court below complained in effect, that the defendant had procured an inferior court to issue an attachment against the plaintiff's estate in a case where such process was unwarranted by law, and to give judgment and direct a sale of the estate upon mere constructive notice of the proceeding, he being then a resident of the territory, and entitled to actual notice by service of process; that by virtue of the sale so ordered, the defendant had possessed himself of, and converted to his own use, property of the plaintiff to the value of several hundred dollars, and that all this was done in the prosecution of a pretended claim of indebtedness which never existed. The jury have found that the facts are as asserted by the plaintiff; the evidence warrants the finding, and, as we think, makes a strong case for the award of punitive damages, and the amount allowed by the jury does not seem to us to be excessive.

The circumstance, that before the alleged trespass a portion of the property was in the possession of a third person who had a special property therein by way of lien or pledge, does not, as we think, have the effect to defeat the plaintiff's action or modify the rule of damages. True, it is, in general, that in trespass de bonis the plaintiff must show, that at the time of the trespass complained of he had actual possession of the goods, or had property therein, either general or at least special, with the right to the immediate possession, and an outstanding possession in a third person, with the right in such person to retain it until the discharge of an indebtedness or the happening of some other condition might, with reason, be said to disable the general owner from bringing trespass. Gauche v. Mayer, 27 Ill. 134; Thorpe v. Burling, 11 Johns. 285; Gay v. Smith, 38 N. H. 171.

For in such case the interest of the general owner is merely reversionary and not present, and for an injury to such interest case lies but not trespass. But, in the present case, the demand for which the goods had been held in pledge was paid off by the plaintiff in the attachment, now plaintiff in error, before the levy, which involves the trespass complained of, and we think this, by construction of law, restored the general owner to his possession, for, though the pledgee of goods may clearly enough transfer possession thereof to another, as his servant or bailee, without waiver of his lien, and though, as we conceive, any third person may advance to the pledgee his demand, receiving possession of the goods as his security, and may lawfully retain such possession until repaid his advances, yet the authorities appear to be uniform, that if the pledgee or lienholder set up any title or claim inconsistent with or independent of the lien, this will amount to a waiver thereof. 3 Pars. on Cont. 244.

Therefore, inasmuch as the possession of the constable who levied the attachment complained of was from the beginning independent of and hostile to the lien by which the property had before been held — the very purpose for which the money was advanced to the pledgee being to enable the officer to proceed with the property in a manner inconsistent with the lien — it cannot be said that this incumbrance or special property followed the goods into the custody of the constable. On the contrary, by the payment of the amount for which the goods had before been held, the lien was dissolved and the right to the immediate possession was eo instanti restored to the general owner.

There remains to be considered the question to which the argument was chiefly directed, whether the plaintiff's action was rightly conceived, that is to say, whether trespass lies here or case. Upon this question we are not without authority, though it is to be regretted that the authorities are not in strict accord. It appears to be well settled, that if an inferior court assume to extend its process to a case wherein it is not warranted by law, both the magistrate and the party who instigates the unlawful proceeding are liable in trespass, and that although the cause or matter be within the jurisdiction of the court or magistrate in general, yet if there be some prerequisite prescribed by law to the exercise of such jurisdiction, and the process issue without such prerequisite, all parties concerned, save the ministerial officer, where the process fails to disclose irregularity upon its face, are trespassers.

Vosburg v. Welch, 11 Johns. 175; Curry v. Pringle, id. 444; Adkins v. Brewer, 3 Cow. 206; Reynolds v. Orvis, 7 id. 271; Grumon v. Raymond, 1 Conn. 40; Polk v. Slocum, 3 Blackf. 422; Barkeloo v. Randall, 4 id. 476; Davis v. Bush, id. 830.

Some of the cases to which I have referred are directly to the point that the affidavit and bond required by statute are essential prerequisites to the issuance of the writ of attachment, and that without these no jurisdiction is acquired; and this seems to be adjudged also in Wight v. Warner, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 384; Mantz v. Handby, 2 Hen. & Munf. 308; Clark v. Roberts, Breese, 285; Matter of Faulkner, 4 Hill; Staples v. Fairchild, 3 Comst. 41; Shivers v. Willson, 5 Harr. & J. 130; and in other cases which were cited at the bar.

In some courts, indeed, it has been held, both where the question arose directly and where it arose in a collateral proceeding, that a failure to comply with the statutory prerequisites will avoid the writ and all subsequent proceedings even in a court of general jurisdiction. Whitney v. Brunette, 15 Wis. 68; Willson v. Arnold, 5 Mich. 98; Greenvault v. Farmers' Bank, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 498.

I do not discover that any of these cases are upon statutes, essentially different from our own so far as concerns the requirements of the affidavit and security, or so far as relates to the effect and consequences of an omission in this respect; and though we are not prepared to hold, with the cases last cited, that defects in the affidavit or bond given shall, in superior courts of general jurisdiction, invalidate the subsequent proceedings, yet we think this may well be asserted as the rule where the proceeding is in an inferior court, not of record (at least where the defect is a substantial one), whether the question arise directly or collaterally; for as to these latter courts no one ought to be at liberty to assume that their proceedings are regular either in form or substance; whoever justifies or asserts any right under the sentence or judgment of such a court ought to be required to show the substantial regularity of its proceedings at every step. There ought to be no exception to this rule save in favor of the ministerial officer who executes process regular upon its face. The cases of Voorhies v. Bank of the United States, 10 Pet. 449; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 320; Ludlow v. Ramsey, 11 id. 582, have been sometimes thought to assert the doctrine that jurisdiction may be acquired by seizure of the estate of the defendant, so as to empower the court, under whose process the seizure is made, to award sale of such estate whether the requirements of the law antecedent to obtaining the writ have been complied with or not.

But in the first of these cases the court expressly affirm the principle that "all the requisitions of the law are conditions precedent, which must be performed before the power of the court to order a sale can arise," and the title there in controversy was sustained upon the ground that the statute under which the attachment proceeding was had did not prescribe what should be received as evidence of compliance with its requirements in this respect, or direct that any record of such compliance should be preserved, and the question being, therefore, left to depend upon those general principles of law by which the validity of sales under judicial process are determined, and it appearing of record that the writ issued was that prescribed by law, or, to use the language of the opinion, "the same as prescribed by law," the court thereby acquired jurisdiction of the cause of action and the property. The record was silent as to whether the requisites of the statutes anterior to the issuing of the writ had or had not been complied with; and, as we understand the opinion, the court supply the omissions of the record in this respect by the application of the maxim omnia rite esse acta.

So in Ludlow v. Ramsey the proceeding was by bill to vacate the sale for insufficiency of the affidavit. The court held the affidavit sufficient in substance, but referring to what had before been decided in Cooper v. Reynolds, and pursuing the doctrine of that case, say that the sole question is, whether the court obtained jurisdiction; that its general jurisdiction of such process is not denied; and that the writ of attachment in the particular case "appears to be in due form of law, and to have been regularly served upon the property, so that the court became fully possessed of jurisdiction in the case." So in Cooper v. Reynolds, MILLER, J., who delivered the opinion, says:

"It seems to us that the seizure of the property, or that which in this case is the same in effect, the levy of the writ of attachment upon it, is the one essential requisite to jurisdiction, as it unquestionably is in proceedings purely in rem. Without this the court can proceed no further; with it the court can proceed to subject that property to the demand of the plaintiff. If the writ of attachment is the lawful writ of the court, issued in proper form, under the seal of the court, and is by the proper officer levied upon property liable to attachment when such writ is returned into court, the power of the court over the res is established. The affidavit is the preliminary to the issuing of the writ. It may be a defective affidavit, or possibly the officer whose duty it is to issue the writ may have failed to observe all the requisite formalities, but the writ being issued and levied, the affidavit has served its purpose, and though a revisory court might see in some such departure from the strict direction of the statute sufficient error to reverse the judgment, we are unable to see how that can deprive the court of the jurisdiction acquired by the writ levied upon the defendant's property."

It appears to me, that while in the cases referred to the supreme court of the United States have gone much beyond the courts of most of the States in sustaining judicial proceedings of the character now under consideration, yet that they cannot, with accuracy, be said to go further than this, to wit: That defects in the affidavit or other preliminary steps shall be disregarded, if by a writ substantially perfect, and not showing upon its face any omission of the previous requirements of the statute, the proper officer of the court has seized the estate of the defendant within the territorial jurisdiction. But I conceive it to be clearly the doctrine of these cases that there must be a perfect writ.

Under our system, it is true, a perfect writ upon a defective affidavit cannot be, for the statute requires the affidavit to be recited in the writ, but elsewhere the two may perhaps concur.

Now the present case is clearly distinguishable from the cases in the supreme court of the United States, in this: that, while in all of these the writ issued out of a court of general jurisdiction, and was fair upon its face, here the writ is out of an inferior court, and recites as the ground of its issuance that "oath has been made that the defendants reside out of this county," which was no ground in any case. The writ was, therefore, absolutely void, and would not have availed to protect even the ministerial officer who executed it.

It was argued at the bar, however, that no writ of attachment can, under our statute, be held void, whatever its defects; for, it is said, notwithstanding any deficiency therein, or in the affidavit or bond, the same may not be quashed, but, by the eighth section of the statute, shall be amended, and what is void cannot be made valid; and, therefore, it is concluded, absolute invalidity cannot be predicated of process which, by positive law, is susceptible of amendment.

This same distinction is frequently taken in the books, and seems, in some cases, to have been thought applicable to cases like the present — as in Owens v. Starr, 2 Lit. 230; and Booth v. Rees, 26 Ill. 48, in which latter case it was held that a writ of attachment, issued upon affidavit, averring the statutory causes upon information merely, should protect even the justice of the peace who issued it, and the plaintiff who procured it. But we conceive that the question, whether it may or may not be within the power of the court to allow an amendment of any particular process, is not, in all cases, decisive of the other question, whether such process may or may not suffice to sustain a judgment given thereon. In the present case it cannot be said that the writ is amendable (and, therefore, voidable merely) in the sense in which the word is generally used in the books, for the defect here is such that there can be no amendment of the writ, without a new affidavit of facts not now appearing; and there cannot be such further affidavit unless the requisite facts exist, which does not now appear. Therefore it cannot now be known that the statutory power of amendment can ever be called into exercise, or the writ ever be amended; and we are not able to agree that one who has, to his own profit and his neighbor's injury, set in motion the process of the law "to which, by his own showing, he is not entitled, ought to be protected by that process;" because, possibly, upon a state of facts not shown, he might have obtained leave to correct his errors and perfect his writ, and so it was held in Whitney v. Brunette.

If the original affidavit had been sufficient, and the writ had falsely recited it, we might incline to a different opinion; but upon this record as it now stands, it does not appear that the defects in this process could have been corrected.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, and the defendant in error will recover his costs in this court.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES, WHETHER PROPER. — In considering the question whether exemplary damages are ever proper, the principal case was cited as an instance of their allowance: Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 532.

LOVELAND v. SEARS.

AMENDMENT of sheriff's return after judgment. Upon leave of court a sheriff may amend his return on a summons at a term subsequent to that at which judgment was rendered, and after the record has been removed to the supreme court.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — when necessary. Error cannot be assigned as to the damages awarded in the court below, unless the evidence upon which the finding was made is preserved in the record.

PLEADING — one good count will support general verdict. It cannot be objected that one count in a declaration is faulty, if there is one good count to support the finding. Rev. Stat. 509.

PRACTICE — referring note to clerk to compute amount due. Where a judge of probate court acts as his own clerk, it is not necessary to refer a note on which action is brought to the clerk to compute the amount due thereon.

MISNOMER — omission of word "junior" in record of judgment. The word "junior" is no part of a name, and where a plaintiff in the summons and declaration affixed the letters "jr." to his name, the omission of those letters in the record of judgment is immaterial.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Messrs. MILLER & MARKHAM, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. L. SMITH, for defendant in error.

BELFORD, J. This was an action of assumpsit instituted in the probate court of Arapahoe county on the 28th day of December, 1867, on a promissory note executed by Loveland to Cook & Co., and by them duly assigned to Sears. The summons was issued on the same day, and the return of the sheriff shows that it was served on the 29th of December, 1867. At the February term, 1868, of that court, judgment was rendered by default against Loveland, for $1,650.50. This writ of error was sued out to reverse this judgment and a supersedeas was granted. At the present term of this court the defendant in error, by his attorney, filed his affidavit and also that of Richard Sopris, the sheriff, who served the summons, showing that the date of the return of service of the summons was erroneous. On this showing he was allowed to file a supplemental record. It further appears that the defendant in error appeared before the probate court and made application to have the return amended, so as to show that service was made on the 28th of December instead of the 29th. The plaintiff in error appeared by his attorney. The notice given of the application to amend was brief, but it does not appear that further time was required by plaintiff's attorney. The court, on hearing the evidence of the sheriff, allowed the return to be amended. These facts appear in the supplemental record filed at this term. The first error assigned is that the court below permitted the amendment to be made. In the case of Moore v. The Peo ple, 3 Gilm. 153, amendments of this kind are regarded as matters of course and that no resistance can be made to such application. Should the sheriff make a false return he is responsible for the consequences. Morris v. Trustees, etc., 15 Ill. 269; 33 id. 269; 53 id. 323.

The next error assigned is, that the judgment is in excess of the amount of the note. There is no bill of exceptions here containing the note and we can make no computation to ascertain whether such be the fact.

It is objected that there is one bad count in the declaration and that the finding of the court was a general one. It is sufficient to say, there is one good count and that will support a general finding.

The next objection is, that the probate judge did not refer the note to the clerk to make assessment of damages. The probate judge filled both offices. If it were necessary to refer it to the clerk, in this case, it would be handing the note by Jacob Downing, judge, to Jacob Downing, clerk, a ceremony not calculated to especially advance the spirit of justice.

The next objection is, that Sears is described in the pleadings and summons as Jasper P. Sears, Jr., and that the judgment is rendered in favor of Jasper P. Sears, omitting the letters "Jr." The word "junior" is no part of a name, but is merely descriptive of the person; and is usually adopted to designate the son, when the father bears the same christian name, as well as family name. Padgett v. Lawrence, 10 Paige, 170. The omission to add the word "junior" to Sears' name in the judgment can cut no figure, as the judgment recites that "said plaintiff do have," etc. This shows in whose favor the judgment was rendered.

We are unable to find any error in this record.

The judgment below is affirmed at the cost of the plaintiff in error.

AMENDMENTS TO OFFICER'S RETURN : N PROCESS are in the interest of justice, and unless it be shown that the party complaining has been deceived or misled to his prejudice, great liberality in allowing them is always exercised: McClure v. Smith, 14 Otto, 301.

HILL v. THE PEOPLE.

INDICTMENT for deliberate and premeditated homicide. An indictment for murder in the common-law form is sufficient to support a conviction for deliberate or premeditated killing under the act of 1870. (8 Sess. 70.)

The words "malice aforethought" in the indictment are co-extensive in meaning with the words "deliberate and premeditated," and a charge that a homicide was committed with malice aforethought, comprehends a case of deliberate and premeditated killing.

CONSTRUCTION of the act of 1870 relating to homicide. The words "deliberate and premeditated" in the act of 1870, relating to homicide, refer to the intention of the accused at the time of the killing.

INTENTION is matter of fact to be proved. Under the act of 1870, the intention of the accused at the time of the killing is to be ascertained by the jury upon the evidence, and cannot be made the subject of legal presumption or inference.

INTENTION — presumption of fact. The intention of the accused may be inferred from the circumstances attending the homicide, and is therefore the subject of a presumption of fact.

Whether the intention be shown by evidence of antecedent menaces, former grudges, lying in wait, the means employed to effect the homicide or any other circumstance, the evidence is to be submitted to the jury to find the fact under the direction of the law.

A man shall be presumed to intend that which he voluntarily does, and an intention to take life is shown by the use of a deadly weapon.

So, also, if after a quarrel with deceased the prisoner went away and armed himself, and returned to the scene of the combat, intending to renew the altercation and quarrel with deceased, or to place himself in the presence of deceased with the purpose to provoke deceased to renew such quarrel and in such quarrel to make use of the pistol in repelling the assault of deceased, the intention of the prisoner to take the life of deceased is shown.

INSTRUCTION as to presumption of intent. It is the duty of the court to draw the attention of the jury to the points in the case and to presumptions of fact, which the law authorizes them to deduce from the evidence.

And in the present case, it was the duty of the court to lay before the jury the presumption of fact respecting the intention of the accused, and it was the duty of the jury to yield to its force and conclusiveness.

The jury should, however, be told that the presumption is to be drawn by them, and does not arise by implication of law.

An instruction, by which the jury were probably led to believe that they were relieved from considering the intention of the accused as a fact arising in the case, is erroneous.

This rule is not applicable to the ordinary inference of malice, which arises upon proof of killing, but to cases of deliberate or premeditated homicide, under the act of 1870.

REASONABLE DOUBT in cases of homicide. In a criminal cause, where the defense is based upon the facts and circumstances growing out of the charge itself, the burden of proof remains on the government throughout, to satisfy the jury of the guilt of the defendant.

In such case it is error to charge the jury that circumstances of mitigation justification or excuse, must be established by a fair preponderance of testimony, and that doubt as to whether the killing was in heat of blood or with malice, would not be sufficient to acquit of the charge of murder.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE indictment was in the common-law form for murder.

At the trial, James Whitsell testified: That an altercation occurred between the prisoner and the deceased, Elija Williams, at a saloon in Denver, on the evening of the 15th of July, in which harsh words were used but no blows were struck; the prisoner went away and returned after an absence of half or three quarters of an hour with a pistol; that prisoner said to deceased, "you d——d black s——n of a b——ch, I am ready for you now;" that one George Lyon seized Hill, and a struggle ensued in which deceased participated, and the contending parties passed into a back room, where the shooting took place. Witness did not see the shooting; he testified that the deceased was not armed.

Thomas J. Martin gave the following account of the second altercation between prisoner and deceased. When Hill came in I heard him say to Elije, "You've called me a black s——n of a b——h," and Elije says "Yes, and what are you going to do about it;" Hill says to Williams, "If you don't take it back I'll hurt you;" Williams jumped up from his seat and started towards Hill; Hill drew a pistol from his coat pocket and says to Elije, "If you don't stay back I'll hurt you;" George Lyon caught Hill by this time and pushed him into the billiard room, drew the door to between him and Williams, and Mr. Thompson caught Williams in the opposite room. Elije pulled Thompson loose from him and jerked the door open; George Lyon says to Elije, "Why don't you go away and let him alone;" George still had Hill, holding him, and Elije still made way toward Hill, and George let go Hill and started toward bar-room to call the proprietor of the house ; before either of 'em got back from bar-room Hill fired a shot ; in course of a minute or so after the shot was fired Williams clutched Hill, and they tussled a minute or so, and Thompson tried to part 'em ; finally, either he parted 'em or Williams let go, I ain't certain which, and walked off from him. He then sat down on the floor first, then he laid down on flat of his back ; that is, Williams ; he said in a minute or so after he laid down, " Who done it ? " and immediately died ; after they were separated, Hill immediately left the room and went out at the back door ; Hill hit Williams when he shot ; the shot hit Williams, and I believe it hit him in the point of the heart, I am not certain ; I didn't examine Williams ; he died three or five minutes after the shot ; I believe Williams wasn't hurt any other way than by the shot ; I don't know, and saw pistol which Hill had ; it was a smallish seven-shooter ; this shooting occurred in Arapahoe county, I believe, Colorado territory.

Harrison Bozier testified : That prisoner said to deceased, when he returned with the pistol : " You d — m s — n of a b — h, I am here ; " that deceased then started toward prisoner, and a struggle ensued, during which the fatal shot was fired.

George Lyon testified : That he took the prisoner into the back room and fastened the door, and that deceased broke through the door and said, " Where is the d — d nigger ; I will kill him." Prisoner told deceased to keep away ; deceased then sprang at prisoner, and prisoner fired the shot.

Ira Thompson testified : That when prisoner returned, deceased said to him, " Hill, you back here ; " prisoner said, " I don't want you to speak to me, you called me a s — n of a b — h, didn't you ; " deceased said " Yes, what are you going to do about it ; " prisoner said deceased was a s — n of a b — h ; deceased rose from his seat, jumped on the top of the table and said, " G — d d — n you, I will kill you ; " witness said, " Williams, don't hit that man ; " deceased said, " G — d d — n the nigger, I will kill him." Lyon then took prisoner out and witness caught hold of deceased ; deceased broke away from him and went into back room ; a struggle followed between prisoner and deceased, during which deceased forced prisoner against the wall, and raised his hand to strike him, when the prisoner fired his pistol.

The testimony was voluminous, and it is unnecessary to insert all of it. Sufficient has been stated to show the principal points.

The charge to the jury was as follows :

If the homicide charged in the indictment has been established by the evidence to have been committed by the prisoner, the law in the first instance presumes that such killing was malicious in such sense as to hold the prisoner guilty of the crime of murder. The burden of showing circumstances of mitigation, justification or excuse is upon the prisoner, unless such circumstance sufficiently appears in the evidence on the part of the people.

If the jury find the prisoner guilty of murder, then they must also consider and find whether such murder was or was not premeditated.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that prisoner and deceased, shortly prior to the occasion of the killing, had an altercation or controversy in which deceased used words of reproach or threats toward prisoner ; that prisoner thereupon went away from deceased and returned presently armed with a pistol, intending to renew the altercation and quarrel with deceased, or to place himself in the presence of deceased with the purpose to provoke deceased to renew such quarrel, and in such quarrel to make use of the pistol in repelling the assault of deceased in case deceased should assault him ; and that thereupon the prisoner returning with either such purposes, the altercation was renewed either by prisoner or deceased, and that an assault and struggle followed, and that the shot whereby deceased came to his end was fired by prisoner during such struggle, then the jury ought to find prisoner guilty of premeditated murder, without reference to who gave the first offense or was the aggressor in that particular occasion, and even though they also believe from the evidence that prisoner was in danger of life at the time of the shot fired. The arming and returning in such case raises a presumption of a deliberate purpose to kill, and the law permits no man to take life even in defense of his own life in a quarrel which he himself has provoked. And if the meeting of the prisoner and deceased upon the occasion of the homicide was but casual and not premeditated by prisoner, yet if prisoner, at such meeting, before any advance by deceased toward him, or any assault offered by deceased, made show of firearms, accompanying such exhibition by words of threatening toward deceased, then the jury will be justified in regarding the prisoner as the first aggressor, and as having provoked the assault of Williams which ensued, but in such case the jury should find the prisoner guilty merely, and not guilty of murder with premeditation. But if the jury find from evidence that the meeting and altercation of prisoner and deceased, upon the occasion of the shooting, was not premeditated by defendant, as supposed by the foregoing instruction; that the defendant, before the killing, attempted in good faith to evade the assault of deceased; that, by reason of the fierceness of the assault, the prisoner, taking into account the relative strength and activity of himself and deceased, and the previous threats, if any, made by deceased, was justified in believing that he could not escape such assault, and that from such assault he was in danger of life or limb or great bodily harm, then prisoner was justified in taking the life of deceased to prevent such injury.

Prisoner was justified in believing himself unable to evade the assault of deceased, if a man of reasonable firmness placed in the same circumstances would have indulged the same belief.

It is not necessary to justify the homicide as done in self defense, that defendant should show that he was in actual danger of life or limb, or could not have escaped the assault of deceased; it is sufficient if, under all the circumstances then existing, a man of reasonable prudence and firmness would so have believed.

After the jury had retired they were recalled, and an instruction not here recited was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by the court. The court then proceeded to instruct the jury further, as follows :

That the law, in the first instance, presumes every accused person innocent of the crime charged, but if the crime charged be murder, and if the killing be proven, then a presumption arises that said killing was malicious. The law, however, makes no presumption from the fact of the killing, that such killing was deliberate, but requires the deliberation of the accused to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt before he can be found guilty of premeditated murder. But the presumption of malice which arises from the fact of the killing, devolves upon the accused the burden of showing to the satisfaction of the trial jury all circumstances of mitigation, excuse or justification, unless such circumstances be shown in the prosecution, and unless upon consideration of all the evidence, both on the part of the people and the prisoner, it appears by a fair preponderance of proof that the killing was done in lawful self-defense upon apparent necessity in a quarrel not provoked by accused ; they ought not to acquit, nor ought they to find guilty of manslaughter and not guilty of murder, unless by a like preponderance of proof it appears that the killing was done in the sudden heat of passion and not of malice aforethought.

It will not suffice to acquit the defendant, that the jury are in doubt whether the killing was or was not done in self-defense, or was or was not done in a quarrel unprovoked by accused. Nor will it suffice to reduce the killing to manslaughter, that the jury are in doubt whether such killing was of malice aforethought or in the sudden heat of passion and without malice.

The distinction between murder and manslaughter is as follows : Murder is an unlawful killing with malice aforethought, express or implied. Express malice is a deliberate intention to take life, and may be inferred from external circumstances, or the conduct, actions and words of the party accused, at or about the time of the homicide, the weapon used, and the manner of the killing. Implied malice is that malice which is inferred by the law from the fact of homicide, where no considerable provocation appears, or the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart. Manslaughter is an unlawful killing without malice, express or implied, and without any mixture of deliberation whatever. To reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, it must be shown by the person accused thereof (unless shown by the prosecution) to have been upon a sudden heat of passion, and upon a provocation apparently sufficient to make the passion irresistible, or it must be shown to have been done involuntarily in the commission of a lawful act, without due caution and circumspection.

The court further instructs, that the instruction that the jury "ought or ought not," upon a supposed state of facts, to find, for or against the accused, imports that the state of facts, supposed by the instruction, does or does not warrant the finding, which the jury are thereby told they ought or ought not to make, and that a finding in violation of such instruction will be deemed in law erroneous.

A "presumption" is an inference or conclusion from certain premises; presumptions are either conclusive or disputable; conclusive presumptions cannot be overcome by evidence; disputable presumptions may. The presumption of innocence in criminal cases is a disputable presumption, so, also, is the presumption of malice, which the law raises from the fact of a homicide proven. This latter presumption, as before stated, can only be overcome by a fair preponderance of testimony.

The jury found the defendant guilty of premeditated murder.

Section 36 of the criminal code, referred to in the opinion of the court, is as follows:

"The killing being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the homicide, will devolve on the accused, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution sufficiently manifests that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the accused was justified or excused in committing the homicide."

Section 1, of the act of 1870, is as follows: "That section 20 of said chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes of Colorado territory shall be hereafter construed so that the death penalty for the crime of murder shall not be ordered to be inflicted by the courts of the territory, unless the jury trying the case shall, in their verdict of guilty, also indicate that the killing was deliberate or premeditated, or was done in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, some felony."

Messrs. BROWN & PUTNAM, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. M. A. ROGERS, district attorney.

Mr. Justice WELLS dissented from so much of the opinion as relates to the effect to be given to section 36 of the Criminal Code.

HALLETT, C. J. The act of 1870, which provides that the crime of murder shall not be capitally punished, unless the jury trying the case shall indicate in their verdict that the killing was deliberate or premeditated or done in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a felony, is peculiar in form, but in many respects substantially the same as the law of several States upon the same subject.

As early as 1794, in Pennsylvania, it was enacted that:

"All murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison or lying in wait, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery or burglary, shall be deemed murder in the first degree; and all other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder in the second degree; and the jury, before whom any person indicted for murder shall be tried, shall, if they find such person guilty thereof, ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder of the first or second degree."

In substance, if not in form, this statute has been adopted in other States, and its meaning and effect are now pretty well understood. Our legislature, with less method, perhaps, but with quite as much certainty, has raised a punitive distinction between murder committed with deliberation or premeditation, or in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a felony, and other murders, and this distinction, so far as relates to deliberate or premeditated killing, is substantially the same as that which, by the Pennsylvania act, separates the first and second degrees of murder. In the Pennsylvania act, and in our own, certain distinctions are mentioned for the purpose of limiting the death penalty to cases falling within them, but nothing is added to or taken from the common-law definition of murder. And this brings into view the first question presented in this record, which is the sufficiency of an indictment in the common-law form to support a conviction for premeditated murder. It is conceded that the crime of which plaintiff in error has been convicted must be set out in the indictment, and if the words "malice aforethought" are not co-extensive in meaning with "deliberation and premeditation" this has not been done. If these words had not acquired a technical meaning in the law, probably no doubt would exist upon this point. We would then accept them in their primary sense, which is rather more comprehensive than "deliberation and premeditation," inasmuch as the latter words do not necessarily imply wickedness of purpose or evil design. Said Lord Coke (3 Inst. 51): "Malice prepensed is when one compasseth to kill, wound or beat another, and doth it sedato animo. This is said in law to be malice aforethought, prepensed, malitia precogitata."

The meaning of these words has been greatly amplified since the days of Coke, for, in the Webster case, 5 Cush. 304, it was said to include "not only anger, hatred and revenge, but every other unlawful and unjustifiable motive." But it is no objection to say that the words are more comprehensive than the words of the statute, if they are of equivalent meaning, because the whole must include all of its parts. Before the statute of 1870, it was never doubted that a formed design and deliberate purpose to kill was provable under the averment of malice aforethought, and there is nothing in the statute to change the rule on this subject. In the Webster case, 5 Cush. 316, it was said that malice aforethought does not imply deliberation or the lapse of considerable time between the malicious intent to take life and the actual execution of that intent.

They do not necessarily imply deliberation or premeditation, because they have acquired a technical meaning in the law far beyond their primary and popular sense, and may be, and often are, taken to mean something other than premeditation and deliberation. The mother who exposed her child in the garden, and the workman who cast timber into the crowded street, are instances given in the books of criminal carelessness which the law denominates malice aforethought; but a homicide effected in either of these ways would not be regarded as deliberate or premeditated. Therefore the words of the statute, although not co-extensive in meaning with the words of the indictment, are, nevertheless, synonymous with them, and there can be no reason for using the former rather than the latter. Whart. Crim. L., § 1115.

The doctrine is not to be extended, however, beyond the reason which supports it, and, therefore, if the fact to be proved is not set out in the indictment no evidence can be received concerning it. We doubt the soundness of those decisions in which it is held that proof of a homicide committed in the perpetration, or in the attempt to perpetrate a felony, may be made under the ordinary common-law indictment, for these facts are not averred in such an indictment. 2 Bishop's Crim. Proc., § 562, et seq.

Passing from the indictment, which we accept as sufficient, no argument will be required to show that the words "deliberate and premeditated" refer to the specific intent with which the act is done. They are used to denote the action of the mind, and involve the idea of thought and reflection.

A deliberate or premeditated act is one which is done upon a formed design, and with a direct purpose to accomplish it.

The act and intention must coincide, but, as to this coincidence, it was held in Pennsylvania to be sufficient that the accused intended to take life, although the act fell upon one not within the intention. Hopkins v. Com., 50 Penn. 10. Mr. Wharton says (Whart. C. L., § 1084) :

"The distinctive peculiarity attached by the statutes to murder in the first degree, however, is that it must necessarily be accompanied with a premeditated intention to take life. The 'killing' must be 'premeditated.' Whenever, then, in cases of deliberate homicide, there is a specific intention to take life, the offense, if consummated, is murder in the first degree; if there is not a specific intention to take life, it is murder in the second degree."

Accepting this distinction, not as establishing degrees, but as one which regulates the punishment under our statute, we will inquire in what manner the intention to take life is to be ascertained. And here it will be observed that the act of 1870, in terms, refers this question to the jury, the language of the act being that the jury shall indicate in their verdict that the killing was deliberate or premeditated. Juries act upon evidence, and hence we may conclude that the intention is matter of fact to be found by the jury upon the evidence. In support of this view, I find it laid down in Roberts v. The People, 19 Mich. 414, as a general rule, to which there are few if any exceptions, "that when a statute makes an offense to consist of an act combined with a particular intent, that intent is just as necessary to be proved as the act itself, and must be found by the jury as matter of fact before a conviction can be had."

This is the rule in the States where degrees in the crime of murder are recognized, and deliberate and premeditated homicide is assigned to the first. People v. Potter, 5 Mich. 1; Whitford v. Com., 6 Randolph, 722; Bivins v. State, 6 Eng. 455; State v. Gillick, 7 Iowa, 287; State v. Dowd, 19 Conn. 387; People v. Sanchez, 24 Cal. 17.

At common law, and under our statute, the presumption of malice arises upon proof of the killing, but the statute of 1870 distinguishes the cases characterized by deliberation and premeditation from others, and declares that the jury shall indicate the existence of such distinguishing characteristics. Of the correctness of the general proposition, that the intention with which the killing is done is matter for the consideration of the jury, there appears to be no doubt, and it would seem that this can never be made the subject of legal inference or presumption; and yet in some of the cases homicide, by means of a deadly weapon, appears to have been regarded as an exception to the rule, and Mr. Greenleaf states that the intent to murder is conclusively inferred from the deliberate use of such weapon. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 18.

A man shall be presumed to intend that which he voluntarily does, and where the act is necessarily destructive of life, it would be absurd to say that the actor did not intend to produce death. So, if a person deliberately use a deadly weapon in a manner likely to produce harm, upon every principle by which we may judge of the motives of men, we must say that he intends to destroy life. But we determine this psychological fact upon our experience of the operations of the mind; and, therefore, I think this is a natural presumption as distinguished from a legal presumption. It is an inference, approved by reason of such an infallible nature that the law recognizes and enforces it. Of natural presumptions Mr. Starkie says (3 Stark. Ev. 1245): "Many presumptions of this class are recognized by the law, and, therefore, in one sense, may be termed legal presumptions, which still, unless some degree of technical force and weight be given them beyond their mere natural operation, are properly to be ranked in this class. Recent possession of stolen goods, on a trial for larceny, is recognized by the law as affording a presumption of guilt; and, therefore, in one sense, is a presumption of law; but it is still, in effect, a mere natural presumption, for, although the circumstance may weigh greatly with a jury, it is to operate solely by its own natural force, for a jury are not to convict on this or any other charge unless they be actually convinced in their consciences of the truth of the fact."

So, also, in Best on Presumptions, 45, mention is made of presumptions of fact recognized by law, first among which are those where the inference is one which common sense would have made for itself. I think that we may regard the presumption arising from the use of a deadly weapon, as of this class, so strong that it has often been mistaken for a presumption of law. "We find the same presumption spoken of by judges, sometimes as a presumption of law, sometimes as a presumption of fact; sometimes as a presumption which juries should be advised to make, sometimes as one which it was obligatory on them to make," etc. Best on Presumptions, 44.

The statute has not declared that homicide, effected by means of a deadly weapon, shall be punished with death, but deliberate or premeditated homicide is so punishable; therefore, the ultimate point which the evidence must extend to and establish, is not the use of a deadly weapon, but the deliberation or premeditation with which the fatal act is done, and whether the intention is shown by evidence of antecedent menaces, former grudges, lying in wait, the means employed to effect the homicide, or any other circumstances which may give assurance of it, I think that it is to be submitted to the jury to find the fact under the direction of the law.

How far the law will go in supporting, before the jury, a presumption of fact which it recognizes and enforces, is a question of some difficulty. The rule is given in Best on Presumptions, 48, as follows: "The terms in which presumptions of fact and mixed presumptions should be brought under the consideration of juries, by the presiding judge, depend on their weight, either natural or technical; when the presumption is one which the policy of law and ends of justice require to be made, such as the existence of moduses and other incorporeal rights, from unin-interrupted usage, the jury should be told that they ought to make the presumption, unless some evidence be given to the contrary; it should not be put to them as a matter for their discretion, and the same rule seems to apply where the presumption is one of much natural weight and frequent occurrence; as where larceny is inferred from the recent possession of stolen property, etc. In the case of presumptions of a less stringent nature, however, such a direction would be improper; and, perhaps, the best general rule is, that the jury should be advised or recommended to make the presumption." -

To advise or recommend a jury to make a presumption, must, in many cases, be very nearly akin to an expression of opinion upon the weight of evidence, which, according to the construction placed upon our statute governing charges to juries, is prohibited by it.

The doctrine of presumption grew up under the common law which enjoined upon courts the duty of analyzing the evidence, and commenting upon the bearings, tendency and force of the particular facts, and the comparative weight and force of conflicting evidence. 1 Stark. Ev. 73.

The object of the statute in providing that courts should charge juries as to the law of the case only was to preserve the distinction between the functions of each, which, however commendable in itself, must not be carried so far as to defeat the administration of the law.

It is still the duty, as it always has been the practice, of our courts, to draw the attention of the jury to the points arising in the case, and to the presumptions of fact, which the law authorizes them to deduce from the evidence. To guide the deliberations of a jury to a correct conclusion, without assuming their functions, is a delicate and arduous duty, which must be faithfully and intelligently performed by the courts in all cases.

A portion of the charge to the jury in this case was the following:

"If the jury believe, from the evidence, that prisoner and deceased, shortly prior to the occasion of the killing, had an altercation or controversy in which deceased used words of reproach or threats toward prisoner, that prisoner thereupon went away from deceased and returned, presently, armed with a pistol, intending to renew the altercation and quarrel with deceased, or to place himself in the presence of deceased with the purpose to provoke deceased to renew such quarrel, and, in such quarrel, to make use of the pistol in repelling the assault of deceased in case deceased should assault him; and thereupon, the prisoner returning with either such purposes, the altercation was renewed either by prisoner or deceased, and that an assault and struggle followed, and that the shot, whereby deceased came to his end, was fired by prisoner during such struggle, then the jury ought to find prisoner guilty of premeditated murder, without reference to who gave the first offense or was the aggressor on that particular occasion, and even though they also believe, from the evidence, that prisoner was in danger of life at the time of the shot fired. The arming and returning, in such case, raises a presumption of a deliberate purpose to kill, and the law permits no man to take life even in defense of his own life in a quarrel which he himself has provoked."

It will be observed that the intention of the accused to take life is not mentioned in this part of the charge as a fact essential to guilt, except as a presumption arising out of the circumstances that the accused armed himself and returned to the scene of the tragedy after the first interview. Elsewhere the jury were told that they were to find premeditation; but as this fact is, in this portion of the charge, distinctly predicated upon the arming and returning, it is not probable that the jury accepted the former as a modification of this statement. In the circumstances named by the court, and in the character of the weapon used, there was plenary proof of the intention of the accused to take life, but, as I have attempted to show, this was for the consideration of the jury. It was the duty of the court to lay before the jury the presumption of fact as to the intention of the accused arising upon these circumstances, and it was the duty of the jury to yield to its force and conclusiveness. I think that the manner in which this duty was performed by the court is open to the objection, that the jury probably understood that they were relieved from the consideration of the intention of the accused as a fact in the case. It cannot be objected that the premeditation is made the subject of inference and presumption, because, usually, this fact cannot be proved in any other way. 2 Stark. Ev. 739.

But they should have been told that this presumption was to be drawn by them, and did not arise by implication of law. Graves v. The State, 12 Wis. 593; Methard v. The State, 19 Ohio, 387.

I do not refer to the ordinary inference of malice, which, by the common law and our statute, arises upon proof of the killing, but to the premeditation and deliberation mentioned in the act of 1870, which by that act are directly submitted to the decision of the jury. In all cases of intentional homicide malice is implied, and so it must have been here if the jury could find nothing to mitigate the offense. But premeditation and deliberation is the subject of proof of which the government assumes the burden, and of this I think the jury were not sufficiently informed.

Another part of the charge presents a question which has been the subject of much learned discussion in the courts of this country, and appears to be still unsettled, although I think the weight of authority is opposed to the views of the district court. The court charged that circumstances of mitigation, justification or excuse must be established by a fair preponderance of testimony, and that doubt as to whether the killing was in heat of blood or with malice, would not be sufficient to acquit of the charge of murder.

The doctrine of reasonable doubt was, however, applied to the crime of which the accused was convicted, and if the case were not to be tried anew, it might not be necessary to notice that portion of the charge which relates to the evidence required of the accused. The charge is grounded upon section 36 of the Criminal Code, which, after proof of the killing by the government, in terms, casts upon the accused the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, justification or excuse, unless such circumstances appear in the evidence against him. The law of homicide, as found in the Criminal Code, was evidently drawn from the common law, and probably this section was intended to preserve the common-law rule respecting malice in cases of homicide. I think that the language accords with that used by the common-law writers upon the same subject, sufficiently to warrant this inference. At all events it is noticeable that, by the statute as well as by the common law, if the circumstances of mitigation, justification or excuse are apparent in the testimony of the government, the accused is entitled to the benefit of the presumption of innocence, which demands that his guilt shall be made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt. But it is said that, if these circumstances do not so appear, he must establish them by testimony outweighing that of the government. Now, the circumstances attending an act give character to it, inasmuch as they evince the intention of the actor at the time of the fact. Section 2, Criminal Code. Usually, the proof of the killing will disclose the circumstances attending it, and the character of the crime is demonstrated by the same evidence which establishes it. But if the government is able to make proof of the homicide, without more, and the accused is therefore compelled to give evidence of the attending circumstances, it seems to me that he ought not to be placed under greater hardship or subjected to a more rigorous rule than would have been applied, if the government had frankly presented the whole case to the jury.

The argument in the York case, 9 Met. 93, which is difficult to answer or to accept, proceeds no further than the case of homicide, without further proof on the part of the government, and it appears to me that there are unanswerable objections to the doctrine thus limited. It often happens, as in this case, that several witnesses of a criminal act give different accounts of it and some of the testimony is more favorable to the accused than the remainder.

The government usually selects the testimony which tends most strongly to conviction, while the accused relies upon that which is most favorable to himself. Shall it be said that in such case the testimony for the defense must outweigh the testimony of the prosecution?

The testimony of the accused may be supplemented by that of the government, or it may be sufficient to balance the opposing testimony; but if it is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant in the minds of the jury, the presumption of innocence will operate in his favor. "However the rule may be in cases where the defendant sets up, in answer to a criminal charge, some separate, distinct and independent fact or series of facts, not immediately connected with, and growing out of, the transaction on which the criminal charge is founded, there can be no doubt that, in a case like the present, the burden of proof remains on the government throughout to satisfy the jury of the guilt of the defendant. It appears by the evidence, as stated in the bill of exceptions, that the justification upon which the defendant relied was disclosed partly by the testimony introduced by the government and in part by evidence offered by the defendant, and that it related to and grew out of the transaction or res gesta, which constituted the alleged criminal act." McKee v. Com., 1 Ben. L. C. C. 297, and note; State v. McClure, 5 Nev. 132; State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224; State v. Flye, 26 Me. 316.

If we except the statute in its common-law relations where the presumption of malice always encountered the presumption of innocence we shall not be able to approve the charge of the court below. Where the defense is based upon the facts and circumstances growing out of the charge itself, we cannot indulge the presumption of innocence and, at the same time, require the accused to establish those facts and circumstances by preponderance of testimony, because less evidence may be sufficient to engender a reasonable doubt of guilt.

In a case of less consequence we should hesitate to reverse a judgment for misdirection to the jury alone, but we cannot assume the grave responsibility of determining the correctness of the verdict upon the evidence in a capital case. The judgment is, therefore, reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the district court to award a new trial.

DOANE et al. v. GLENN et al.

PRACTICE—amending record after judgment—upon whom to serve notice.

Where an order allowing a bill of exceptions to be filed in vacation was omitted from the record, notice of an application to amend the record in that particular may be served upon the attorneys who appeared for the opposing party at the trial of the cause.

AMENDMENT OF RECORD at a subsequent term. Where an order allowing a bill of exceptions to be filed in vacation was omitted from the record by mistake of the clerk, the court may, at a subsequent term, allow the record to be amended by inserting such order nunc pro tunc.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

UPON motion to strike the bill of exceptions from the record.

MESSRS. FRANCE & ROGERS, in support of the motion.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, contra.

BELFORD, J. The defendants in error move to strike from the record the bill of exceptions, and rest the motion on two grounds.

It appears that at the June term of the district court the judgment in this case was entered up. The plaintiffs in error were allowed thirty days to prepare a record and file bond, and sixty days to settle their bill of exceptions. By the inadvertence of the clerk the order made by the judge in reference to filing the bill of exceptions was omitted from the record. This order was made at the last hour of the last session of the term, and the omission was not discovered until some weeks after. At the ensuing term of the court the plaintiffs in error, having given notice to the attorneys of the defendants, made their application to the court to have this omission supplied. This application was founded upon affidavit of Doane's attorneys, which set up the facts that the order had been made by the judge and omitted from the record by the clerk. The judge, acting on his own recollection of what had occurred, together with what appeared from the affidavits, allowed the omission to be supplied.

It is claimed by defendant's counsel that the notice above referred to was insufficient because the same was served on the attorneys and not on the parties. That final judgment having been entered at the July term, their connection with the case by operation of law had ceased, and that the amendment of the record must be regarded as having been made without notice, and therefore not valid or binding.

We find ourselves unable to sanction this claim. It is a noticeable fact that the same counsel who appeared for the defendants below appear for them here. There seems to be no breach in the line or continuity of employment.

While it is generally true that the power of the attorney, under his general warrant, expires when judgment is rendered, yet it is equally true that the power of the attorney will be retained even after the entry of final judgment on the record, and beyond the purpose of merely superintending the execution of the same. If a writ of error be brought against his client, it has long been the practice to require that he should be served with notice. 2 Sel. Pr. 365. So the entering of final judgment by the defendant's attorney may be irregular. What objection is there in such case to serving him with notice of a motion to set it aside, and to call upon him to defend and make it good? It is his business at least to see that a regular judgment in favor of his client should be perfected and sustained when the court has awarded in his favor. Having conducted the suit, he is best able to resist all attacks upon the judgment. Indeed, his own regularity is generally drawn in question by the proceeding. For a similar reason he is the proper person to be served with notice when the judgment or any other proceeding in which he has participated is sought to be set aside or questioned on the ground of merits, as is done in this case. We think that the case of Lusk v. Hastings, 1 Hill, 656, is decisive of this point; and if it were not we would still be induced to hold that the duty of an attorney does not cease to his client so long as the judgment obtained by him is menaced by further judicial action.

It is next objected that the court could not, at a subsequent term, amend its records.

In Alhers v. Whitney, 1 Story, 310, Mr. Justice STORY says: "It is plain that at the common law no judgment was amendable after the term at which it was entered; and amendments could be made in the process, pleadings and proceedings only while the cause stood in paper, and before judgment. The authority to amend then, even in England, in cases of this sort, is dependent upon, and limited by, statute. Mr. Tidd has laid this down as the clear doctrine of the courts in all cases of ordinary suits in English courts of practice. Judgments and records are there never allowed to be amended except, in the first place, where the case is within the reach of some statute, or, in the next place, when there is something to amend by; that is, when there is some memorial, paper or other minute of the transactions in the case from which what actually took place in the prior proceedings can be clearly ascertained and known." Tidd, 713, 714.

We acknowledge the force of this doctrine, and question the right of allowing a judge to alter a judgment after the close of the term, when there is nothing to amend by; and he assumes to do it on the ground that the judgment, as entered, does not express the intention of his mind at the time it was entered. To tolerate a practice of this kind might give a license to the judge to carry the records of his court, and the ultimate rights of parties, about the country in his head. Yet, notwithstanding what has been said above, the doctrine in this country, in reference to amendments of records, may be said to have crystalized into the following legal propositions, namely: That any error or defect in a record which occurs through the act or omission of the clerk of the court in entering, or failing to enter, of record its judgments or proceedings, and is not an error in the express judgment pronounced by the court in the exercise of its judicial discretion, is a mere clerical error and amendable, no matter in how important a part of the record it may be; and when the error or defect is in respect to the entry of some judgment, order, decree or proceeding to which one of the parties in the cause was of right entitled, as a matter of course, according to law and established practice of the court, it will sometimes be presumed to have occurred through the misprison of the clerk, and will always be amendable if, from other parts of the record, or from other convincing and satisfactory proofs, it can be clearly ascertained what judgment, order or decree the party was entitled to; nor is it necessary, so far as clerical errors go, that the amendment should be made during the term at which judgment is rendered. In the case of Shaw v. Benkard it was held, that, when an entry of default was not made, it is amendable in the court below, and, on appeal, the amendment will be presumed to have been made. 10 Ind. 227. So in Burrow v. Blair, 12 Ind. 371, a clerical error, whereby a judgment for foreclosure and the order of sale, and the execution covered land at the time not included in the mortgage, was allowed to be amended.

In the case of Limerick petitioners, 18 Mann. R., the court say: "When a defect in a record is occasioned by an omission of the court to render the proper judgment, or to come to a conclusion upon the whole matter embraced in the cause, such defect, arising out of an incorrect or a want of judicial action, cannot be amended after the term has closed and the cause is no longer sub judice. But, if the court have performed its whole duty correctly, and the recording officer has erred in making up a proper or full record, the court may, in its discretion, cause the record at any time to be amended or corrected so as to have it declare the whole truth. Each court must necessarily be the judge of what it has decided and adjudged ; and, when it orders an amendment of the record, the presumption of other courts must necessarily be that it does not undertake to order its clerk to record what it never had decided."

In the case of Slicer v. The Bank of Pittsburgh, 18 How. 579, it was objected that the judgment was not entered upon the minutes kept by the clerk. The court say: "But the court had the power to make the amendment, which they did make, and which removed the objection, by entering the judgment nunc pro tunc. This was a duty discharged by the court in the exercise of a discretion which no court can revise."

In the case of Latshaw v. Steinman, 11 Serg. & Rawle, 356, it was held that the court below might, in their discretion, amend a judgment by default, and that the appellate court would not inquire whether they had exercised their discretionary power judiciously."

In the case of Stickdale v. Johnson, 14 Iowa, 179, a motion was made in December, 1861, to strike the bill of exceptions from the record. The motion was sustained because it appeared affirmatively that the same had been signed and filed in vacation, without the consent of the appellee. At the April term of the district court, A. D. 1862, the appellant moved the court to supply an omission in the final record of said cause, so that it might be made to conform to the order of the court, made at the September term, 1861, in this, to wit: "That by consent of parties the bill of exceptions was ordered to be prepared and signed in vacation." This motion was supported by affidavits; counter affidavits were filed by the attorneys on the other side, denying, in very positive terms, that they ever assented to any such arrangement, referring to some circumstances in confirmation of their statement. The motion was overruled and an appeal taken.

The supreme court say: "The facts about which there is conflicting evidence transpired before, and in the presence of, the judge below. He is supposed to have some knowledge and recollection of the facts himself. They relate to a supposed omission in his records, which are exclusively under his own control and keeping. It would be manifestly improper, under the circumstances and the showing made, for us to overrule his decision."

Here the court treats the subject as a matter of discretion resting with the court below, and not to be interfered with by the appellate tribunal.

In Hudgkins v. Kemp, 18 How. 580, it appears that TANEY, C. J., in vacation, ordered the clerk to enter up an appeal as of the term. An appeal had been prayed and allowed, but the clerk had failed to enter the order. When it came to the supreme court for review it was not regarded as error.

The case of Malbeson Adams v. Grant's admr., 2 How. 279, is a strong case. There the declaration was in two counts, one as administrator, and one in the plaintiff's own right — general verdict and judgment arrested, but no venire de novo awarded, or judgment non obstante veredicto. At the second term, subsequent, and one year afterward, a motion was made to vacate the order arresting the judgment. It was sustained. And on affidavits showing what evidence had been given on the trial, the verdict was amended so as to apply it to the first count. Judgment was given on the first count, and a nolle prosequi entered as to the other. Held, on error, that there is no time absolutely fixed within which such an amendment as the one in question must be made; all that is required is that it should be within reasonable time, and when no such change of circumstances shall have intervened as may render it inconvenient or inexpedient.

That such an amendment, though usually made by reference to the judge's notes, may be had upon any other evidence equally clear and satisfactory (see the cases there cited).

Many other authorities might be cited, showing that amendments of this character are matters of discretion, but we deem it unnecessary. We see no error in the action of the court below. The motion to strike the bill of exceptions from the record must be overruled.

Motion denied.

AMENDMENT OF RECORD AT SUBSEQUENT TERM. — Where a mistake was clearly made in preparing the bill of exceptions, if the evidence of the fact is still in existence, the court may allow the bill to be amended in accordance with the facts: Byers v. Martin, 2 Colo. 605. Thus, if the clerk, by mistake, omit an order allowing the bill to be filed in vacation, the court may allow the record to be amended nunc pro tunc: Wolfey v. Lebanon Mfg. Co., 3 Colo. 297. Reversed, 21 Wall. .

HOLLADAY v. DAILEY.

DOWER — right of — not known. In this territory a wife has no dower in the real estate of her husband. 1 Sess. 363.

MARRIED WOMEN — power to contract. By the act of 1861, to protect the rights of married women (1 Sess. 152), a wife may make contracts respecting her separate business and estate; beyond these limits her contracts are governed by the common law and are therefore void. She cannot warrant her husband's title to realty, or covenant for his act or default in any respect whatever.

POWER OF ATTORNEY to convey husband's lands executed by wife. Therefore, where husband and wife joined in a power of attorney, the attorney could do no act under the power which should in any way charge the wife's estate or bind her or those in privity with her.

DEED BY HUSBAND, without wife, under power from both. A deed conveying the husband's land, executed in the name of the husband only, by an attorney in fact, under a power proceeding from the husband and wife, is as effectual as if the wife had joined therein.

POWER OF ATTORNEY — conditions imposed on attorney. In an authority to convey lands, the principal may impose frivolous and impertinent conditions upon his attorney, and, if the conditions are merely indifferent, and not malum prohibitum or malum in se, his will shall be observed.

POWER OF ATTORNEY — condition against public policy. It is against public policy that land records should be incumbered by invalid conveyances purporting to be executed by persons incapable in law, and so holding out empty promises.

A power of attorney, executed by husband and wife, which confers authority to convey lands of the husband, in so far as it requires that the conveyance shall be made in the name of the wife, imposes a condition which the law will not suffer the attorney to perform.

POWER OF ATTORNEY — illegal or void condition. An illegal or void condition inserted in a warrant of attorney may be disregarded by the attorney.

POWER FROM HUSBAND AND WIFE to sell husband's estate — how executed. A power proceeding from husband and wife, as to the estate of the husband, is well executed in his name alone.

DEED valid without acknowledgment. A conveyance is valid between the parties thereto and those having notice thereof though not acknowledged.

In ejectment by a grantor against one who claims title under his grantee, if the execution of the deed is admitted, no question can be raised respecting the certificate of acknowledgment.

DEED — what is sufficient signing by attorney in fact. Where the christian name of an attorney in fact is inserted in the power of attorney and in the deed, a signature to the deed, in which the initial letter of such christian name is used, is sufficient.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE action was ejectment, and the cause was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows: 1st. That the lots mentioned in the declaration in this suit are within, and a part of, the land entered by James Hall, probate judge, etc., under an act of congress, entitled "An act for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the territory of Colorado," approved May 28, 1864. 2d. That said land so entered was duly patented by the United States to the said James Hall, probate judge, etc., by letters patent, bearing date July 1, A. D. 1868. 3d. That, on the 11th day of August, A. D. 1865, the said James Hall, probate judge, etc., duly conveyed the said lots to the plaintiff, Ben Holladay. 4th. That the defendant, Anthony Dailey, was in the possession of the said lots at the time of the commencement of this suit. 5th. That, on the 27th day of September, A. D. 1866, Bela M. Hughes, acting as attorney in fact, for and in the name of the plaintiff, Ben Holladay, made, executed and delivered a conveyance of said lots (with others) to Richard E. Whitsitt, for a valuable consideration paid to said Hughes. 6th. That, in the execution of such last-named conveyance as attorney in fact for the plaintiff, the said Bela M. Hughes acted under and by virtue of a certain letter or power of attorney from Ben Holladay and N. A. Holladay, his wife, of the date of February 13, 1866. 7th. That, under and through said last-mentioned deed, the defendant, or those under whom he claimed to hold said lots, derive title thereto. 8th. That the genuineness of the signatures to the said power of attorney, and the said last-mentioned deed, as well as the signing of the same respectively, is hereby admitted. 9th. That the only question in dispute between the parties hereto is, the legal sufficiency of the said power of attorney from Ben Holladay and wife to Bela M. Hughes, and the deed thereunder, made from Holladay by Hughes, his attorney in fact, to Richard E. Whitsitt, to pass the legal title of the said plaintiff, Holladay, in and to said lots, to the said Whitsitt. 10th. That the exhibits hereto annexed, marked "A" and "B" respectively, are copies of the power of attorney and of the deed last above referred to, together with the certificate of acknowledgment thereunto attached, and said copies shall stand in this stipulation for the original. 11th. The matter in controversy in suit is submitted to the court, without the intervention of the jury, either party having the privilege of submitting such a statement of points and brief of authorities as he sees fit, first furnishing the opposite party with a copy thereof. 12th. If the court be of the opinion that the deed and power of attorney herewith exhibited are sufficient to convey the legal title of Holladay to said lots to Whitsitt, then judgment is to be given for the defendant; if the court be of the opinion they are insufficient to convey said title, then judgment is to be given for the plaintiff.

The substantial parts of the power of attorney referred to are as follows:

"Know all men by these presents that we, Ben Holladay and N. A. Holladay, his wife, of the State of New York, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to us in hand paid, as well as other considerations us thereunto moving, have this day constituted and appointed Bela M. Hughes, of the State of Kansas, our true and lawful agent and attorney in fact for us, and in our names to sell and convey to any purchaser or purchasers for such price or prices as to him may seem best, all or any lots of ground in Denver city, Colorado, in the county of Arapahoe, in said territory, the title to which is now vested in said Ben. Holladay, * * * and the said Ben Holladay and N. A. Holladay, his wife, do hereby authorize said Hughes to proceed to sell said property on such terms as he may consider best for their interest; this power to sell said property and real estate, or any part of it, to continue until the whole of the said property or real estate is sold by their said attorney and agent, and shall extend also fully to all out lots or parcels of ground in and around the said Denver city, and it is provided that, in case of the death of either of the said parties making this power of attorney, no further power shall be necessary to our said attorney in fact and agent, to enable him to complete conveyances for property then sold, or to proceed to sell the same or any part thereof thereafter, but he shall proceed, notwithstanding, to sell and convey said property until the same is all disposed of by him, * * * hereby ratifying and confirming all that the said Hughes may do and perform in the premises under this power of attorney to him given."

The first clause of the deed to Whitsitt was as follows: This indenture, made this 27th day of September, in the year of our Lord, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, between Ben Holladay, of the city and State of New York, by Bela M. Hughes, his duly authorized attorney in fact, party of the first part, and Richard E. Whitsitt, of the city of Denver, party of the second part, witnesseth, etc., etc. The deed was signed, "Ben Holladay, by his attorney in fact, B. M. Hughes." The certificate of acknowledgment attached to the deed was as follows: "On this twenty-ninth day of September, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, before me, a notary public, in and for the county aforesaid, personally came Ben Holladay, by Bela M. Hughes, his attorney in fact, personally known to me to be the same person described in and who executed the within conveyance, and acknowledged that he freely and voluntarily executed the same as the attorney of Ben Holladay, and as the free and voluntary act and deed of the said Ben Holladay therein described."

The objections to the deed from Holladay to Whitsitt were as follows:

First. The attorney in fact deviated from his warrant of authority in making the deed in controversy; and, thereby, made a deed that was entirely unauthorized.

Second. Said deed was not acknowledged in accordance with the laws then in force in Colorado.

Third. Said deed was not subscribed by the attorney in fact, as the laws of Colorado then required.

The district court gave judgment for defendant.

HALLETT, C. J., took no part in the decision.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. B. M. HUGHES and Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. I will consider first the question, whether the letter of attorney under which Hughes acted, or assumed to act, on the conveyance to Whitsitt, imposed as one of the conditions to the exercise of his authority, that the conveyances made in pursuance thereof should be in the names of Holladay and his wife.

This is purely a question of interpretation, and the intent of the instrument is to be derived solely from the words used therein, read in the light which the situation of the parties, so far as this appears, affords.

It is perfectly clear, as we think, that, if the attorney had united Mrs. Holladay with her husband, as grantor, on the conveyance which he assumed to execute, it could have effected no purpose, for, though the wife united in the letter of attorney, she had no dower in the lands, as it would seem was supposed; it has not been shown that she had any other estate vested or contingent upon which her conveyance could operate, and we will not presume such estate in the absence of proof thereof; neither could she have bound herself by any covenant in the conveyance, for, under the statute, as it then stood, the power of the wife to contract extended only to the sale and conveyance of her separate estate, real and personal, and to the carrying on and contracting about any trade or business conducted upon her separate account. Acts 1861, p. 152, §§ 2, 3, 10. All the contracts of a feme covert beyond these limits were still, as they were at common law, absolutely void. The statute did not authorize the wife to warrant her husband's title to realty or to covenant for his act or default in any respect whatever; and, in this case, the wife having no estate in the realty, which she could convey, and having no power to engage in regard to her husband's estate, it is clear that she could not authorize another to so convey or engage for her, and the letter of attorney was, therefore, as to her, absolutely void. It was as if her name had not been inserted in it, or subscribed to it, the attorney could do no act thereunder which should in any way charge her estate, or bind her, or those in privity with her.

The conveyance which the attorney did make was quite as effectual to this, as if her name had been inserted therein, and by him, or by herself, indeed, subscribed thereto.

Nevertheless, if the husband, by the letter of attorney, has required that all conveyances thereunder shall be in the joint names of himself and the wife, then, howsoever empty and profitless the form, the attorney was not on this account merely' at liberty to disregard it. The principal, in an authority to convey lands, may, I suppose, lawfully require that the conveyance shall be upon parchment or attested by certain witnesses, or shall be by deed indented, and not otherwise, or he may impose any other frivolous and impertinent condition which caprice may suggest; and the mere vanity and ineptitude of the condition will not avoid it; for, though the law requires it not, yet the owner of the lands may; and if the condition be merely indifferent, and not either malum prohibitum nor malum in se, his will shall be observed.

But here, as I think, the condition which it is said was imposed upon the exercise of the agent's authority was not only vain, but illegal; for it is manifestly against public policy, that our land records should be incumbered by invalid conveyances, purporting to be executed by persons incapable in law, and so holding out empty promises. If such conveyances be tolerated — if one may do by another what he may not do in his own person — if the husband may, by way of condition or in any other way, authorize the attorney whom he alone has constituted to subscribe the wife's name to a deed by which she cannot be bound, inserting therein covenants and recitals which assume or purport to be hers, it may probably happen that ignorant and incautious persons will be led to purchase the estate on the faith of the wife's supposed ability and liability to respond in damages in case of the failure of title, or on the faith of some imagined estoppel. If one may, in this manner, assume to have authorized his wife's name to be subscribed to a conveyance or covenant, I do not see why he may not exercise the same liberty with that of his neighbor. Certainly, the recognition of such a power or right will serve no good purpose, and it may breed uncertainty in titles and unprofitable litigation.

I am therefore of opinion that the construction for which the counsel for plaintiff in error has so ingeniously contended will render the letter of attorney nugatory, for, by this construction, it imposes a condition precedent, which the law will not suffer the attorney to perform, and it is said that if one grant an estate upon condition precedent which it is unlawful to perform, here, both the estate and the condition are void, for an estate can neither commence nor increase upon an unlawful condition (Shepherd's Touchstone, 132), and so I conceive is the law where a power is sought to be created upon like condition. Though, possibly, it may better be likened to a bond with condition repugnant to mere positive law, in which case it is said the condition only is void, and the bond shall stand single (2 Bl. Com. 300), but I think not.

Therefore, to effectuate the manifest purpose of the principal — namely, to convert these lands, which were at a distance from his place of residence, and so beyond his personal supervision and control, into money — and in order that the letter of attorney may not utterly fail of effect, I think we are authorized to read it as if the name of the wife were not contained therein (as in effect it is not) and as if the authority had been in terms “for me and in my name to convey,” etc.

And this, though it may seem to do violence to the text of the instrument, is warranted by authority; for it is said that: “If divers join in a deed and some are able, and some are not able, this shall be said to be his deed alone that is able” (Shepherd's Touchstone, 81), that is to say, the words of grant, confirmation and the like, which are written in the plural shall be read in the singular, for if taken in the plural, there are none to whom they can be ascribed.

As to the other questions which have been argued, we think that the conveyance of the attorney, under which the defendant derives title, was well enough executed, and that whether it was acknowledged in conformity with the statute or not is a matter of indifference, for the acknowledgment is but a means of proving the execution and authenticating the record, when the instrument shall be thereafter recorded; and the statute which requires it being in the affirmative, and without any negative implication to exclude the common law, the conveyance will be valid, as between the parties thereto and those having notice thereof, even though not acknowledged at all. The judgment of the district court is therefore affirmed.

PRACTICE—bill of exceptions, when it should be signed. A bill of exceptions must be signed during the term at which the judgment or opinion excepted to is given, unless a day in vacation is allowed therefor by order of the court.

PRACTICE—objection waived by joining in error. But if a defendant join in error, he thereby waives the objection that the bill of exceptions was filed in vacation without an order of court, and all matters appearing in the transcript, which are esteemed in law to form part of the record, will be considered by the court.

NEW TRIAL—*presumption in favor of finding. Where an issue of fact is submitted to the judge at nisi prius, he performs the functions of both court and jury, and the same presumption must be indulged to sustain his finding as would be made in favor of the verdict of a jury.

NEW TRIAL—sufficiency of evidence to support verdict. Where the evidence is conflicting, and the question is upon the credibility of the witnesses, a new trial will not be granted.

COSTS ON APPEAL FROM JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—power to apportion discretionary. The power conferred by section 16, chapter 19, Revised Statutes, 156, to apportion costs on appeal from justice of the peace, is to be exercised in the discretion of the district court, and error cannot be assigned upon the ruling of the district court in relation thereto.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

THE action was brought before a justice of the peace, and thence appealed to the district court. At the trial in the district court, the plaintiff testified : That in the month of December, 1870, he worked for the defendant five and one-half days in a drift, at taking out coal, and that the same was worth four dollars per day ; that, before commencing said work, he agreed with defendant to take out and deliver, at the mouth of said drift, the coal, and was to have two dollars per ton for what he took out and so delivered ; that he did not know how much coal he did take out, but took out several loads ; that he bought of the defendant two pick-eyes, worth seventy-five cents each, and a piece of steel of about eight pounds weight, and had the use of defendants' mule three days, at one dollar per day, in taking out coal, and had not paid defendant for same or either, and defendant was entitled to credit for same ; that he did not know what the steel was worth ; that he worked for defendant ten and one-half days at quarrying and removing rock, which work was worth per day three and one-half dollars ; that before beginning said rock work, he agreed with defendant to make an excavation in a bank, thirty-three feet in length, three feet in width, and, on an average, about eleven feet high, the same being almost nothing in height where he was to commence digging in the bank, and about twenty feet at the back part of said excavation ; that he agreed to make said excavation for the sum of fifty dollars, to commence work thereon immediately ; no time agreed for the payment therefor ; that he worked at said excavation ten and a half days ; that the charge made in his account on file for ten and a half days' work was for work done at said excavation ; that he commenced and did said work immediately after making said contract, which was in November, A. D. 1870 ; that witness considered that he had completed the said excavation according to contract ; that he measured the said excavation by stepping off lengthwise, and the width thereof by a scraper which scraper he measured with his hands ; that, while plaintiff was still engaged at the work on said excavation, the defendant appeared and claimed that it was not yet completed, according to the contract, and desired the plaintiff to do certain things in order to the completion of the same, which the plaintiff refused to do and therefore quit work on said excavation.

Michael Hollorum testified : That he worked upon said excavation for the plaintiff, and helped measure the same by stepping the length thereof, and by measuring the width thereof with a scraper, previously measured with his hands, and the same measured about thirty-three feet in length, and about three feet in width.

The defendant testified : That the plaintiff had agreed to take out what coal he took from drift for two dollars per ton ; that the plaintiff took out in all only two tons of coal and no more ; that plaintiff had the use of defendant's mule in taking out said coal three days, worth one dollar per day for the use of said mule, the plaintiff, by agreement, was to allow the defendant ; that defendant let plaintiff have two pick-eyes, for which, by agreement, the plaintiff was to allow defendant one dollar and fifty cents ; that plaintiff got a piece of steel of defendant worth two and a half or three dollars, for which plaintiff was to allow defendant what the said steel was worth ; that defendant had never at any time employed the plaintiff to work for him by the day, and the plaintiff had never worked by the day for him at any kind of work ; that the work done by plaintiff at quarrying and removing rock, was performed under contract ; that the contract was as made by plaintiff and defendant ; that the plaintiff was to make for the sum of fifty dollars, to be paid when the work was completed, a certain excavation, thirty-three feet long, two and a half feet wide, and, on the average, eleven feet high ; that the excavation was to be made into a bank, and the way they came to call it eleven feet high, was, that they first measured the bank to ascertain the quantity of dirt and rock to be moved, and the same being about nothing in height when it begun, and about twenty feet high at the back part, they called it eleven feet high on an average ; that the plaintiff did not complete said work according to contract, and that it had afterward cost defendant thirty-seven and one-half dollars in cash for hired help to finish said excavation, as the plaintiff had agreed to make it ; that the plaintiff did not do more than one-half the work necessary to complete said excavation, and voluntarily abandoned the same without finishing it.

John Armor testified : That plaintiff told him he was to have $50 for making the excavation ; plaintiff also told him that the excavation was to be three feet wide and thirty-three feet long, and that the same would average about eleven feet high ; witness saw the excavation after it had been abandoned by plaintiff, and that fully one-half or more of the work necessary to be done to complete the excavation according to contract, as witness learned from plaintiff, was left undone.

The court gave judgment for the plaintiff and against the defendant for $25 damages, and for costs of suit.

The plaintiff had judgment before the justice of the peace for $42 damages, and for costs, and it was assigned for error in this court that the district court erred in rendering judgment against appellant for all of the costs of the suit. It was also assigned for error that the finding of the district court was against the evidence.

Mr. A. H. DE FRANCE, for appellant.

Mr. GEORGE W. PURKINS, for appellee.

WELLS, J. By the record which has been certified to us in this case, it appears that the bill of exceptions taken by the plaintiff in error was not filed until the lapse of nearly sixty days after the adjournment of the term at which the judgment complained of was given, and the record fails to show that time was given to present such bill of exceptions.

According to all the authorities, and, indeed, by the letter of the statute, the bill of exceptions must be signed during the term at which the judgment or opinion excepted to is given, unless a day in vacation is allowed therefor by order of the court. Rev. Stat., ch. 70, § 21.

And, according to some cases, if the record fails to show such order, and that the bill of exceptions was filed within the time limited, it cannot be considered in the appellate court, even though, as it would seem, the objection is not suggested by counsel. Moffit v. Pollard, 19 Ind. 178; Cable v. Smoyer, id. 202; Pick v. Vankirk, 15 id. 159; Hance v. Miller, 21 Ill. 637.

We think, however, that the verbal agreement of the parties or of counsel may supply the absence of such order of court, and the defendant in error having joined in error and assented to the submission of the cause upon written argument, we will construe this as implying a stipulation that all matters appearing in the transcript and which are esteemed in law to form a part of the record are properly certified to us.

But accepting the bill of exceptions which is set out in the record as properly before us, we are not able to see that any error was committed in the court below.

The only question in issue between the parties was, whether the plaintiff had fully performed the contract for grading and excavation which constituted the principal item of his account, and upon this question, we must presume, unless the contrary clearly appears, that the court below found correctly.

Where an issue of fact is submitted to the determination of the judge at nisi prius he performs the functions of both court and jury; he is the exclusive judge of the credibility of witnesses, and in the court of review the same presumption must be indulged to sustain his finding, as would be made in favor of the verdict of a jury, if the issue had been submitted to a jury.

We must, therefore, presume that his honor, who presided below, regarded the witnesses who were sworn on the part of the defendant below (or some of them) as unworthy of credit; and we, who have not heard the witnesses, and cannot draw conclusions from their manner and bearing in giving testimony, cannot say that he has erred.

The finding of the court below, therefore, cannot be said to be erroneous; and if there is any error apparent in the amount allowed to plaintiff below for his damages, it is not an error of which his adversary can be heard to complain.

Neither can it be assigned for error that the court below omitted to apportion the costs, for this is a matter purely in the discretion of the court.

Let the judgment of the Jefferson district court be affirmed, with costs.

NEW TRIAL — sufficiency of evidence to support verdict. Where the evidence is conflicting, and the question is upon the credibility of the witnesses, a new trial will not be granted.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

ASSUMPSIT for work, labor and services rendered.

At the trial, the plaintiff, E. A. Reser, testified that plaintiffs were real estate agents, and that Glines, one of the defendants, applied to him to sell a brick house and lots, on which the same was located, at the price of $7,000; that there was nothing said as to the commission to be charged for making such sale; that the customary charge was five per cent up to $3,000, and three per cent on all sums above $3,000; that he had several conversations with one B about the property, and that he advised B to purchase it, and that B did purchase it.

E. G. Matthews, one of the plaintiffs, testified that he had several conversations with B about the property; that, upon one occasion, B told witness that defendants had reduced the price to $6,500, and that B said that he would take the property at that price. Witness subsequently told defendant Glines that B would take the property at the price named; that Glines then said he could not have it at that price. Glines came to plaintiffs' office a few minutes afterward and told plaintiffs to make the sale at $6,500. Witness did not remember that he said any thing further to B. Witness testified that the customary rate for selling city property was five per cent on the first $3,000, three per cent over $3,000 up to $8,000, and two per cent on all over $8,000. Dr. J. F. Bancroft testified: That he had several conversations with plaintiffs, and with one Hyatt Hussey, about the property, and that he negotiated the purchase of the property with Hussey. Plaintiffs also proved a conveyance, made by defendants, to George A. Jarvis, for the property in question, which conveyance was so made by direction of Dr. Bancroft.

George Glines, one of the defendants, testified that he never had any conversation with Matthews in regard to the property; that Matthews said to him at one time, that he was a member of the firm of Matthews & Reser, and that he had been trying to sell the property in question to Dr. B.; that witness subsequently called at Matthews & Reser's office, and told them if Dr. B. came there, to tell him the property was not for sale, and that he could not have it. Witness further testified, that Reser once asked him if he had sold the Tom Smith property; he said Dr. B. had been bothering them about it a good deal; he said, What do you ask for it! I told him we asked $7,000; he said, I don't think he will give that; I said, all right, he can't have it for any less. Witness afterward asked Reser who authorized him to sell the property; he said Mr. Hussey; witness said that was all right; any thing Mr. Hussey does is all right; after the property was sold, Reser came into witness' office and said, ain't you going to allow us some commissions on that sale up there? Witness said, what sale? he said, the Tom Smith property. Witness told him, I did not authorize you to sell that property; Reser said Mr. Hussey did; witness said, all right, go to Hussey and collect commissions of him; witness told him that he, witness, did not owe him any thing; witness further testified that he never employed the plaintiffs to sell the property.

Hyatt Hussey testified as follows: I was the party that sold the property described in the deed; Mr. Reser came to me one day and said he had sold the property, along about the middle of March, and told me the property was sold; I asked him who gave him the property for sale; he told me Mr. Glines; I then asked him the terms of sale; he told me the property was sold for $7,000 to Dr. Bancroft, and that Dr. B. would come to the office and let me know to whom to draw the deed; about an hour afterward, Dr. B. came to the office and positively refused to take the property at $7,000, but offered $6,800, which I declined; we had conversation on the subject two or three times a week, and some three weeks after that the sale was finally made.

The court found for the defendants.

Messrs. BROWN & PUTNAM, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. M. BENEDICT and Mr. JOHN F. BOSTWICK, for defendants in error.

Per CURIAM. This case must be governed by the principle of Murphy v. Cunningham, ante 467.

The only error complained of is, that the judgment should have been for the plaintiffs and not for the defendants, as by the record appears.

The evidence was conflicting, and whether judgment should have gone for the plaintiffs, or against them, depends upon whether credit was due to the witnesses called for them, or to those who were called for their adversary. The judge who presided below, and before whom the issue was tried without a jury, gave credit to the latter, and it does not lie with us to review his action in this regard.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

CENTRAL CITY WATER COMPANY v. KIMBER et al.

PRACTICE — what must be expressed in a special case. Where parties waive process and pleading, and come before the court upon an agreed case, the nature of the relief sought must be expressed in the agreement.

JURISDICTION — upon a special case or statement of facts. In such case the court acquires jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, by force of the agreement, and if nothing is expressed as to the judgment or decree to be rendered upon the facts stated, the court is not empowered to do any thing whatever in the premises.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

THERE was neither process nor pleading in the court below; the parties filed a paper as follows :

This agreement, made and entered into this 15th day of October, A. D. 1871, by and between the Central City Water Company and E. L. Salisbury, Job V. Kimber, Erasmus Garrott, Lawrence Miley, Robert W. Mead, — Borham, William Fuller, Henry W. Lake, mill owners on North Clear creek,

Witnesseth : That, whereas, there is a dispute pending between said company and said mill owners, as to the right of said company to take and divert the waters of Peck gulch, and to run the same into Central City for public and private use, to wit : for fire purposes and use in houses and mills ; and, whereas, it is desirable that said dispute be speedily, and once for always, settled by legal adjudication without reference to technicalities, etc. Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, it is hereby agreed :

1. That the said water company is duly incorporated under chapter 18, Revised Statutes of Colorado, and under all the several sections of said chapter relating to ditches and flumes, subject to all liabilities, and entitled to all benefits given by said chapter and said sections.

2. That the said company propose to take water out of Peck gulch, a tributary of North Clear creek, at a point about one hundred rods above its mouth, and convey water to Central by route designated ; and that such water is thus diverted from North Clear creek, and does not reach it again, if at all, till at a point below a majority of the mills on North Clear creek.

3. That the mills owned by said mill owners are all situate on North Clear creek, at distances varying from two to four miles below the mouth of Peck gulch, and have been run and used by the present owners and grantors for periods of from two to ten years, and are both water and steam; and that a certain amount of water is needed for each mill, both for the batteries and for steam purposes, all of which, as well as for water power, when used, has heretofore been taken from said North Clear creek.

4. It is also admitted and agreed, that, in a dry season of the year, the water is insufficient to use as an economic water power without the aid of steam, but is, most of the time, sufficient to supply the batteries and water for steam purposes.

5. It is also agreed and admitted, there is at least one stream running into said Clear creek below the mouth of Peck, and above all, or nearly all, of the mills.

6. It is further agreed, that this case shall be submitted to the district court of Gilpin county, at November session, upon the facts above set forth, and the evidence to be taken and presented as hereinafter mentioned; and that the matter in dispute shall be submitted to said court at all events and without any delay or postponement, and that the decision of said court as to the right of said water company to take the water from said Peck gulch shall be final, except in case either party may wish to appeal, in which case such appeal may be taken to the supreme court, and this agreement and the evidence taken shall, together with the record, be taken as the record in this case, and such appeal shall be heard upon such record at the next session of the supreme court, and neither party shall be allowed to postpone the hearing thereof for any cause whatever.

It is further agreed, that, upon final decision of this cause, either by the district court or by the supreme court, both parties shall submit and make no attempt to deprive the other of any right adjudged to belong to them or it, or to interfere with the waters of Peck gulch so as to diminish the flow legally going to the other, except upon agreement duly made.

It is further agreed, that no process need be issued herein ; that upon filing of this agreement with the clerk of the district court at its next session, all parties hereto shall be in said court, and subject to its jurisdiction, and that the costs in this case shall be paid, one-half by said company, and one-half by the mill owners.

It is also agreed, that each party shall choose a competent engineer, who shall choose a third, who shall make an accurate measurement of the water running in Peck gulch, both at its mouth, and at a point directly above the point from which the company propose to take the water out, and also the amount of increase of water by reason of the bed rock ditch, dug by said company. Also the amount of water running in North Clear creek, immediately above the mouth of Peck gulch, the amount running in said creek, immediately above Missouri gulch, and the amount running in said creek, at a point near the mill known as the Mammoth Company's mill, as well as the amount running in Missouri gulch, and report the same, under oath, to the court, at said November session, and lastly, all other testimony desired by either party may be taken in writing before the clerk of said court, on three days' notice, in writing, upon either Hugh Butler, Esq., or G. B. Reed, Esq., for the mill owners, or upon Willard or H. M. Teller, on part of the company ; such testimony to be taken in time, so as to not delay, in any manner, the hearing of said cause, and that no attempt shall be made by said company to take the water of said Peck gulch until a final decision has been had in the district or supreme court, except upon postponement of said hearing and decision by the said mill owners.

In witness whereof the parties have hereunto set their hands.

Edw. L. Salisbury, Job V. Kimber, L. C. Miley, Robert W. Mead, Kimber, and Fullerton, H. W. Lake.

The court found for the plaintiffs, Kimber et al., and that the said defendant had not the right to take and divert the water of Peck gulch in said county, and to run the same into Central City in said county, for defendant's private purposes, to wit, for fire purposes, and for use in houses and mills.

Judgment was given against the defendant for costs.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellant.

Mr. G. B. REID, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. These parties appeared in the court below, with a statement of facts signed by appellees only, from which it appears that they desired an adjudication of some kind as to the right of appellant to divert the waters of Peck gulch from their natural channel. It does not appear that the waters of Peck gulch have been diverted, but it is stated that appellant proposes to do so, and the only paragraph in the agreed statement which conveys any information as to the nature of the relief sought is that in which it is agreed that the decision of the court as to the right of appellant to divert the waters of Peck gulch shall be final. Usually a special case or statement of facts is made in a cause pending, where the nature of the relief sought is sufficiently indicated by the form of action. But if parties waive process and pleading, and come before the court upon a naked statement of facts, there is nothing in the record to show what relief is desired unless it is expressed in the agreement itself. The court acquires jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter in such case by force of the agreement, and if nothing is expressed as to the judgment or decree, to be rendered upon the facts stated, the court is not empowered to do any thing whatever in the premises. Courts are established to administer the law in cases of specific injury, and to render judgments and decrees is the essential power conferred upon them. All judicial proceedings are instituted and maintained for the purpose of obtaining specific relief, and this does not appear to have been directed to that end. If parties may go before a court with a naked statement of facts, and demand information as to their rights, without more, our courts will become schools of instruction, with little time to attend to their proper and legitimate duties. The question propounded in this record is interesting and probably important, but we must decline to answer it. When it becomes necessary to determine the rights of these parties, for the purpose of affording relief to either of them, we will cheerfully perform that duty, but we cannot engage in an idle discussion which would be without any definite result or legal character. The court below was authorized by the agreement of the parties to divide the costs of the proceeding between them, and this was not done, but all the costs were adjudged against appellant. As the matter of costs only was within the jurisdiction of the court, we do not think it necessary to remand the cause for the purpose of securing a correct judgment upon that point, and therefore the judgment will be reversed.

Reversed.

GILPIN v. WATTS.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—title to land. A vendor who seeks specific performance of a contract for a sale of land must, in his bill of complaint, set forth his readiness and ability to make a good title to the land.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—decree should extend to the whole contract. Upon bill by vendor against vendee to enforce specific performance of contract for sale of land, the defendant cannot be required to pay the purchase-money, or, in default thereof, to surrender the contract to be canceled, except upon the condition that the complainant convey the land to him.

POSSESSION OF LAND obtained under contract of purchase. Where a vendee of land has obtained possession from the vendor under a contract of purchase, if he refuses to pay the purchase-money, and accept the vendor's title, he must surrender the possession. And this, although the vendor has not a good title.

PRACTICE—how possession may be recovered. And the vendor may recover possession of the land in a suit to enforce specific performance of the contract.

PLEADING—prayer for possession need not be special. In such case the complainant may have relief under the general prayer.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE complainant alleged in his bill, that, on the 17th of February, 1862, he entered into a contract with William Gilpin, defendant, for the sale of certain land granted to the heirs of Luis Maria Baca, by the act of congress entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the territory of New Mexico," approved June 21, 1860 (12 Stat. at Large, 72). That, by the terms of said contract, he sold to the defendant one of the grants or claims of land mentioned in said act of congress, which was estimated to contain one hundred thousand acres of land, for the sum of thirty cents per acre, payable in five equal annual installments, commencing two years after the date of sale; the purchase-money to bear interest at five per cent per annum from the date of sale, payable semi-annually, the first payment of interest to be made with the first installment of purchase-money. That defendant was to locate the tract of land, and complainant was to convey the same to him in fee simple when the same should be located, paid for and surveyed. That, at defendant's request, the tract or grant was located on a tract of land then in the territory of New Mexico, but now in the county of Saguache, in the territory of Colorado, which tract was described in the bill, and it was alleged that it amounted to 99,289 $\frac{29}{100}$ acres. Complainant further alleged that he had obtained a conveyance in fee simple from the heirs of Baca to the said tract of land, a copy of which was attached to the bill as an exhibit.

This conveyance, as appeared from the copy attached to the bill, contained the names of about sixty-five grantors, of whom some had executed it, and others had not. A person had subscribed his name to the conveyance as attorney in fact for the heirs of various parties, but the names of such heirs were not subscribed. There were other objections to the conveyance, which it is not necessary to mention. Complainant further alleged that he had tendered to defendant a deed for the land, and that the purchase-money had not, nor had any part thereof, been paid to him, and that such purchase-money was still due and unpaid. It was further alleged that, at the time of the contract, the defendant entered into possession of the land, and had retained the possession thereof. The defendant demurred to the bill for want of equity, and because the complainant did not show in his bill, title in fee simple to the land. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant stood by it. Upon the coming in of the master's report, the defendant excepted thereto, which exceptions were overruled, and the court decreed that there was due the complainant on the contract the sum of $42,267.68, and that the defendant pay the same to complainant within sixty days, and in default of such payment, that the defendant be forever barred and foreclosed of all equity of redemption, etc., and that the defendant surrender the said contract to be canceled, etc.

MESSRS. MILLER & MARKHAM, and MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, for appellant.

MR. JOHN S. WATTS, pro se.

MR. S. E. BROWNE and MR. ALFRED SAYRE, of counsel for appellee.

WELLS, J. Three questions, arising upon this record, appear to us entitled to consideration. First. Does the complainant's bill make a case for the interposition of equity to compel specific performance? Second. Assuming the bill to have sufficiently stated a case for specific performance, is the decree which was given below the proper decree upon such case? Third. Was there error in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complainant's bill?

The resolution of the first of these questions depends upon whether the exhibits attached to the bill, and which are therein prayed to be taken as a part thereof, shall be considered as a part of the bill in such sense that, upon demurrer, the court may look into the exhibits and receive what appears therein to falsify the complainant's express allegations. The complainant contracted to give a perfect title, and specific performance cannot be decreed at his suit unless he be prepared to furnish such perfect title ; and his readiness and ability to do this ought, we think, to be affirmatively set forth in the bill, for so are the precedents ; though it is held that, if he show himself able to make a good title at the time of final decree, this will satisfy the averment.

Now, if we are to consider the exhibits as a part of the bill, in the sense in which counsel have assumed that they are ; it may well be doubted whether complainant has such a title as he has contracted to convey. But whether the exhibits are a part of the bill in this sense, and so are brought into view upon demurrer, is a question upon which we are not agreed.

But, however the first question may be resolved, we are all of opinion that the second must be answered in the negative, for, assuming that the complainant's bill sufficiently makes out his equity to have the contract which is set up specifically performed, yet the court below has decreed that the defendant below, by a day limited, make payment of the purchase-money, or, in default of such payment, surrender the contract to be canceled ; and there is no requirement upon the complainant to make the conveyance which was the consideration of the defendant's promise to pay. That is to say, the defendant is required to perform on his part, and complainant is at liberty to perform, or omit to perform, at his own option.

It is true that the bill contains an offer to produce, subject to the order of the court, the conveyance which, it is averred, complainant had before tendered to the defendant ; but there is nothing to show that such conveyance was, in fact, ever brought into court or delivered to any officer of court ; and the original cause being determined by the final decree, it appears to us doubtful whether the defendant has any remedy to compel its production. The decree ought to be a final determination of the whole controversy, so far as the case made warrants. The purchaser ought not to be required to pay the purchase-money, and then resort to his motion or bill of review, or other process, if there be any effectual to this end, to secure a conveyance.

As to the third question: The argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error upon this point rests upon two assumptions, namely: 1. That the conveyance of Baca's heirs, alleged to have been executed to the complainant, is to be taken as a part of the bill or demurrer; and, 2. That unless complainant's bill shows a case for specific performance, which is the relief specially prayed, he can have no relief whatever. To the first of these, as before said, we are not prepared to assent, and the latter we conceive to be opposed to both reason and authority. For though, when it is doubtful to what relief in particular the complainant, upon the state of facts, is entitled, the bill ought technically to be framed with a double aspect, or with a prayer for alternative relief, yet nothing is better settled than that when specific relief in one form only is prayed, and this relief cannot be granted, the court may, nevertheless, when the bill contains the general prayer, grant any relief consistent with the facts stated, unless in the particular case this course would operate to surprise the defendant.

Now in this case the bill alleges and the demurrer admits that the defendant has enjoyed the lands which are the subject of the controversy, his possession being derived from the complainant, since the year 1863; and granting, for the argument sake, that the complainant is not able to make out such a title as the defendant contracted for, nevertheless the defendant, if he will not accept such title as the complainant tenders, ought certainly not to retain this possession. He cannot have both the lands and the money which he has agreed to pay for the lands. Smith v. Lloyd, 1 Madd. 56; Clark v. Willson, 15 Vesey, 317; Tindall v. Cobham, 6 M. & K. 385.

It appears by the English cases, which I have cited, that where there is a controversy as to the title tendered, and the purchaser has already been let into possession, the court will, on mere motion, require him to either bring the purchase-money into court or yield up the possession. I do not see that it is said that the bill must, on its face, show a case for specific performance in order to entitle the vendor to his motion, nor upon principle ought this to be required; for when the vendor's bill does aver his ability to make title, his right to the provisional alternative relief, by motion, as practiced in the English courts, rests not at all upon this averment, but upon the principle that he ought not to be deprived of the lands, nor kept out of possession thereof without compensation, even though his title be defective. To have afforded such relief would certainly, therefore, have been consistent with the case made by the bill, whether the title there set up be a perfect title, or otherwise. Neither could it have occasioned surprise or prejudice to the defendant, for it would have been the same relief which the bill prays specifically, though in less degree.

We are of opinion, therefore, that no error was committed in overruling the demurrer to complainant's bill.

For the error in the final decree, however, that decree will be reversed, and the cause is now remanded to the district court for further proceedings according to equity.

Reversed.

ANDERSON et al. v. SLOAN, Administrator.

PRACTICE—affidavit denying execution of instrument sued on. An affidavit accompanying a plea of non est factum must follow the plea so far as to deny the execution of the instrument sued on.

Where it is alleged in a declaration on an appeal bond, that defendants executed the bond by the name and style of T. G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt, an affidavit in which it is averred that the defendants did not make their said supposed writing obligatory, signed Thomas G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt, is not sufficient to deny the execution of the instrument.

PLEADING—nil debet in debt on a specialty. In an action on an appeal bond the plea of nil debet is bad.

SURETY IN APPEAL BOND cannot require obligee to proceed against his principal. In an action on an appeal bond, a plea by a surety in the bond that execution has not been sued out on the judgment from which the appeal was taken is bad.

PLEADING in debt on appeal bond. In an action on an appeal bond by an administrator of the obligee, a plea interposed by a surety in the bond to the effect that, if the plaintiff, as administrator, etc., has been damnified, it is because of the wrong and default of his intestate, is bad.

WAIVER OF DEMURRER by going to trial. If, after filing a demurrer to the declaration, a defendant proceeds to trial on the merits, he thereby waives his demurrer, and cannot object in this court that the issue thereon remains undetermined.

WAIVER OF ISSUE OF FACT by going to trial. And in such case the defendant cannot object that there was no issue of fact. If he appear at the trial and proceed as upon issue joined, he must abide the result.

RECORD of defendants' appearance at trial. Where the record recites that the defendants appeared at the trial, the presumption is that all were present who had been served with process.

PLEADING denying execution of instrument must be verified. If a plea denying the execution of the instrument sued on is put in without oath, the execution of the instrument need not be proved.

JUDGMENT in action of debt—form. In an action of debt, a judgment in the form used in actions of assumpsit is erroneous.

PRACTICE—where error in form of judgment. But if no error appears prior to the verdict, the cause will be remanded, with leave to plaintiff to move the court below for the proper judgment.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

MR. H. R. HUNT and MR. ALFRED SAYRE, for appellants.

MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT, for appellee.

BELFORD, J. This was an action on an appeal bond, instituted in the Arapahoe district court by the appellee against the appellants. The declaration charges that the defendants below, Thomas G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt, under the name and style of T. G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt, executed their certain writing obligatory, sealed with their seals, etc., and conditioned as follows: The condition of this obligation is such, that, whereas, the said John G. Sloan, etc., did, on the 26th day of April, 1868, in the district court, etc., recover a judgment against the above bounden Thomas G. Anderson, for the sum of $1,200, etc., from which said judgment the said Thomas G. Anderson, did, etc., sue out of the supreme court. etc., a writ of error, removing said cause from the district to the supreme court, and which writ of error was to operate as a supersedeas. Now, if the above bounden Thomas G. Anderson shall duly prosecute his said writ of error, and shall pay said judgment, costs, interest and damages in case said judgment shall be affirmed, then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect. It is further averred, that the judgment was duly affirmed by the supreme court, and that Anderson has failed and refused to pay said judgment and costs, or any part thereof, according to the letter and effect of the said writing obligatory, whereby, etc., an action has accrued, etc.

To this declaration, Hunt filed several pleas. 1st. Non est factum. 2d. Amounting to nil debet. 3d. That he had signed the bond as surety, and that no execution had been issued on the original judgment by Sloan against Anderson. 4th. That if the plaintiff or his intestate has been damnified, it is owing to their own laches, etc.

Anderson filed a general demurrer, and also assigned special causes — which demurrer remained undisposed of at the time of the trial.

As to Scudder, the record shows the following plea: "And the said defendants, Edwin Scudder and Thomas G. Anderson, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that the said writing obligatory in said declaration mentioned is not his deed, and of this he puts himself on the country, etc., (signed) Edwin Scudder, by Alfred and Daniel Sayre, his attorneys."

The plaintiff filed a demurrer to the second, third and fourth pleas interposed by Hunt, and also a motion to strike out the verification to the plea of non est factum. The demurrer and motion were sustained by the court, and this action of the court constitutes one of the errors assigned.

The verification to the plea of non est factum was in the following form:

The said defendant, A. C. Hunt, by way of verification to the plea by him above pleaded, being duly sworn, upon oath says: "That he and the said defendants, Thomas G. Anderson and Edwin Scudder, at the time when, etc., in the said declaration mentioned, or at any other time, did not make their said supposed writing obligatory, signed Thomas G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt. (Signed) A. C. Hunt, sworn and subscribed," etc.

It is evident that this verification is evasive and in no manner responsive to the allegation of the declaration. It was not charged that the writing obligatory sued on was signed Thomas G. Anderson, Edwin Scudder and A. C. Hunt. The person making this affidavit could readily swear to the statements therein contained, and when the oath was so taken, the execution of the bond set out in the declaration would remain undenied. It is equally clear that the affiant did not intend to deny the execution of the bond as charged.

The court committed no error in striking this verification from the files. King v. Haines, 23 Ill. 341.

As to the plea of nil debet it is clearly bad; no principle of law being better settled than that this is an improper plea to an action of debt upon a specialty or deed where it is the foundation of an action. Sneed v. Wister, 8 Wheat. 694; 6 Blatchford, 162.

The third and fourth pleas are no better. The condition of the bond is, that if the judgment be affirmed, the parties executing the obligation shall pay the judgment, damages and costs. It was not necessary that an execution should be sued out on the judgment before a right of action would accrue on the bond. As between the obligors and obligees, all the obligors are principal debtors, though, as between each other, they may have the rights and remedies resulting from the relation of principal and surety. As long as the obligee does no act varying the terms of the original contract, he has the same claim upon the sureties that he has upon the principal for the payment of the bond.

It is objected in the argument, though not specially assigned as error, that the trial below was wrong, Anderson's demurrer remaining undisposed of. We are aware that in Gray v. Cooper, 5 Ind. 506, and Waldo v. Richter, 17 id. 634, it has been held error to proceed to trial of issues of fact before the jury, where issues of law remain undis-posed of; but we are not at liberty to follow these cases, even if we concurred in the reasons assigned in their support.

In the case of Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet. 85, this precise point was involved, and the court held that the irregularity was waived by the defendant going to trial upon the merits, and that he could not avail himself of it in the appellate court. Regarding the plea, above alluded to, as the individual plea of Scudder, the record shows that the "defendants" submitted to trial on the merits, and that the defendants made their motion for a new trial, and the judgment was rendered against the "defendants."

In the case of Kirby v. Holmes, 6 Ind. 33, it is held, that if a judgment be rendered in form against the defendants, it will be presumed to be against all of them.

The record shows that the defendants were all personally served with process, and that they appeared to the action by their attorneys, and when they submitted to a trial on the merits, we cannot do otherwise than presume that it amounted to a waiver of the demurrer on the part of Anderson.

Of course the presumption spoken of by the supreme court of Indiana would not obtain when there was no service of process or personal appearance. It must be understood as applying to cases where the word "defendants" may embrace, and should be understood to embrace, all the defendants who, as the record showed, might and should be embraced in the judgment. Clagget v. Blanchard, 8 Dana, 43; Violet v. Waters, 1 J. J. Marsh. 303.

It may be claimed, however, that, although the demurrer was waived, still there was no issue as to Anderson, and hence a mistrial. We cannot allow the defendant, after permitting the cause to proceed as though issue had been joined, to take advantage of that fact in this court.

It is claimed by the appellants that the court erred in allowing the bond to go in evidence; that there was a variance between that offered and the one declared upon. We think not. The bond was set out in the declaration in hæc verba. The obligation offered corresponded with that set out. There was no sworn plea denying the execution of the bond, and it was not necessary to furnish any proof of its execution. Non est factum was the general issue at common law in actions on bonds, and its office was to put in issue the execution of the deed sued on. It was not necessary that the plea should be verified. In this territory the term non est factum is and has been applied to all pleas, answers and replies that deny the execution of a written instrument constituting the foundation of the previous pleading answered by such denial; but such pleading has not been regarded as having the effect to put in issue the execution of any written instrument, but only its existence, unless the pleading was verified by oath.

We are clearly of the opinion that no error was committed by the court below in allowing the bond to be read in evidence. The other assignments of error are, in our judgment, equally untenable.

The judgment, however, will have to be reversed, it being entered in assumpsit instead of debt. But as a careful examination has failed to show any error previous to the finding of the verdict, and inasmuch as it is sufficient to sustain a judgment, we deem it unnecessary to award a venire facias de novo, but we reverse the judgment and remand the cause, with leave to plaintiff to move the court below for a judgment on the verdict. And the court below is directed to enter the proper judgment.

Reversed.

DEMURRER—WAIVER BY GOING TO TRIAL.—A demurrer is waived by going to trial on the merits, leaving the issues raised by the demurrer undetermined, and the party cannot afterwards complain that they were not determined: Danielson v. Gude, 11 Colo. 94.

ANDRE v. JONES.

APPEAL—how prayed for. If several defendants pray an appeal jointly, and the appeal bond is executed by one only, and recite an appeal by one, it is irregular, and the appeal will be dismissed.

APPEAL BOND—when amendable. In such case the appeal bond is not amendable.

Appeal from District Court, Clear Creek County.

JONES recovered judgment against Andre and Haskins; both defendants appealed, and day was given to perfect the appeal, by bond, with security. Within the time limited Andre filed his bond, with surety, but his co-defendant did not join therein, and the condition of the bond recited an appeal by Andre only.

Mr. H. M. TELLER, for appellee, moved to dismiss the appeal for the imperfections of the bond.

Mr. W. R. GORSLINE, for appellant, asked leave to amend the bond.

BELFORD, J., was of opinion that leave to amend ought to be allowed.

Per CURIAM. The motion to dismiss must be allowed; the appeal was granted upon certain conditions, which have not been complied with. Haskins has evidently abandoned his appeal. The defendants might have prayed joint and several appeals, but they both united in the only appeal which was prayed, and a joint appeal of two cannot be prosecuted by one only. Watson v. Thrall, 3 Gilm. 69; Johnson v. Barber, 4 id. 1. Motion allowed.

JOINT APPEAL—ALL MUST PROSECUTE.—A joint appeal prayed by all of the defendants, and allowed on condition of filing a joint bond, must be prosecuted by all, and if prosecuted by part only will be dismissed (Fuller v. Swan River Placer Co. 5 Colo. 123, 124); and the statute of 1879, authorizing one of several defendants to remove a case to this court by appeal, and permitting him in such case to use the names of all, if deemed necessary, will not affect the rule that a joint appeal must be prosecuted by all: Diamond T. & S. M. Co. v. Fushner, 14 Colo. 430, 440.

CLEMENTS v. HAHN.

PRACTICE IN SUPREME COURT—certiorari for lost records. Certiorari will not be issued to bring up matter, not of record, in the court below.

Where a bill of exceptions has been lost from the files of the court below, certiorari cannot be issued to bring up the record of such bill until the loss has been supplied.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

PLAINTIFF in error suggested diminution of the record on the affidavit of Charles C. Post, Esq., who appeared for the defendant in the court below, now plaintiff in error, and who deposed to facts tending to show that a bill of the exceptions reserved by the defendant upon the trial in the court below had been prepared by him and allowed, and signed by the chief justice who presided at that trial, and had been afterward filed in the office of the clerk of the district court. The affidavit further set forth that deponent had diligently searched the office of said clerk and procured the clerk to make search among all the papers in his office and in all places where it might be, and that said bill of exceptions could not be found.

Per CURIAM. Certiorari cannot go upon this showing. The affidavit relied upon shows that the bill of exceptions no longer remains in the court below, and the clerk of that court cannot certify what is not. It may be that, upon proper showing, the district court will, in the exercise of its discretion, allow this bill of exceptions to be supplied by copy. If that should be done, you may then renew your suggestion.

Motion denied.

PAUL v. LUTTRELL.

PRACTICE — proceedings when judgment is reversed and cause is remanded.

When the judgment of a district court is reversed in this court, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, the jurisdiction of the district court is restored, and the parties are bound to attend and proceed to trial whenever required by that court.

In such case it is not essential that the plaintiff should proceed at the first term after the judgment is reversed.

Nor that he should file the precept or mandate of this court before proceeding in the district court.

Nor that he should give notice to his adversary of his intention to docket the cause in the district court.

Upon motion for supersedeas.

LUTTRELL brought replevin against Paul in the Jefferson district court, and upon the writ of replevin the property was taken by the sheriff and delivered to him. At the last term of this court a judgment theretofore given in the district court was reversed, and the cause was remanded for a new trial.

At the October term, 1871, of the district court, a jury was called, and upon their verdict judgment was given for the plaintiff Luttrell, that he have the property, and damages for the detention thereof were adjudged to him, and a retorno habendo was awarded.

Upon this trial, as appeared by the record, no one appeared for the defendant; it further appeared, that no transcript of the order of this court, whereby the cause was remanded, was at any time filed in the district court.

Paul now moved for a supersedeas, assigning for error, among other things :

1. That after reversal in the supreme court of the former judgment, the district court proceeded to a new trial of the issues, and gave judgment thereon, although no precept or mandate had been issued out of the supreme court directing the said district court to proceed further.

2. That, after judgment of reversal in the supreme court of the former judgment given in the district court, the cause was not docketed in the district court until the second term succeeding, and then without notice to the defendant.

3. That, by the judgment of the district court, the defendant was required to return to the plaintiff the goods and chattels which were already in plaintiff's possession.

Per CURIAM. Your motion must be denied. When the former judgment of the district court was reversed, the defendant still remained in court, and was bound to attend and proceed to trial whenever required by the district court. He was not entitled to notice from the plaintiff of his purpose to docket the cause or proceed to trial.

That the plaintiff failed to have the cause docketed, or to file the mandate of this court in the court below at the first term after judgment of reversal, is nothing; the cause was, nevertheless, pending there, and if the defendant desired any step taken at that time he might have procured the mandate himself, or he might have proceeded as the plaintiff did, finally, without the mandate. The jurisdiction of the district court over the cause was restored as soon as judgment was given in this court. The mandate was but evidence of that jurisdiction; and, though there are prudential reasons, perhaps, why transcript of the final orders of this court, where causes are remanded, should be filed in the court below before either party is allowed to proceed, yet it is not error to proceed without it, for the question is altogether one of jurisdiction, and if the transcript should be filed at any time hereafter, as it may be, it will afford conclusive evidence that, at the time when the district court gave the judgment now complained of, it had jurisdiction to do so.

The award of the writ of retorno appears to us to be irregular, and if the plaintiff in error proceeds with his writ of error he may probably have that order vacated, but, in the mean time, the defendant in error must be at liberty to take execution for his damages.

Motion denied.

SHALLCROSS v. KRETSCHMER.

ERROR assigned as to matters not of record. Error cannot be assigned upon the ruling of the court, in allowing a promissory note to be read in evidence, unless the note has been preserved in the record.

DAMAGES allowed where writ has been prosecuted for delay. It appearing that the writ of error was prosecuted for delay, twenty per cent of the amount of the judgment below was awarded to the defendant in error.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

Messrs. BROWNE & PUTNAM, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. JOHN MECHLING, for defendant in error.

Per CURIAM. A brief filed on behalf of plaintiff in error contains the statement that a promissory note was improperly received in evidence in the court below; but the note is not preserved in the record, and we cannot act upon the statement of counsel, unsupported by the record. The writ of error appears to have been prosecuted for delay, and we, therefore, affirm the judgment of the court below, with costs, and assess twenty per cent of the judgment below against the plaintiff in error as damages.

Reversed.

WATSON v. HAHN.

CONSIDERATION — equitable right will support express promise. If the remedy, by second indorsee of a promissory note against first indorser, is in equity alone, this equitable right is sufficient to support an express promise upon which he may recover at law.

PLEADING AND EVIDENCE — common counts. In an action by the second indorsee of a promissory note against the first indorser, the plaintiff may recover upon evidence of an express promise under the common counts.

PRESUMPTION in favor of judgment below. Where the bill of exceptions does not contain all of the evidence given on the trial in the court below, the court will presume that the finding of the district court is correct.

PRACTICE — objection to testimony must be specific. Upon a general objection in the court below, to copies of papers offered in evidence, it cannot be alleged in this court that there was not sufficient evidence of the loss of the original papers to warrant the use of copies; that objection should have been made in the district court.

Error to District Court, Gilpin County.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellant.

Mr. S. B. HAHN, pro se.

HALLETT, C. J. Assumpsit by second indorsee against first indorser of a promissory note; and demurrer to special counts in the declaration overruled; plea of general issue to the common counts, and trial to the court and judgment for the plaintiff.

Upon the question raised by the demurrer, the supreme court held, under a Virginia statute in some respects similar to ours, that an indorsee of a promissory note could not sue a remote indorser at law (Mandeville v. Riddle, 1 Cranch, 290), and that the remedy was by bill in equity. Riddle v. Mandeville, 5 Cranch, 322. In Illinois, whence our statute was obtained, the rule is otherwise. Clifford v. Keating, 3 Scam. 250.

However this may be, defendant in error proved an express promise to pay, and upon this he may recover under the common counts. According to the case in 5 Cranch, defendant in error was entitled to recover in equity if the law is as claimed by plaintiff, and this equitable right will support the express promise upon which an action at law may certainly be maintained. 1 Pars. on Cont. 444. Therefore it is not necessary to inquire whether the demurrer was properly overruled, and we express no opinion on the point. Again, it does not appear that the bill of exceptions contains all of the evidence given on the trial in the court below, and we will presume that the finding of the court is correct. Ballance v. Leonard, 37 Ill. 43.

Copies of certain papers were received on the trial, to which plaintiff in error objected generally, but this objection cannot be renewed here. If there was not sufficient evidence of the loss of the original papers to warrant the use of copies, that objection should have been made in the court below. As to the depositions, some of the testimony was irrelevant, but we cannot reverse the judgment for that reason. The testimony is abundantly sufficient to support the judgment of the court, and that which is irrelevant and immaterial could not have had any influence in determining the issue.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

Affirmed.

DOANE et al. v. GLENN et al.

EVIDENCE OF DECLARATIONS of parties in charge of property to show possession

On the trial of an issue as to ownership of property, between interpleading claimants and plaintiffs in attachment, the declarations of the claimants and others who were present with the property, made to the officer at the time the writ was levied, are admissible to show who were in possession of the property.

EVIDENCE as to who was in charge of property admissible. The officer having testified that the claimants were with the property attached at the time the levy was made, his testimony upon that point was admissible, and a motion to exclude all of his testimony from the jury, was properly overruled.

MISNOMER — as to middle name. The law knows but one christian name, and the omission or incorrect insertion of a middle name or initial letter is immaterial.

PRACTICE — when formal objections to deposition must be made. Formal objections to a deposition must be made before trial, and the objection that the official character of a notary public, by whom the deposition was taken, is not authenticated, is of this nature.

DEPOSITION — witness must be sworn in the cause. A deposition taken in an attachment suit, upon notice that the deposition would be read upon the trial of the cause, and the witness being sworn to testify in that cause, is not admissible upon the trial of an issue between interpleading claimants of the property attached and the plaintiffs in the attachment.

PRESUMPTION OF OWNERSHIP arising from possession of personal property. Upon issue joined between interpleading claimants and plaintiffs in attachment, where there is evidence to show that the claimants were in possession of the property at the time the writ was levied, the jury was properly instructed, that, if the property was found in possession of the claimants at the time of the levy, from such possession the law raises a presumption that the claimants were then the owners of such property.

JUDGMENT on issue found for interpleading claimants. It is irregular to enter judgment in favor of the interpleading claimants for the possession of the property attached, but where all the property attached is embraced in the claimant's pleading, the irregularity is not sufficient to reverse judgment.

EVIDENCE OF OWNERSHIP of property attached — sheriff's return. Where the sheriff returns to a writ of attachment that the defendants are not found in his county, and does not state in whose possession he found the property attached, such return does not make out a prima facie case of ownership of the property in the attachment defendants.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

THE sheriff's return to the writ of attachment was as follows: "I have duly executed this writ by levying on seven hundred and fifty-five head of Texas cattle, branded seventy-one. Six horses or two mares and four geldings, one saddle, one bridle, one heavy wagon, one sorrel mare branded $\frac{3}{8}$, connected on right shoulder, one sorrel mare branded OX on left hip, M S on shoulder, one sorrel horse branded LL on shoulder, one bay horse branded H on shoulder, one black poney branded HS on shoulder, one black poney branded B on shoulder, as I am therein commanded, and have the said property now in my possession. The within-named Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey are not found in my county."

The claimants described the property in their plea as follows: "Seven hundred and fifty-five head of Texas catile branded "71," one sorrel mare branded $\frac{3}{8}$, connected on right shoulder, one sorrel mare branded OX on left hip, one sorrel horse branded LL on shoulder, one bay horse branded H on shoulder, one black poney branded HS on shoulder, one black poney branded B on shoulder, one saddle, one bridle, one heavy wagon."

The judgment of the court was as follows: "It is considered by the court that the property taken by virtue of the writ of attachment in this cause be delivered up to the said Lockhart T. Glenn and George O. Talpey, and that a writ of retorno habendo be awarded and issued therefor."

In addition there was judgment for costs.

The evidence is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

The first instruction to the jury is given in the opinion of the court; the second and third instructions were as follows:

If the interpleading claimants purchased the stock which is in controversy with the funds of the defendants, or held the same for the use of the defendants, then such purchase and holding was a fraud upon the creditors of the defendants, and the property in question was subject to the levy of the plaintiff's writ of attachment.

Such fraud as supposed in the last instruction is not to be presumed or inferred without proofs, and it is for the jury to say, upon all of the facts and circumstances in proof, whether the possession of the interpleading claimants was an honest one or merely colorable and fraudulent.

Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. FRANCE & ROGERS, for defendants in error.

BELFORD, J. Plaintiffs in error commenced suit by attachment in the district court of the county of Weld, on the 22d day of September, 1870, against Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey, for the sum of $7,000. A writ of attachment was issued, directed to the sheriff of said county, which was, on the 23d day of September, 1870, levied on the following described property, to wit: seven hundred and fifty-five head of Texas cattle, six horses, one saddle and bridle, and one heavy wagon. At the following December term of the district court defendants in error filed in said suit their plea, claiming that they were the absolute owners of, and entitled to, the immediate possession of the property above set forth. To this plea a replication was filed by the attachment plaintiffs, denying that the property levied on by the writ of attachment, and described in said plea, was the property of said interpleaders, or that they were entitled to the possession of the same. Issue being joined, by stipulation of the parties, the cause was brought to Arapahoe county for trial. The jury returned a verdict for the defendants in error, on which judgment was rendered for return of the property attached. On the trial below, the interpleading claimants, to support the issue on their side, introduced as a witness one Thomas E. Benson, who testified that, as deputy sheriff, he had levied the writ of attachment; "that at the time of the levy he found the property in the possession of George Glenn and Dr. Talpey. These young men were in possession of the cattle. They had some herders with them. One colored person driving a team, and one other man on horseback. Did not know that they, the interpleaders, were in possession more than the other men who were there, except from what they told him. Saw them there with the cattle, so were the other men as much as they." The plaintiffs moved to exclude this testimony, on the ground that Benson's knowledge of the possession was derived from the declarations of the claimants and, therefore, hearsay and inadmissible. This motion was denied by the court, and this constitutes the first assignment of error, which we will notice. The declarations made by the claimants to Benson do not appear in the record, and hence, we are unable to judge of their character and force.

It is a settled rule, that the best evidence that the nature of the case will admit of must be adduced unless some obstacle lies in the way which legally authorizes a resort to inferior evidence. The highest degree of certainty of which the mind is capable, with respect to the existence of a particular fact, consists in a knowledge of the fact, derived from actual perception of the fact by the senses. It is seldom, however, that a jury can act upon knowledge of this description; it rarely happens that a fact which can be decided by mere inspection is submitted to the consideration of the jury. The second degree of evidence in the scale of certainty consists of information derived from the relation and information of those who have had the means of obtaining actual knowledge of the fact, from actual perception of the same by the senses; and upon knowledge thus derived juries must in general act. The jury must be informed of the facts by those who are eye and ear witnesses of them. The third degree of evidence in the scale of certainty consists of information derived, not immediately from one who has had actual knowledge of the fact by the perception of his senses, but from one who knows it only by its having been asserted by some other person; this is generally hearsay evidence. And, although there is a rule which excludes hearsay evidence, yet there are numerous exceptions to it, which courts are bound to recognize and enforce, and among the exceptions thus recognized is, that when a declaration is in itself a fact, and is part of the res gesta, the objection to hearsay evidence ceases.

The distinction between a mere recital, which is not evidence, and a declaration which is to be considered as a fact in the transaction, and therefore evidence, frequently occasions much discussion. The rule is this: if the declaration has a tendency to illustrate the question, and any importance can be attached to it as a circumstance, which is part of the transaction itself, and deriving a degree of credit from its connection with the circumstances, independently of any credit to be attached to the speaker, then it is admissible. The objection of hearsay evidence can never operate to the exclusion of any statement of a fact which the law regards as a proper and safe medium for conveying the truth to a jury ; for, in such case the evidence is admissible, because it is in itself and in connection with the circumstances deserving of credit, and it is no more hearsay evidence than the fact itself. Such evidence does not rest upon the credit due to the person who makes the statement, but it is, in general, good, although the person who made it would not, in ordinary cases, be believed upon oath. It is admitted as a part of the transaction, on the presumption that it is calculated to elucidate the facts with which it is connected, and it is evidence, although the party who made it is himself a competent witness. Ingram v. Plasket, 3 Blackf. 454. In treating of this subject CLIFFORD, J. (Insurance Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wal. 412), says: "Undoubtedly whenever evidence of an act done by a party is admissible, the declarations he made at the time the act was done are also admissible, if they were of a character to elucidate and unfold the act, because they derive a degree of credit from the act itself and do not rest entirely upon a statement not made under oath. But such declarations cannot properly be received as evidence, unless the principal act which they accompany and to which they relate is itself material to the issue to be submitted to the jury, nor unless the declarations were made at the time the principal act was done," etc. The record shows that, at the time of the levy of the writ of attachment, these claimants were with the cattle. This is a distinct fact in itself and a fact which was ascertained by Benson by actual perception, a fact which he could and did testify to, so that we find something to which the declarations can attach, and from which they derive a legal support. The latter would be clearly inadmissible were they disconnected from the act of levy. If made at any other time they could not be received, and their admissibility is only secured by reason of their forming a part of the transaction, of the levy, or what occurred at that time.

In Nilson v. Iverson, 19 Ala. 95, the declaration of a party, while in the possession of a slave, "that she was his negro and that he intended to keep her," was held admissible as part of the res gestæ to prove the character of his possession. And in Nilson v. Iverson, 17 Ala. 216, the court holds that the declarations of a party in possession are admissible as a part of the res gestæ to prove the character of his possession, as that he claims the property as his own, or holds it in subordination to the claims of another. 1 Halstead's Ev. 424, 426.

The material issue to be tried in this case was, the possession and ownership of the property at the date of the levy. The return of the sheriff to the writ shows that the attachment defendants, Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey, were not found in his county at the time the property was attached, and on the trial of the interplea the sheriff testifies that the claimants were with the herd. This certainly was evidence of possession. It might be slight, but still it is entitled to some regard, and especially so when nothing appears to show that the elder Glenn or Talpey had ever been in possession of the cattle. It is true that there were two other parties with the interpleaders at that time, a colored man driving a team, and a man on horseback. And it is claimed that this is evidence of a joint possession. It is sufficient argument on this point to say that these parties nowhere appeared as claimants, nor are they known in any way as interested in this suit, or as parties to this record. Benson says he found the property in the possession of George Glenn and Dr. Talpey. There is an evident confusion of names here, and no effort seems to have been made by the attorneys in the court below to explain this. But it appears from the evidence that, in using these names, the witness intended and designed to designate Lockhart T. Glenn and George O. Talpey, for he says: "these young men, the interpleading claimants, were in possession of the property," etc.

The younger Glenn and Talpey were both present in court, and, from a careful reading of the testimony, there can be no doubt that Benson referred to them when he used the words "George Glenn and Dr. Talpey." Independent of any declarations made by these parties, it would have been error for the court to strike out the evidence of Benson, for the reason that his knowledge of the claimants' possession may have been founded quite as much on the fact that they were with the cattle, and driving them as from their declarations. At least, in establishing the fact of possession, the circumstance that these claimants were with the cattle was proper to be given in evidence, and this circumstance is detailed by Benson.

The next error assigned is the refusal of the court to allow plaintiffs to read in evidence the deposition of James W. Hanna. Several objections were made by the defendants, which we will notice in the following order :

1. The commission is to take the deposition of James H. Hanna, and the deposition taken is that of James W. Hanna.

2. That there is no authentication of the character of the notary public.

3. That the deposition is taken in the original cause, and not in the interpleading suit, and does not permit interrogatories to be propounded in behalf of the claimants.

4. That the parties plaintiffs in this suit were different from those named in the commission.

These objections were all made for the first time on the trial.

There is nothing in the first objection. In legal contemplation, the middle letter constitutes no part of one's name. The law knows but one Christian name, and the omission or incorrect insertion of a middle name or initial is immaterial in pleading; so also in a commission to take depositions. Franklin v. Tallmadge, 3 Johns. 84; Roosevelt v. Gardiner, 2 Cow. 463; Milk v. Christie, 1 Hill, 102; Ginnis v. Martin, 10 Iowa, 347.

The second objection was not well taken. Generally speaking, a party cannot be allowed to lull his adversary into security by his silence till the trial commences, and then spring an objection on him which, if sustained, may deprive him of the proof of material facts, which he might have established in a more formal and regular mode, had the objection been made and sustained at an earlier period. 1 Gilm. 425. When formal objections are not made prior to the commencement of the trial, they cannot be heard afterward. The party seeking to use the deposition would be justified in believing that these objections had been waived. To hold any other doctrine on this subject would work most serious mischief. In many instances it would operate to prevent a party from availing himself of the attendance of witnesses, by whom the same matters contained in deposition might be proved.

The third objection is of a more serious and substantial character. The notice was served on the defendants in the attachment suit as well as on the claimants, and contained the statement that the deposition was to be used in evidence on the trial of the above entitled cause, now pending, etc., and that they were at liberty to file cross-interrogatories and join in the commission.

Without deciding whether the notice was sufficient to bind the claimants, we find, from an examination of the notary's certificate to the deposition, that Hanna was sworn as a witness in the case of Doane et al. v. Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey. It does not appear that he was sworn as a witness in the cause of Glenn and Talpey, interpleaders, v. Doane et al. To have made this deposition available on the trial of the interplea the witness should have been sworn in that suit. The parties were different, and to have admitted the deposition under these circumstances would have been to give the plaintiffs in error the benefit of his testimony, without the sanctity of an oath. We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in excluding the deposition.

The court gave to the jury the following instruction, which is assigned for error:

"The burden of showing that they are the owners of the property in question, and were such owners at the time of the levy of the attachment is upon the interpleading claimants. But, if, at the time of the levy of the writ of attachment in this case, the property was found in the possession of the interpleading claimants, then, from such possession, the law raises a presumption that the interpleading claimants were then the owners of such property, and unless it has been shown to the satisfaction of the jury that such possession of the interpleading claimants (if they were so in possession) was colorable or fraudulent, and a possession for the use of the defendants in this suit, the interpleading claimants may recover."

The plaintiffs in error claim that the law raises no presumption of ownership from the possession of personal property. Matthews, in his work on Presumptive Evidence, page 30, says: "As to personal property of a movable nature, the general rule is, that possession constitutes the criterion of title, and for this reason, that no other means exist by which a knowledge of the fact to whom it belongs can be attained. Hence, a vendor of personal chattels is never expected to show the origin of his right."

Presumptions, or, as they are sometimes called, "intentments of the law," are inferences or positions established for the most part by the common and occasionally by the statute law, and are obligatory alike on judges and juries. They differ from presumptions of fact, or mixed presumptions, in two important respects. In the latter a discretion more or less extensive, as to drawing the inference, is vested in the tribunal, while in the former the law peremptorily requires a certain inference to be made whenever the facts appear, which it assumes as the basis of that inference. In the second place presumptions of law are, in reality, rules of law, and a part of the law itself, and the court may draw the inference whenever the requisite facts are developed in the pleading, while all other presumptions, however obvious, being only inferences of fact, cannot be made without the intervention of the jury. There is a class of presumptions which the law, out of regard for public policy, recognizes and enforces. In such cases it gives an artificial effect to the facts which give rise to the presumption, beyond their natural tendency to produce belief. For instance, when one sets fire to a house the presumption is that he intended injury to its owner. If, then, a legal presumption is one that the law peremptorily requires to be drawn from certain ascertained facts, and which is incumbent alike on courts and juries to make, then clearly the possession of personal property does not create such a presumption. It is purely an inference of fact to be dealt with by the jury, and not one of law to be applied by the court, and falls strictly within Mr. Starkie's definition of natural presumptions, or presumptions of mere fact. It depends wholly upon its own natural force and efficacy in generating conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections which are pointed out by experience, and is altogether independent of all artificial legal relations. It is a fact to be weighed by the jury, when they have found it, as a circumstance, tending to establish in their minds the main fact in issue, to wit: whether the possessor is the real owner.

The inaccuracy of calling it a legal presumption finds sanction in the language of many courts and writers upon the subject of evidence. 12 Wis. 594.

It is said that presumptions of this kind may be properly termed legal presumptions, because they have been so frequently drawn under the sanction of legal tribunals that they are to be viewed as presumptions authorized by law. We cannot, therefore, say that in this cause the naming it a legal presumption in the instruction to the jury was error. The jury were told that the burden of proving ownership was upon the claimants, and they were further told, that while the law did raise a presumption of ownership from possession, yet if that possession was colorable, or for the use of the attachment defendants, then they could not recover. Even if the instructions were erroneous we would not feel at liberty to reverse the case on that ground. The plaintiffs in error had every opportunity to make good their claim, if they had any. Their examination of witnesses was long and ingenious, and yet they failed to bring before the jury any evidence calculated to satisfy them that the elder Glenn and Talpey were the owners of the property. There are many suspicious circumstances connected with the purchase of the cattle and the conduct of the parties, and these were all brought to the attention of the jury, and after weighing them they returned their verdict for the claimants.

Whatever may be our opinion of the merits of the controversy, we cannot usurp the function of the jury and disregard a verdict that has evidence to support it. The issue below was a clear and distinct one. Was the property levied upon the property of the interpleaders? That issue was fully tried and the court left the jury free to pass upon it, and they resolved it against the plaintiffs in error. The court, in the second instruction given to the jury, told them that if the interpleading claimants purchased the stock in controversy with the funds of the defendants, or held the same for the use of the defendants, then such purchase and holding was a fraud upon the creditors of the defendants, and that the property in question was subject to the levy of the plaintiffs' writ of attachment. Under this instruction, the jury had the right, and doubtless did consider fully, not only the evidence of Blackington, but all the circumstances which were brought out on the trial, and which indicated the character of the transactions had by the younger and elder Glenn and Talpey in reference to the cattle.

Objection is also made to the form of the judgment rendered in this cause. We are of the opinion that the judgment in the present form is irregular. It would be better, in entering judgment in cases of this kind, to have it show that the property described in the plea is the property adjudged to be restored, instead of the property levied upon by the writ of attachment. We do not, however, conceive that an irregularity of this kind is in any way prejudicial to the plaintiffs in error.

There is one other point made by the plaintiffs in error which we think it proper to allude to. It is claimed that the return, made by the officer on the writ of attachment, was prima facie evidence that this property belonged to Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey, as against the interpleading claimants, and would have been sufficient to support the issue on behalf of the plaintiffs, without any further evidence, until rebutted. It is quite true that such returns are commonly evidence of more or less force, according to circumstances, and, particularly, with respect to parties against or for whom they are sought to be used. A familiar illustration is, when a person other than the defendant in execution sues or is sued for property levied on under it, in which case the return usually states the property to belong to the judgment debtor, but the real owner is always permitted to contradict such statement. 2 Philips' Ev. 368, 369 (margin).

The sheriff, in making his return, does not state to whom this property belongs, nor in whose possession it was found. It further appears that, at the time of the levy of the writ, Oliver S. Glenn and Rufus E. Talpey were not found in Weld county. It seems to me that it would be doing violence to every principle of law, to hold that such a return furnishes prima facie evidence of ownership in the elder Glenn and Talpey against the interpleaders.

In accordance with the view we have taken of this case, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. Affirmed.

DEPOSITIONS, FORMAL OBJECTIONS TO. — The supreme court of the United States reversed the judgment in the principal case for error of the court in excluding the depositions offered by plaintiff. Doane v. Glenn, 21 Wall. 33.

SOPRIS v. WEBSTER.

NEW TRIAL — verdict not supported by evidence. If, in an action of replevin no evidence of the value of the property, or of the value of its use, is given, no more than nominal damages can be allowed for the detention thereof.

Appeal from District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. L. B. FANCE, for appellant.

Mr. S. E. BROWNE, for appellee.

WELLS, J. The judgment in this case is clearly erroneous. The jury awarded the plaintiff $50 as his damages for the wrongful detention of the property in controversy, while there is no evidence in the record of its value or of the value of its use during the detention. There was, therefore, no data upon which damages could be assessed, and only nominal damages should have been allowed.

For this error the judgment is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded to the district court, with directions to that court to award a new trial. Reversed.

REPLEVIN — EVIDENCE OF VALUE. — If in an action of replevin, no evidence of the value of the property, or of the value of its use, is given, no more than nominal damages can be allowed for its detention. This was the common-law rule, and the same rule obtains under the code: Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 68, 66.

THE PEOPLE v. MYERS.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT in criminal cases. This court can entertain jurisdiction of causes only in the methods prescribed by law, and cannot give judgment in a criminal cause certified into this court from a district court, without writ of error.

PRACTICE — removal of records into supreme court. This court will not take cognizance of questions arising in a criminal cause, which are brought into this court from a district court by agreement of parties.

THE prisoner having been found guilty upon an indictment for murder, at the January term, 1872, of the Arapahoe district court, moved for a new trial. Judgment upon this motion was reserved until the next succeeding term of the court, and upon motion of the prisoner's counsel, the district attorney consenting, certain questions arising upon this motion were directed to be argued in the supreme court at this term.

HARRISON & POWERS for the prisoner now moved upon certified copy of the order of the district court, that the question therein reserved be set down for argument at a future day in this term.

Per CURIAM. We cannot hear the counsel as to these questions. There is no warrant for the course which was pursued here. We can entertain jurisdiction of causes only in the methods prescribed by law. We can give no judgment here which shall bind the prisoner or any one else. Though we should be of opinion that a new trial ought to be granted, the district court may refuse it, and if we should be of the contrary opinion, and the district court should thereupon deny the prisoner's motion, he may, nevertheless, bring his writ of error, and we must hear counsel again.

The practice of the English courts is of no weight upon this question, because the relation which the English courts at nisi prius have to the court in banc is essentially different from that of our district courts to this court. When the district court shall have given final judgment upon this indictment, the prisoner may, if he will, apply for his writ of error.

Motion denied.

CREIGHTON v. KERR et al.

APPEARANCE—effect of withdrawing. If a defendant enter an appearance in a cause, in which he has not been served with process, and afterward withdraw his appearance, "without prejudice to the plaintiffs," the plaintiffs are in the same position, as if such appearance had not been withdrawn or in any manner qualified.

The appearance, to all intents and purposes, still stood as a waiver of process, and sufficiently supported the judgment nil dicit which was afterward given.

APPEARANCE—effect of in proceeding in rem. If, in a suit in attachment, in which service of process has not been made, the defendant enter his appearance, the character of the proceeding is changed from an action in rem to an action in personam.

ATTACHMENT—if defendant appear, plaintiff not limited to amount specified in affidavit. If, in such action, the defendant withdraw his appearance, "without prejudice to the plaintiffs," the plaintiffs are not limited to the amount or causes of action specified in the affidavit in attachment, but may take judgment upon the declaration for an amount not exceeding the damages laid therein.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

SUIT commenced by attachment to the June term, 1870; amount specified in the affidavit $5,563.50. Cause of action in the affidavit, for telegraph poles and labor and material furnished by the plaintiffs to defendant. The declaration contained the common counts for work and labor, for telegraph poles, goods, wares and merchandise, for money paid, laid out and expended, and a count upon an account stated; the damages were laid at $8,000.

At the October term, 1870, the defendant appeared by Charles & Elbert, his attorneys, and submitted to a rule to plead within ten days. Afterward, and before the expiration of the ten days, an order was entered of record in the cause, as follows:

"Now on this day came Messrs. Charles & Elbert, and withdrew their appearance as attorneys for the said defendant, without prejudice to the plaintiffs."

Afterward, and at the same term, the plaintiffs obtained judgment against the defendant for $8,000 and costs.

Messrs. BELDEN & POWERS and Messrs. CHARLES & ELBERT, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. SAYRE & WRIGHT, for defendant in error.

WELLS, J. It appears to us that the withdrawal of the appearance which was entered on the part of the plaintiff in error in the court below, whether it be regarded as the act of the attorneys merely or as the act of the defendant himself, left the plaintiffs below in precisely the same position as if it had not been withdrawn or in any manner qualified. If we are to give any effect to the words of the record of this proceeding, they impart a stipulation by the defendant, or at least a condition imposed by the court, that the plaintiffs shall not lose any advantage which, by reason of the appearance, they had gained. The appearance, to all intents and purposes, still stood as a waiver of process, and sufficiently supported the judgment nil dicit, which was afterward given.

And this, we think, also disposes of the second question which is presented by counsel, for, if we consider the appearance which was interposed on behalf of the defendant, as still so far subsisting as to waive the necessity of process; if the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the withdrawal of the defendant's attorneys, still maintained their advantage in this respect, it follows that there was still an appearance subsisting on behalf of defendant for all purposes where such appearance could afford the plaintiff any advantage.

Therefore, the attachment which, in the first instance, was but a proceeding in rem, and which, by the defendant's appearance, had assumed the character of an action in personam, still remained of the same character after the appearance was withdrawn, and the plaintiffs were still entitled to have judgment for whatever damages they might establish under their declaration within the limit of the ad damnum laid therein, whether the causes of action counted upon were the same as those mentioned in the affidavit or different. The position of the plaintiffs was the same as if the defendant had plead to the action and the issue had been tried by a jury; and, in such cases, it has uniformly, we believe, been held that the plaintiff's recovery is not limited to the amount or causes of action specified in the affidavit.

We see no error in the record. The judgment of the court below is, therefore, affirmed. Affirmed.

APPEARANCE, WITHDRAWAL OF. — The United States supreme court affirmed the decision in Creighton v. Kerr, 20 Wall. 80. General voluntary appearance waives all objections to the summons and return, and the filing of a demurrer of answer is such an appearance: Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. De Busk, 12 Colo. 286

CONSOLIDATED GREGORY COMPANY v. RABER.

AGENT OF MINING COMPANY — extent of authority. An agent of a mining company may employ laborers in the business of the company, but he cannot pledge the faith of the company to persons not so employed.

If an agent of a mining company employ a person to take care of a team which does not belong to the company, used by such agent while attending to the business of the company, and also while attending to the business of other parties for whom the agent is acting, such employment is beyond the scope of the agent's authority and the company is not liable for the wages of the person so employed.

NEW TRIAL — evidence to support verdict. In an action against a mining company by an employee, to recover for services rendered, a declaration by an agent of the company that the plaintiff should lose nothing by the company, and another declaration by a director of the company to the same effect, are to be regarded as admissions of the company and are sufficient to support the verdict.

PRACTICE — objection to testimony must be specific. Upon a general objection to the declarations of an agent, made in the court below, the party cannot object in this court that the agent had no authority to bind his principal.

PRACTICE — where judgment has been taken for a greater sum than the ad damnum. If judgment is obtained for an amount exceeding the damages laid in the declaration, the plaintiff in the judgment may remit the excess and take judgment in this court for the amount claimed in his declaration.

COSTS — when plaintiff below has taken judgment for too large an amount. In such case appellant will be allowed costs in this court.

Appeal from District Court, Gilpin County.

At the trial, M. B. Hays testified: "That he, as agent of defendant, employed the plaintiff in spring, 1867, at $60 per month, and that plaintiff worked for defendant about a year; that the work of plaintiff was to take care of the team of James E. Lyon & Co., and to saw wood for the house and office, and there was due defendant on the 15th of January, 1868, the sum of $490; that he, the witness, was the agent for defendant, and for James E. Lyon & Co.; that the team was used by him in the business of defendant, and also while attending to the business of other companies."

Mrs. N. Buckman testified: That she had a conversation with Richman, agent of defendant, in 1868, in which she said to Richman, "I hope my brother will not lose any thing by the Consolidated Gregory Company," and he said, "He shall not." Witness was then asked about a conversation with Frank Parmelee. The defendant admitted that Parmelee was, at the time of the conversation, a director of the company. Witness then stated that she had a conversation with Parmelee in 1868, about the claim of plaintiff against defendant, and Parmelee said that plaintiff was a good boy, and should lose nothing by defendant.

The defendant objected generally to the evidence of Mrs. Buckman, but did not state the ground of objection. The verdict was for $628.83, and the damages were laid in the declaration at $490. Appellee filed in this court a remittitur, by which he proposed to remit to the appellant the amount by which the verdict exceeds the ad damnum in the declaration.

Messrs. JOHNSON & TELLER, for appellant.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. The business of the Gregory Company is mining, milling and melting ores. Raber was employed by the agent of the company to take care of a team, the property of Lyon & Co., which the agent says was used for the company. Lyon & Co. made no charge for the use of the team, and before Raber was employed the company had paid for its keep. I cannot perceive that these facts create any obligation on the part of the company to pay for Raber's services. If Lyon & Co. furnished the team without charge, this is no evidence to show a contract with the groom. It is true that the agent of the company states that he employed Raber for the company, but this was evidently beyond his authority. He could employ laborers in the business of the company, but he could not pledge the faith of the company to persons not so employed.

But the declarations of Richman, who was the successor of Hayes in the agency, and of Parmelee, who was a director of the company, must be regarded as an admission by the company of the indebtedness to Raber, and, therefore, a ratification of Hayes' act in employing him. The account was entered in the books of the company, and Richman objected to it when he took charge of the company's affairs. It is not shown that any other demand in favor of Raber stood upon the company's books, and it is fair to presume that both Richman and Parmelee referred to this demand in their answers to Mrs. Buckman's inquiries. Therefore it cannot be said that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and, although the right of the plaintiff below is not very clear, we do not see that the court erred in refusing a new trial. A general objection in the court below to the declarations of Richman and Parmelee cannot be made the basis of a specific objection in this court. If Richman and Parmelee had no authority to bind the company, the attention of the court below should have been drawn to the fact, for possibly the plaintiff would have furnished evidence of their authority if it had been questioned. The amount recovered exceeds the amount shown to be due, but appellee has remitted the excess, a practice sanctioned by high authority. Bank of Kentucky v. Ashley, 2 Pet. 327.

The remittitur will be received, reducing the judgment to $490, for which execution may issue from this court, and the appellant will be allowed costs in this court. Affirmed.

JUDGMENT — REMISSION OF EXCESS. — Where judgment is obtained for an amount exceeding the damages laid in the declaration, the plaintiff may remit the excess, and take judgment in the appellate court for the amount claimed in his declaration: Wine v. Colorado Springs Co., 3 Colo. 161.

GROUND OF OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE must be stated specifically at the trial or it cannot be raised afterward: Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co., 3 Colo. 161.

DOUGHERTY v. THE PEOPLE.

PRACTICE in cases of criminal abortion. What is for the consideration of the jury. Upon indictment, under section 42, Criminal Code (Rev. Stat. 202), for administering a noxious or destructive substance or liquid to a woman pregnant with child, with intent to produce miscarriage, whether the substance or liquid is noxious or destructive is a question of fact for the jury.

INDICTMENT for criminal abortion — description of drug. In such case it is not necessary to set out in the indictment the kind of drug or liquid administered.

EVIDENCE as to drug or liquid administered. And if the drug or liquid administered is described in the indictment, it is not necessary that the proof should correspond with the allegation.

EVIDENCE as to effect of the potion. Nor is it necessary that miscarriage should be produced. If the noxious substance or liquid is administered with intent to produce miscarriage, the crime is complete.

EVIDENCE as to power of potion to produce intended result. Nor is it necessary that the noxious substance or liquid administered should be poisonous, as the term is commonly understood, or that it should be capable of producing miscarriage.

If the substance administered is unwholesome, and may probably occasion injury or derangement of the system to a woman pregnant with child, it is noxious within the meaning of the statute.

PRACTICE — changing form of instruction. The refusal to give a proper instruction cannot be assigned for error, when the court gives other instructions embracing the correct principle embraced in the instruction asked.

EVIDENCE OF CONFESSION—whether sufficient to establish guilt. Upon indictment for administering drugs to a woman pregnant with child, with intent to produce miscarriage, confessions of the prisoner to the effect that he gave certain drugs to the woman named in the indictment, and that the effect of such drugs was to make the woman sick, may be sufficient to establish guilt, there being other evidence to prove the fact of pregnancy, and it appearing that about the time of the alleged offense the prisoner inquired of a physician, and of other persons, to ascertain what kind of drug would produce miscarriage.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

Mr. L. C. ROCKWELL and Mr. G. W. MILLER, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. M. A. ROGERS, district attorney, first judicial district, and Mr. CLINTON REED, district attorney, second judicial district, for the people.

BELFORD, J. The indictment in this case contains three counts. The first alleges that the defendant, on the 10th day of September, 1870, at the county of Clear creek, unlawfully, willfully and feloniously, did administer to, and cause to be taken by, one Maria Casey, she, the said Maria, being then and there pregnant with child, a large quantity of a certain noxious and destructive substance called boneset, with intent thereby, then and there, to procure a miscarriage of the said Maria, etc.

The second alleges that the defendant, unlawfully, willfully and feloniously, did cause to be taken by one Maria Casey, she, the said Maria, being then and there pregnant with child, a certain noxious substance called boneset, and other noxious and destructive substances, administered to the said Maria by the said Daniel Dougherty, etc.

The third count differs in no important particular from the first. In the court below the prisoner's attorney moved to quash the indictment, on the ground that boneset was not a destructive or noxious substance within the contemplation of the statute. This motion was overruled, and this ruling of the court is assigned for error. We are unanimously of the opinion that the character and capabilities of any drug, specified in an indictment as having been used in the production, or attempted production, of a crime, are questions of fact to be determined by the jury upon the evidence before them. To hold otherwise, would be to require that the presiding judge, in all trials involving charges of poisoning, should be an expert in the science of toxicology, or thoroughly familiar with the active and inert properties of all drugs, herbs or minerals, which are, or might be, used in the perpetration of a crime.

This, indeed, might be regarded as a very onerous requirement, and yet, if of easy fulfillment, would certainly be open to the objection that the judge would thereby become master both of the law and the fact. Independent of this, however, we are of the opinion that an indictment which follows the language of the statute is sufficient.

In the case of Curtis v. The State, 2 Ind. 618, the court say, that it is not necessary to name the kind of drug, and if it is named, the proof need not correspond. See, also, Vawter v. The State, 7 Blackf. 592; and Crichton v. The People, 6 Park. Cr. 369. In the case of Rex v. Philips, 3 Camp. 73, the defendant was charged with administering to a pregnant woman a decoction of a certain shrub called savin. On the trial the prisoner's counsel objected, that, unless the shrub shown in the evidence was savin, there was no evidence that the mixture was "noxious and destructive." LAWRENCE, J., said: "In an indictment on this clause of the statute, it was improper to introduce these words; and although they are introduced, there is no necessity to prove them. It is immaterial whether the shrub was savin or not." We think there was no error in the overruling of the motion to quash.

The section of the statute on which this indictment is founded reads as follows: "Every person who shall willfully and maliciously administer, or cause to be administered to or taken by any person, any poison or other noxious or destructive substance or liquid, with intention to cause the death of such person, and being thereof duly convicted, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than one year and not more than ten; and every person who shall administer or cause to be administered or taken any such poison, substance or liquid, or who shall use or cause to be used any instrument, of whatever kind, with intention to procure the miscarriage of any woman then being with child, and shall thereof be duly convicted, shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years in the penitentiary, and fined in a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars. And if any woman, by reason of such treatment, shall die, the person or persons administering, or causing to be administered, such poison, substance or liquid, or using or causing to be used any instrument aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter," etc. Crim. Code, § 42. From an examination of this section, it will be observed that the first clause applies to cases of poisoning as popularly understood; that is, to cases when a person, desirous of destroying the life of another, willfully and maliciously administers the poison or other destructive substance, against the consent of the person taking the same. For instance, when a servant girl, designing and intending to take life, should place arsenic in coffee; and the words "malicious" and "willful" applies to poisonings of this kind, and not to cases of abortion. The next clause applies purely to cases of the nature of the one undergoing investigation.

The acts sought to be prohibited and the crime sought to be punished, are the using of noxious substances, or instruments with intent to produce miscarriage. It is not necessary that the miscarriage should take place — that is, that the administering of the drugs or the use of the instrument should be followed by the expulsion of the foetus. That is not necessary to constitute the crime. It is the administering the noxious substance or the use of the instrument with intent to produce miscarriage that makes up the crime — and as to the intent, it may be remarked that it is a well-settled rule of law that a sane man, a voluntary agent, acting upon motives, must be presumed to contemplate and intend the necessary, natural and probable consequences of his own acts. If, therefore, one voluntarily or willfully does an act which has a direct tendency to destroy another's life, the natural and necessary conclusion from the act is, that he intended so to destroy such life. So, if the direct tendency of the willful act is to do another some great bodily harm, and death in fact follows as a natural and probable consequence of the act, it is to be presumed that he intended such consequences, and he must stand legally responsible for them. So when a physician inserts into the womb of a woman pregnant with child, instruments calculated to produce irritation and serious derangement of the female economy, and abortion follows, the intention to produce that result is a necessary conclusion from the act. So where drugs regarded as abortives are administered to a pregnant woman whose general health is good and requires no medicine, and said drugs so administered are calculated to produce serious disturbance in her system, and miscarriage is thereby superinduced, it may be presumed that the drugs so applied were designed and intended to produce that result. The intention may be rightly inferred from the character of the means employed. We have said thus much as preparatory to the consideration of the instructions given by the court below to the jury, and which are assigned for error. Over the prisoner's objection, the court gave the following instructions: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the prisoner administered or caused to be taken by Maria Casey, named in the indictment, any noxious or destructive substance or liquid with intent to procure a miscarriage of said Maria Casey, then the jury should find the said defendant guilty. It must appear, however, in order to such conviction, not only that the prisoner gave such drug, or substance, or liquid, but that it was actually taken into the person of said Maria Casey. It will suffice, however, that prisoner procured and gave the drug or substance to said Maria with the intent named, and that she afterward took and swallowed such drug or substance, or some portion of it. And it is not necessary in order to be noxious and destructive, within the meaning of the statute, that such drug should be poisonous, as the term is commonly understood, or should be capable of actually producing the miscarriage. It will be sufficient if, upon the consideration of all the testimony, it shall appear to the jury that such drug, so administered (if any), is unwholesome and might probably occasion injury or derangement of the system to a woman pregnant with child."

In determining the correctness of this instruction it must be borne in mind that the act of miscarriage is not necessary to the gist or completeness of the crime. The crime sought to be punished is the administering of a poison, or noxious or destructive substance or liquid, with the intent to produce miscarriage. A person indicted under a statute for administering a drug, or doing some other like act, with intent to procure an abortion, may be convicted, not alone, when the proofs show an unsuccessful attempt, but equally when they show an attempt successful; that is, show an abortion actually committed. 2 Bishop's Crim. L., § 10. What then is a poisonous, noxious and destructive substance in the contemplation of this act? A poison is commonly defined to be a substance which, when administered in small quantity, is capable of acting deleteriously on the body; and, in popular language, it is confined to substances which destroy life in small doses. It is obvious, says a learned writer, that the above definition is too restricted for the purposes of medical jurisprudence. It would, if admitted, exclude a large class of substances, the poisonous properties of which cannot be disputed, as for example the salts of copper, tin, zinc, lead and antimony, which, generally speaking, act only as poisons when administered in large doses. A person may die either from a large dose given at one, or from a number of small doses given at such intervals that the system cannot recover from the effects of the one, before another is administered. Some substances, such as nitre, have not been known to act as poisons, except when taken in large doses, while arsenic acts as a poison when taken in small quantities. But, in a medico-legal view, whether a person die from the effects of half an ounce of nitre, or two grains of arsenic, the responsibility of a person who criminally administers the substance is the same. Each substance must be regarded as a poison, differing from the other only in its degree of activity, and, perhaps, in its mode of operation. The result is the same; death is caused by the substance taken, and the quantity required to destroy life or produce any other hurtful result, cannot, therefore, be made a ground for distinguishing a poisonous from a non-poisonous substance. It cannot be doubted that the definition of poison, above given, sprung out of a desire to get rid of the difficulty that would necessarily be encountered in separating a class of poisons from bodies which are generally reputed inert, and which, under certain conditions, are capable of producing the most serious mischiefs.

Medical practitioners would hardly be ready to admit that common salt, an article of constant domestic use, can be so administered as to become as deleterious and destructive to the functions of life as strychnia. An instance of common salt having caused death occurred in 1839. A young lady swallowed a certain quantity for the purpose of destroying worms. It was considered to be a harmless substance according to common notion, but in the course of a few hours some alarming symptoms made their appearance, and medical assistance was sent for. She was found to be in a state of general paralysis, and although the stomach pump and other antidotal means were speedily employed, she died in the course of a few hours. This case is deserving of notice from the evidence which it furnishes of the fallacy of the popular doctrine, that what is taken so freely in small quantities with benefit may be taken with equal impunity in large doses. It is of little moment therefore, in medicine or law, whether one grain of one substance or one ounce of another substance be taken, provided the fatal effects be traceable to the action of the particular substance in the body. This is the point to which a medical jurist must direct his attention. It is therefore necessary to look to the noxious effects produced by particular substances on the system, and the adequacy of these substances to cause death under symptoms of poisoning, rather than to the mere quantities in which they may be taken. The question of what is a noxious or destructive substance most generally arises on charges of attempted abortion. In the case of White, tried in England in 1857, it was proved that the prisoner had administered to the prosecutrix a large dose of a substance, popularly known under the name of hiera-picra. This is a compound of aloes and canella bark. It was admitted to be a proper medicine in small doses, but capable of acting with injurious effects on pregnant females when given in large doses. The prisoner was convicted. In 1842, in England, two men were indicted for causing the death of another by the administration of a destructive substance. On the day laid in the indictment the deceased had drank several pints of beer which it was afterward proved had been drugged with epsom salts. He was seized with violent purging, and died within forty-eight hours. On an examination of the body the lining membrane of the alimentary canal was found inflamed, and there was no doubt that death was owing to the irritant effects of the salt. One of the prisoners was convicted. The quantity of the substance taken in this case could not be ascertained, but there is reason to suppose the dose was large.

Wharton, in his work on Medical Jurisprudence, book 2, section 236, says: "Most authors assert that there are no specific medicinal substances by which abortion can be produced. The only drug which has any claim to be considered as specific in its action upon the uterus is the ergot of rye; savin and oil of tansy are more frequently used than ergot. They have both, unfortunately, a popular reputation as agents for producing abortion. Their action as abortives is solely due to their poisonous properties, since, when given in proper medicinal doses, they are generally aromatic and stimulant. In fact tansy is in common use as an agreeable bitter for promoting appetite. We think, however, that the administration of either of these drugs to pregnant women, should always be looked upon with suspicion, for we cannot imagine any condition which at this time would require or justify their use." In section 39, he says: "Powerful purgative medicines, such as aloes, julap, croton oil and elaterium given repeatedly, or in doses capable of setting up violent action of the lower bowels, may produce abortion by a secondary action upon the uterus. The same may be said of cantharides and turpentine. All of these drugs are capable of producing a great degree of active congestion and inflammation in the pelvic viscera, and, hence, the uterus is not always exempt from their action. It is certain that, in the greater number of cases, when abortives are criminally employed, the life of the mother is more readily sacrificed than that of her offspring."

As the greater number of substances known under the name of medicines may act like poisons, according to the dose or circumstances under which they are administered, and no precise boundary can be laid down, it would seem that the proof of the crime of poisoning should rest upon the intention with which the substance is administered and on the effects produced, or on satisfactory evidence that it is capable either of destroying life or causing injury to health. And in deciding this question, we think it would be doing violence to the wisdom of the legislature to hold, that, when they enacted this section, they intended to limit its operation to such substances as in popular conception were regarded as absolutely poisonous. It is clear and unmistakable that the object had in view, in the enactment of the first clause, was the protection of the person from injury; from stealthy and wicked assaults made by the designing criminal on the life of his intended victim, through the administration of drugs hurtful and ruinous to health and life.

And it is equally clear that, in the enactment of the second clause, they intended specially to protect the mother and her unborn child from operations calculated and directed to the destruction of the one and the inevitable injury of the other. And the spirit and letter of the law are violated and set at defiance, when a miscarriage is sought to be produced, either by the application or administration of drugs, which act directly and specifically on the womb and thereby superinduce uterine contraction, or by the administration of such drugs as, operating on the general system of the mother, tend to the destruction of her energy and strength and the diminution of her vitality and health and make miscarriage possible, provided always such drugs are administered with the intent to produce miscarriage. People v. Carmichael, 5 Mich. 21. In the attempts made at abortion, the health of the mother is more frequently ruined than the life of the child is destroyed, and believing that the legislature in the enactment of this humane law designed to protect both from injury, we believe with the judge who charged the jury below, that "It will be sufficient if, upon the consideration of all the testimony, it shall appear to the jury that such drug so administered (if any) is unwholesome and might probably occasion injury or derangement of the system to a woman pregnant with child." If any doubt could exist as to the correctness of the foregoing views, still the evidence clearly shows that the substance administered by the prisoner, which was a compound of boneset and some other unknown drugs, was a noxious substance. It made the woman sick and injured her back. Taking the hurtful consequences resulting from the administration of it, together with the intent with which it was given, there can be no question that it fell clearly within the meaning of the words "noxious or destructive."

On the trial, the prisoner's counsel asked the court to give an instruction on the subject of reasonable doubt. This instruction was little else than a transcript of C. J. Shaw's definition of reasonable doubt in the celebrated Webster case. The court declined to give this instruction as drawn by prisoner's counsel, but, in lieu thereof, charged the jury that a reasonable doubt is that state of the mind on which, upon consideration of all the facts proved, the jury cannot say I am satisfied of the prisoner's guilt. A reasonable doubt is not a mere conjectural doubt, but one that arises out of the evidence, by fair inference, upon consideration of all the testimony.

Had the court refused to give the instruction as prayed for by the defendant, and declined to give the jury one on the same subject, it would have been error. The court itself may give instructions. The refusal to give a proper instruction cannot be assigned for error, when the court gives others embracing the correct principle of law involved in the instruction asked. Bland v. People, 3 Scam. 365 ; 12 Ill. 261 ; 6 Pet. 628.

It is further claimed that the verdict of the jury cannot be sustained, for the reason that no corpus delicti is proved. What is the corpus delicti in this case? The pregnancy of Maria Casey, and the administration of the drugs by the defendant. It is said, by the counsel for the prisoner, and very justly, too, that confessions made by a prisoner, unsupported by corroborating circumstances, are not, of themselves, sufficient to prove the corpus delicti. There should always be something more than a mere naked confession of one accused, to justify a verdict of guilty. The sad examples furnished in judicial annals, should make courts and juries extremely cautious about basing convictions on foundations of this kind alone. We have carefully considered the evidence in this case, and set it out substantially.

The testimony of Harder is as follows: States he had repeated conversations with defendant, in reference to administering drugs to Maria Casey, with the purpose of procuring abortion. The conversation was at my hotel, in the office thereof, in Idaho. The first conversation was had in July, or August, 1870. The defendant applied to me, in July, to know what medicines might be used to procure an abortion. I told him I heard that tansy would do it. He stated to me his object in wanting to know; did not mention Maria Casey's name.

I told him to marry the girl; said he would see her in hell first; he said the girl was pregnant; he said he had had connection with her not only at that time, but in the spring of 1870.

The next conversation I had with defendant was shortly after ; he said he was going to Central City to obtain medicine to procure an abortion ; he did not mention the name of Maria Casey ; told me that in the spring he had had intercourse with Maria Casey ; in all the other conversations he did not mention her by name, but said "she ;" part of the time of these conversations Maria Casey was living with defendant's mother ; the other part at Lewis' ; she, Maria, went to Mrs. Dougherty's house in July ; we never talked about any other woman being pregnant, or about abortion in connection with any other woman ; he told me he had procured medicine and had given it to Maria, and that she had taken it ; that it made her sick at the stomach ; that it did not have the desired result ; this was in August ; at this conversation Maria was living at Mr. Lewis' ; defendant said he had been over and given her the medicine ; in another conversation defendant told me that Maria was going home with Ed. Bowden ; that she fell in the water, and he hoped to God it had knocked the young one out of her. My reason for believing that, in his conversations, he was alluding to Maria Casey are as follows : After Maria left my house he told me he was having connection with her, and in his conversations he told me he used to go in at her window, and that he declined to take her to the dances because he was having carnal intercourse with her.

Dr. Holland. Defendant made application to me in reference to procuring abortion ; it was the last of August or first of September ; he said he had a girl in a fix and he wished to know what to do in order to get rid of it ; I told him I could not give him any thing ; when I refused he said it was not sure his girl was in the family way, but that she had not had her monthly sickness for two months, and he wanted to know then what it would be best to take to set her in good health ; I told him his mother or any other old lady could do as well as I could ; know the nature of the drug called boneset ; in large doses it is a violent purgative and an emetic ; it is peculiar in this respect ; it is used by females to make them regular in their monthly periods ; it is peculiar because it both vomits and purges at the same time when taken in large doses, like a person with the cholera morbus; I do not think it has any direct effect on the womb to produce abortion; the profession has no class of medicines that produce abortions, but we receive it as a general law that any thing that disturbs the female economy seriously, while she is pregnant, will produce the death of the child and its expulsion from the womb; this medicine seriously disturbs the female economy; I should be afraid, as a medical man, to administer boneset very largely to a woman with child; any thing that disturbs the economy would be likely to produce abortion, but boneset has no direct tendency specially to that purpose; the administration of boneset, with any other drug, would be likely to increase the tendency of the other drug or substance to produce abortion; boneset is not considered a poison in popular sense, and yet I think an ounce of the leaves would produce abortion; I regard it as I do all other drugs, hurtful and noxious to a certain extent, beneficial in disease, but hurtful in health.

Mrs. Swartz. In August or September, the defendant asked me if I knew of any thing by which an abortion could be procured, and told me that Maria Casey was pregnant, and said he was going to get medicine for her to take; he said he was going to Dr. Holland to ask him; he told me that the medicine he gave contained boneset, and the other ingredients he could not remember; he also told me that Maria said the medicines she took hurt her back. He further said: That Maria could take the medicine, or go to hell; this was after he had given her the medicine, which she said hurt her back. I told him Maria told me her back was lame, and he said, that she said it was from the effects of the medicine; he then said, she could take it, or go to hell. This was in August or September.

Dr. Edmundson. I was subpoenaed before coroner's inquest to examine body of Maria Casey; this was in the month of October; made post mortem examination with other physicians. The woman had been pregnant previous to her death ; know this from the size and shape of the womb, and the marks of after-birth still in the womb ; I should judge she had been pregnant fully four months ; I should judge more, rather than less than that time ; the womb had been deprived of its foetus before her death ; she must have conceived about four months before her death ; can't say positively how long before her death her womb had been deprived of the fetus, but it was not long, because the womb had not contracted any on itself ; should judge it was not more than two or three days before her death that the womb was deprived of its contents. The post mortem was twenty-four hours after her death.

Dr. Justice. Know the drug called boneset. Don't think it has any quality to produce abortion ; it is not given for that purpose ; it is a domestic remedy, rarely, if ever, prescribed by the profession. I suppose it might be given in poisonous doses ; it might be given in sufficient doses to produce harm ; never heard of its being given to produce abortion ; there are medicines given for that purpose, which have a violent effect on the whole system, or medicines which operate directly on the womb, and produce a contraction of the womb ; have known an active cathartic to produce that result ; boneset is not classed as an active cathartic, in the quantities in which it is usually given ; I can't say what its effect would be in extreme quantities.

Dr. Williams. Boneset is given ordinarily as an emetic ; sometimes it acts on the bowels. No record of its having the effect to produce a miscarriage ; it is a remedy usually applied in domestic practice ; given in large doses it acts freely on the bowels ; don't know of its having properties that would tend to produce miscarriage.

From an examination of the foregoing evidence it will be seen that, in the spring and during the summer of 1870, the defendant Dougherty was having illicit intercourse with Maria Casey. That, in the month of July, he applied to Harder with a view to obtain information that would enable him to produce an abortion. These conversations were frequent, and made at times when no criminal charge was pending. The declarations of the defendant were neither superinduced by hope of mercy or fear of punishment. True, he was contemplating the commission of a crime, and was endeavoring to obtain information whereby he could perpetrate it. In his conversation with Mrs. Swartz, he declares his intention to consult Dr. Holland, which he afterward did. It further appears that he went to Central City to procure medicine, and afterward stated to Mrs. Swartz that he had given the same to Maria, and that it contained boneset; that it made her sick, but did not produce the desired result. When Mrs. Swartz communicated to defendant the conversation she had with Maria, wherein she stated that the medicines given by Dougherty to Maria had hurt her back, the prisoner remarks, "Yes; Maria told me her lame back resulted from the taking of the medicines, and that she could take the medicines or go to hell." He told Harder that he had procured the medicines and given the same to Maria, and that it made her sick. Then we have the evidence of Dr. Edmundson, who, with other physicians, made a post mortem examination of the body of Maria Casey, and who swears that Maria must have conceived some four months before her death. This took place in October. We then have the fact of pregnancy established by Dr. Edmundson. We have the fact of the administration of drugs by the confession made by the defendant, and by the evidence of Mrs. Swartz. We are of the opinion that the corpus delicti is sufficiently shown by the evidence, and we, therefore, will not disturb the verdict on that account. After the most careful and exhaustive examination of the whole case, we are all of the opinion that the judgment below should be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

POWRIE v. KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.

AGENT — authority of engineer of railway company. An engineer of a railway company, as such, has no authority to pledge the company to pay indebtedness due from a contractor, who is engaged in building the road, to one of his employees.

PRINCIPAL — not bound where agent exceeds his authority. P., who was employed by R., a contractor on a railroad, proposed to discontinue work on account of R.'s inability to pay him. There upon G., an engineer of the railway company, stated that if the men, of whom P. was one, would go on and complete the work, the company would see them paid. There being nothing to show that the engineer was authorized to make such promise, an action against the company will not lie thereon.

Error to Probate Court, Arapahoe County.

It appeared in evidence that the plaintiff, with others, was employed by one Rice, to work on the Kansas Pacific Railway. Some of the men employed by Rice, distrusting his ability to pay, had an interview with Col. Greenwood, an engineer of the company, who told them to go on and complete the work, and the company would pay; that the Kansas Pacific Railway Company would not see any laboring man come short of his pay.

The action was against the railway company, upon this promise. The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and judgment for the defendant.

Messrs. BROWNE & PUTNAM, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. ALFRED SAYRE, for defendants in error.

WELLS, J. It is pretty clearly established by the evidence heard in the court below, that Col. Greenwood, the chief engineer of the defendant, did promise, as the plaintiff claimed, that the company should respond for the wages of Rice's employees upon section seventeen of the grade; that this promise was made to one whom the employees had deputed to represent them; that it was intended to be communicated to the men, and was so communicated; and that the plaintiff, among others, continued their employment and completed the work.

The plaintiff may therefore have his action, provided these three things concur: 1st. It must appear that the promise was upon a consideration sufficient to support it. 2d. The promise not having been reduced to writing, it must appear to have been an original promise, and not a promise to answer upon the default of another merely, for, otherwise, it is void within the statute of frauds. 3d. It must appear that the engineer who made the promise was the agent of the defendant in that behalf.

As to the first of these requisites, the evidence is clearly sufficient. Rice's employees, doubting their employer's solvency, had abandoned the work, and their resuming and completing it was a good and adequate consideration, for it involved both advantage to the company and loss to the men.

As to the second, the testimony is not free of uncertainty; for though, if we consider only the testimony of the witnesses who speak of it, the promise appears to have been, that the company should pay in any event, and not that they should pay upon Rice's default or the like, yet the subsequent conduct of all parties tends, in some degree, to negative the idea that either the company or Rice, or Rice's employees, understood the company to be directly and in the first instance liable to the men; for, down to the completion of the work, so far as we can ascertain by the testimony, Rice remained in immediate charge of the working party; they looked to him for directions, and it was upon his order alone that they received what they did receive from the company. As to the third requisite, there is nothing in the testimony which affords any light whatever as to the nature or extent of the engineer's authority, except the circumstance that Borst, the paymaster, whom it may be presumed was informed of the nature and scope of the duties and powers of his associates in office, paid Rice's employees upon the direction and authority of the engineer's orders merely.

Herefrom might, if the testimony were more complete than it is, arise an inference of more or less weight, that the engineer had in fact the authority which he assumed, else the paymaster must have disregarded his orders. But here it is to be observed that, so far as appears, Borst never was informed of the promises alleged to have been made by Greenwood, but paid the money accruing upon Rice's contract to the employees directly, instead of to Rice, in pursuance of what he understood to have been an arrangement between Rice and the company, to which the men were not party, for the convenience of Rice, and not in discharge of any liability of the company to the employees; and it would seem that the acts of Borst ought not to be received to found an inference of authority in Greenwood to do that which Borst did not know Greenwood had done.

It appears to us, therefore, that there was no evidence whatever of the agency of Greenwood to make the promise relied upon; his official designation does not, we conceive, imply an authority in such matters, and the plaintiff's proofs were therefore defective in a material point.

The judgment of the probate court is affirmed.

UNION GOLD MINING CO. v. ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL BANK.

CORPORATION — dissolution in collateral proceeding. A corporation cannot be dissolved in a collateral proceeding; and in a suit by a national bank to recover money loaned, if the corporation has not been dissolved in a direct proceeding to that end, the defendant cannot question its existence.

CORPORATION — dissolution of a national bank. According to section 53 of the act relating to national banks (18 Stat. at Large, 99), a forfeiture of the rights and privileges of a banking association must be determined and adjudged in a suit instituted by the comptroller of the currency in his own name, and an association organized under that act must stand until dissolved in that way.

PLEADING — must answer all that it professes to meet. A plea which goes to the whole declaration and contains an answer to but one count, is bad on demurrer.

CONTRACT PROHIBITED BY LAW, when void. A contract to do a thing prohibited by statute is not necessarily void, if the statute visit the unlawful act with a penalty. If the thing prohibited is malum in se, the contract cannot be enforced, but as to things not immoral or against public policy, it may be sufficient to enforce the statutory penalty only. If it was not the intention of congress to make void a contract made contrary to the provisions of the act it will be enforced, and for the violation of law the penalty which the statute gives may be applied. Whatever consequences are to follow the violation of the act are expressed in the act itself, and one penalty being given, the court is not at liberty to add another.

CONSTRUCTION of section 29, of National Bank Act. Section 29, of the act relating to national banks, contains a direction respecting the management of associations organized under the act, and it is not a limitation upon the powers of such associations.

CONTRACT — prohibited by law — recovery on. An action may be maintained by a national bank to recover money loaned exceeding in amount one-tenth part of its capital stock, notwithstanding the prohibition of section 29 of the act under which it was organized.

AGENT OF MINING COMPANY — authority. A superintendent of a mine, with authority to take ore therefrom, and crush it for the purpose of obtaining gold, cannot upon such authority borrow money in the name of his principal.

CORPORATION — presumption as to officer's acts. The president of a corporation cannot put off his official character at will and deny to those who have business with the corporation, access through him. While acting upon the business of the corporation, all his acts, within the scope of his authority as president, must be regarded as official.

EVIDENCE of agent's authority to bind his principal. In an action against a mining company for money borrowed by its agent without authority, where evidence is offered of admissions made by the president of the company, such president may be examined as to his authority to bind the company in relation to the matter in suit.

CORPORATION — power of president. The president of a corporation has power to convene the board of directors for the purpose of laying before them any matter affecting the business of the corporation.

AGENT — authority of president of a corporation. An undertaking of the president of a corporation to bring before the board of directors, at a time specified, a demand against the corporation for money borrowed by an agent of the corporation, is within the scope of his authority as president, and the corporation is bound to consider the demand at the time specified.

AGENT — ratification of unauthorized act of. Where an agency exists, and the agent exceeds his authority, the silence of the principal may give rise to a presumption of an intentional ratification of the unauthorized act.

The circumstances must have been fully understood by the principal before any inference can be drawn from his silence, and they must have been such as not only afforded an opportunity to act or speak, but such, also, as would properly and naturally call for some action or reply from men similarly situated.

In an action against a corporation to recover money borrowed by its agent without authority, it appeared that the company was notified of the indebtedness on the 16th December, 1868; fifteen days later, the president undertook to present the claim to the board of directors at a meeting to be held in February following, and the corporation disavowed the act of its agent in the spring following. Held, that upon these facts, the jury would have been warranted in finding a ratification of the agent's acts.

PRACTICE — ratification of unauthorized act of agent—how determined. Where the position of the parties remains the same, whether ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent shall be inferred from the delay of the principal to disavow such act, is a question for the jury.

EVIDENCE of ratification of agent's acts. In an action against a mining company to recover money borrowed by its agent without authority, the circumstance that the company retained the ore taken from the mine by the use of the money is not material to the question of ratification.

Nor is it competent to show that the money was expended in the mine or that the expenditure was advantageous to the company, unless it is also shown that the company had knowledge of the loan and of the expenditure. These circumstances are in no way connected with the authority of the agent, or the ratification of his acts by the company.

EVIDENCE — as to witness' bias or prejudice. A witness cannot be asked whether he is indebted to one of the parties to the suit for the purpose of showing the disposition of his mind toward such party. The question does not tend to elucidate the point.

EVIDENCE — as to corrupt agreement between witness and party. Where it is alleged that a witness refused to testify until the party who called him had made an arrangement concerning certain indebtedness, the character and terms of the arrangement must be made known in order that the court may determine whether it would go to his credibility.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County.

THE declaration contained a count for money loaned; a count for goods sold and delivered; a count for money had and received by defendant; a count for money paid, laid out and expended; a count for interest, and a count on an account stated.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and also specially that the plaintiff is a body corporate, with a capital of $50,000, and that, under and by virtue of a law of the United States, entitled "An act to provide national currency," etc., it had no power, right or authority to loan and advance to defendant the sum of money in the declaration mentioned.

In another special plea the defendant alleged that the plaintiff was a body corporate, organized under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency," etc., reciting the provisions of the act, and averring "that certain persons did, at the time specified, form an association, with a capital stock of $50,000," which was the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had no power, authority or right to loan and advance to defendant the sum of money in the declaration mentioned.

In another plea the defendant averred that the plaintiff was a body corporate, etc., and had no right, power or authority to loan or advance to defendant a greater sum than $5,000. Another plea was substantially the same, except that it averred that only $30,000 of the plaintiff's capital stock had been paid in. A demurrer to the special pleas was sustained.

The testimony at the trial was voluminous. Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that George K. Sabin was appointed superintendent of the defendant's mine, in the year 1865; that he remained such superintendent until December, 1868; that, during the years 1867 and 1868, Sabin kept a deposit account with plaintiff in defendant's name, and that he drew money from time to time in the name of defendant, and deposited other money to the credit of the account; that the balance against defendant in December, 1868, was $21,217.06; that Sabin worked defendant's mine in the years 1867 and 1868, taking therefrom a large quantity of valuable gold-bearing ore, and crushing a portion thereof for the purpose of obtaining gold; that the gold thus obtained was deposited in plaintiff's bank to the credit of defendant; that the money obtained by Sabin from plaintiff's bank was expended in operating the mine and in crushing the ore. Several letters were introduced by plaintiff, which were written by Becker, the president of defendant, some of which were addressed to Sabin as superintendent. One of the letters was signed by Becker as president.

There was evidence of several interviews between Becker and the officers of the bank, in relation to the indebtedness, in December, 1868. A communication from Becker, to the president of the bank, which was given in evidence, is as follows :

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL BANK,
CENTRAL CITY, COLORADO, Jan. 1, 1869. }

To the President of the Rocky Mountain National Bank :

SIR — In regard to the overdraft of our company on your bank, permit me to say that, although I am the president of the Union Gold Mining Co., and the owner of a majority of all its stock, Mr. Sabin will do me the justice to state that I had no knowledge of any overdraft, until on or about the middle of December last. I hope you will not feel uneasy about the payment. We have an abundance of ore already broken in the mine, to pay all indebtedness of the company. In fact, this is the only indebtedness I have any knowledge of the company owing, and if it is not paid off out of the mine, I propose to call a meeting of our directors, and submit your claim, and make an assessment at our February meeting (in New York city), to pay off your claim, and any other that the company may owe. I will also state to you clearly and plainly, that there shall be no sales, transfers, mortgages, assignments, deeds of trust, or any other incumbrance put on the property of company in Colorado, or elsewhere, by myself, or by the company, until all the liabilities of the said company are fully paid.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

THEODORE H. BECKER.

On cross-examination of the witness, Sabin, the defendant offered to show by him that he was indebted to plaintiff in a large sum of money, and that, at a previous term of the district court, he absented himself from the court, and that, when he appeared as a witness, he refused to testify till the indebtedness was arranged in some way, and such arrangement put into writing and signed by the plaintiff, and that, since the last term of court, the said matter of indebtedness had been arranged according to the terms required by the witness.

Upon the plaintiff's objection, the testimony was excluded.

The defendant introduced testimony tending to prove that Sabin resigned his agency in April, 1866, and that in the fall of that year he made an arrangement with the defendant, by which he was to work the mine upon his own account, and lay up the first-class ore for the company for the use of the mine.

T. H. Becker testified: That, on the 16th of December, 1868, he wrote the company of the indebtedness to the bank, and that was the first knowledge the company had of the indebtedness.

The defendant offered to prove by Mr. Becker, the nature of his authority from the defendant in respect to the indebtedness due the plaintiff. Upon plaintiff's objection this evidence was rejected.

The charge of the court to the jury was as follows:

If the jury believe that George K. Sabin entered into an arrangement or agreement with the defendant, whereby he was to enter into possession and work the mines of the defendant, at his own expense, and not at the expense of the defendant, and pay to the defendant a certain portion of the ore taken from the mines for the use of the mines, and pay himself and all the expenses of working the mines from the balance of the ore taken from the mines, and that, under the arrangement so made with the defendant, the said Sabin entered into and worked the mines of the defendant; then, the relation existing between the said Sabin and the defendant was not that of principal and agent, but that of landlord and tenant, and is governed by the same law as in case of working land for a share of the crops. And the said Sabin became the lessee of the defendant, and the said defendant is in no way liable for any sum of money borrowed by the said Sabin, and cannot be made liable without a special promise in writing, made and signed by the defendant. That a corporation is bound by the contracts and acts of its agent, so far as the agent acts within the scope of the authority conferred upon him by the corporation, but no further.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that George K. Sabin made an agreement or arrangement with the defendant, whereby he was to enter into the mines of defendant and work the same on his own account, and was to mine and deliver to the defendant, on the top of the ground, all the first-class or smelting ore, as rental or tribute for the use of the mines of the defendant, and was to receive no salary from the defendant for his services, but was to pay himself and all expenses of working the mine from the proceeds of the balance of the ore mined from said mines, and that the defendant was not to furnish any money for the working of said mines, and that Sabin was to contract no debts chargeable to the defendant, but was to quit work on said mines whenever he could not pay all expenses and pay himself from the lower grades of ore, then the jury must find for the defendant in this case.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Becker was president and general manager of the defendant in 1868 and 1869, and that the defendant had, by George K. Sabin, claiming to be the superintendent or agent of defendant, obtained money of the plaintiff, and that Becker, while acting as president of defendant, with full knowledge of the facts, admitted that such money so obtained was due from the defendant to plaintiff, such admission may be taken by the jury in considering whether the defendant is or is not indebted to the plaintiff.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant employed George K. Sabin as its superintendent, in April, A. D. 1865, and that instructions were, at that time, sent in a letter to said Sabin by the president of the defendant, and that Sabin, under said appointment, proceeded to work the mine and mill of the defendant in Central City, where the plaintiff is located, and to make contracts for the defendant from the fall of 1865 until the spring or summer of 1866, and then stopped working until the fall of 1866, and then resumed said work, and continued said work until December, 1868; and that, during the time from the fall of 1866 until December, 1868, George K. Sabin contracted the debt sued for in this case on behalf of the defendant, and used the money received from the plaintiff in working defendant's mine, and for the defendant, and the defendant received the benefits of the work, knowing that the money had been so applied, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless the defendant has shown that the plaintiff had notice of the change of his agency as sworn to by witnesses Becker, Potts, Bennell, Jr., and Brevoort, in this case.

The court is asked to instruct the jury that the plaintiff is not compelled to prove the appointment of Sabin as superintendent or agent of defendant, by resolution of the board of directors, but the jury may take into consideration all the testimony on that subject, including the acts of the witness Sabin in and about the property of the defendant, and the manner in which the business was carried on, and the opportunities the officers of the defendant had to know how the business was conducted.

The court is asked to instruct the jury that, if Sabin, claiming to be the agent of the defendant, purchased goods on credit in the name of the defendant, and afterward defendant, with full knowledge of all the facts, paid said debt, such payment is a ratification of such agency of said Sabin in making such debts.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Theodore H. Becker was president of the defendant in years 1867, 1868 and 1869, and that while he was president he had the active charge or management of defendant's affairs, and while acting in that capacity he recognized George K. Sabin as superintendent or agent of the defendant, then the jury may take such recognition into consideration in determining whether Sabin was the agent of defendant, or defendant had allowed him to assume that he was agent. If the jury find for the plaintiff they will allow interest on the balance due at ten per cent per annum, from the first of January, 1869, up to this time, except on the item included in plaintiff's account as interest.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that, during the years 1867 and 1868, George K. Sabin was in the actual charge of the defendant's property, and while in charge of the defendant's property he represented to the plaintiff that he was the agent and superintendent of the defendant, and on the strength of that representation he borrowed money of the plaintiff, the mere fact that he stated to Hense, Smith & Davison that he was working said property on his own account, cannot affect the defendant's liability to the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff knew of these statements at the time the money was loaned.

The court instructs the jury that when one has the actual charge and management of the business of a corporation, with the knowledge of the members and directors, this is evidence of his authority, without any vote or other corporate act constituting him agent of the corporation, and the company will be bound by his contracts, made on their behalf, within the apparent scope of the business intrusted to him. Power to act generally in a particular business or a particular course of trade, in a particular business, however limited, would constitute a general agency.

In general, when an agent is authorized to do an act, and transcends his authority, it is the duty of the principal to repudiate it as soon as he is fully informed of what has been done in his name, by the agent, else he is bound by the act as having ratified it by implication.

The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that Sabin held himself out as agent of the defendant, and, while so holding himself out, drew money out of the plaintiff's bank and used the same in working and mining the property of the defendant, and the defendant retained and kept the profits arising and growing out of such working and mining, with the knowledge that the money was so borrowed and applied, then the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for such money, unless it is proved that the plaintiff knew that Sabin had no authority to draw money out of plaintiff's bank.

If the jury find, from the evidence, that George K. Sabin was the agent of the defendant, and the extent of his authority was defined in a private letter of instructions, then no duty existed on the part of the bank to make inquiries as to any private letter of instructions from the principal to the agent, for such instructions may well be presumed to be of a secret and confidential nature, and not intended to be divulged to other persons.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Sabin was not the agent of the defendant, but that the defendant allowed him to work its mine and hold himself out as agent for some considerable time, and Sabin, while so holding himself out as agent of defendant, obtained money of the plaintiff in the name of the defendant, and used the money in mining the property of the defendant, and that the ore taken out by Sabin, by the use of such money, was retained and kept by the defendant with the knowledge of the fact that the money was so used, then the defendant is liable.

The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that George K. Sabin was the agent of the defendant, and, while acting as agent, borrowed the sum of money in controversy of the plaintiff, and expended the same in the business of the defendant and in paying its debts; that the money so advanced by the plaintiff, though so applied, creates no debt against the defendant, but that the jury must further find, from the evidence, before they can find for the plaintiff, in addition to the mere fact of the loan from the plaintiff to Sabin, and the application of the money for the benefit of the defendant, that the defendant had authorized the plaintiff to loan the money to Sabin, or Sabin to borrow the money in controversy from the plaintiff, or had afterward ratified and adopted the act. And the court instructs you that, if the money so borrowed from the plaintiff was applied by Sabin to the taking ore out of the defendant's mine, and that said ore, when thus taken out, was kept by the defendant, the said defendant having knowledge that the money had been so applied, that that would amount to an adoption of Sabin's acts, and knowledge to the president would be knowledge to the corporation.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $27,034.96.

A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and judgment was rendered on verdict.

MR. E. WAKELEY, MR. G. B. REED and MR. HUGH BUTLER, for appellant.

MESSRS. JOHNSON & TELLER, MESSRS. CHARLES & ELBERT and MR. W. R. GORSLINE, for appellee.

HALLETT, C. J. Appellant is a mining corporation organized in New York, which owns and operates mines in this territory. T. H. Becker, at first a trustee, and more recently president of the corporation, was in the territory during a portion of the time mentioned in this record, but the evidence does not show that any other officer or shareholder was ever in the territory. In 1865, George K. Sabin was appointed superintendent of the company's mine in Gilpin county, and conducted its affairs until October of that year, when work was discontinued. At the trial, appellant contended, and introduced testimony to prove, that Sabin resigned his agency in the spring of 1866, and that, in the fall of that year, he entered into an agreement with the company by which he was to work the mine on his own account and render to the company the first-class ore. Appellee's testimony on this point tended to prove that Sabin's agency continued until December, 1868, and so the jury found the fact to be. In the years 1867-68, Sabin kept a deposit account in the bank in appellant's name, which, by frequent overdrafts, he increased to the large amount for which, with interest, judgment was rendered against appellant.

In four special pleas appellant alleged that the bank was not able to contract an indebtedness exceeding in amount ten per cent of its capital stock, setting forth the amount of the stock and other facts to show the alleged incapacity, and, in another plea, the organization and capital stock of the bank is set out, apparently with a view to claim a forfeiture of the charter of the bank, pursuant to section fifty-three of the act under which it was organized. 13 Stat. 99. As to the forfeiture of the charter, it is well settled that a corporation cannot be dissolved in a collateral proceeding, and I do not think that appellant can question the existence of the bank in this way. Angell & Ames on Corporations, § 777; Robinson v. London Hospital, 11 Hare (44 Eng. Ch.) 24. Section fifty-three provides that the violation of the provisions of the act, which shall work a forfeiture of the rights and franchises of the association, shall be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought by the comptroller of the currency, in his own name, before the association can be declared dissolved, and the bank must stand until dissolved in this way.

The special pleas, in which incapacity of the bank to contract the indebtedness is asserted, go to the whole declaration, and at best answer only the count for money loaned, and therefore the demurrer was properly sustained. In another trial the question may possibly arise on the evidence, and for this reason it may be necessary to make some suggestions as to the true meaning and effect of section 29 of the National Bank Law. That section was obviously intended to protect the shareholders and creditors of a bank organized under the act against an unwise use of its funds, and to this end it was necessary that the duties of the officers of the bank should be defined. I do not perceive that it was equally necessary that the power of the corporation, in relation to loans, should be circumscribed, for the mischief would arise out of the conduct of the officers, rather than the power of the bank. In section 8 the powers of the bank are enumerated, that of loaning money among others. If section 29 is to be regarded as limiting this power, the bank would be unable to recover that which rightfully belonged to it, and this section would tend to accomplish the ruin which it was designed to prevent. In the well-considered case of Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79, it was said that a contract to do a thing prohibited by statute, is not necessarily void if the statute visit the unlawful act with a penalty. If the thing prohibited is malum in se, the contract cannot be enforced, but as to things not immoral or against public policy it may be sufficient to enforce the statutory penalty only. Accordingly it was recently decided in Maryland that a provision in the charter of a bank prohibiting any director or other officer under penalty of fine or imprisonment from borrowing money from the bank, does not exempt a director from liability for money loaned to him in violation of the prohibition. Lester v. Howard Bank, 33 Md. 558.

If it was not the intention of congress to make the contract void, it will be enforced, and for the violation of law the penalty which the statute gives may be applied. That penalty attends every violation of the act, and is found in section 53. Another and additional penalty is attached to some of the acts prohibited by the statute, as for instance in section 30, it is provided that taking illegal interest shall work a forfeiture of the entire interest, and failure to comply with the provisions of sections 31 and 32 may result in the appointment of a receiver to wind up the business of the bank. This may show that, whatever consequences were to follow the violation of the act are expressed in the act itself, and where one penalty is given I do not think we are at liberty to attach another. We are not to give to section 29 a construction which will defeat the purpose for which it was enacted, and such will be the effect if we deny the right of the bank to recover money which it has paid out. I am persuaded that this section is to be regarded as a direction respecting the management of the bank, and not as a limitation of its powers, and that the rule pari delicto is not applicable to this case.

It will not be necessary to consider whether Sabin was agent of the company at the time of the transactions with the bank. The evidence was conflicting, and for the purposes of this discussion I accept the finding of the jury on that point. As to the nature and extent of his agency, it has not been contended that his dealings with the bank were within the scope of his authority. It would be difficult to maintain that a superintendent of a mine, with authority to take ore therefrom and crush it, for the purpose of obtaining gold, can, upon such authority, borrow money in the name of his principal, even if the money be used in carrying on the mine. Undoubtedly, the transactions with the bank were beyond Sabin's authority as agent, and we are now to consider whether there is evidence to show a ratification of his acts by the company.

It does not appear that the company was informed of the indebtedness to the bank prior to December 16, 1868, at which time Becker, the president, communicated such information by mail. There is some testimony to the effect that Becker had earlier information of the indebtedness, but he denies it, and as we cannot know how a jury may determine the fact, we must assume that his statement is correct. At this time the officers of the bank were pressing Becker for payment of the indebtedness, and, although he denied Sabin's authority to contract the indebtedness, he did not repudiate the demand, but expressed a willingness to pay it. On the 1st of January following, he executed to the president of the bank a paper, in which he speaks of the indebtedness as "the over-draft of our company on your bank," and says, "I hope you will not feel uneasy about the payment; we have an abundance of ore already broken in the mine to pay all indebtedness of the company. In fact, this is the only indebtedness I have any knowledge of the company's owing, and if it is not paid off out of the mine, I propose to call a meeting of our directors and submit your claim, and make an assessment at our February meeting (in New York city) to pay off your claim and any others that the company may owe."

Becker states that he wrote this letter under an impression that the company had made some different arrangement with Sabin, and that he refused to sign it as president, not wishing to bind the company — but this will not affect the character of the letter. The president of a corporation is presumed to know something of its affairs, and the evidence in this case shows that Becker was better acquainted with the business of the company than any other of its officers. He does not state the nature of the arrangement which he supposed the company had made with Sabin, or from what source he derived his impression that such arrangement existed. He had been in communication with his company in regard to Sabin's dealings with the bank, and was at that time its only representative in the territory. If he was acting upon false information he ought to have stated by whom and how he was misled. Nor can the president of a corporation put off his official character at will and deny to those who have business with the corporation, access through him. If an officer of a corporation may, at pleasure, assume the status personal and deny his relations with his principal, it will be impossible to deal with a corporation except at the will of the officers. He was acting upon the business of the company, and all his acts within the scope of his authority as president must be regarded as official. In the evidence it is shown that the president exercised a very general authority in the management of the affairs of the company. When Sabin was appointed superintendent in April, 1865, Creswell, then president, gave him instructions as to the manner of working the mine, and in the fall of that year the work was discontinued by order of the president. Sabin's reports of affairs at the mine were always made to the president, and in December, 1868, Becker, then president, stopped the work and took charge of the mine, and proceeded to adjust the unsettled accounts of the company. Becker states that he used his own funds in paying the debts incurred by Sabin for labor and supplies, but it may be fairly inferred that he was acting for the company in taking possession of the mine. If we regard the payment of the bills as the exuberance of a generous heart, there are other acts of his presidency and of his predecessors in office, done apparently with the knowledge and approval of the directors of the company, which go far to establish the general authority of the president to manage and control the affairs of the company. But this evidence of the authority of the president was not directly to the point, that he was authorized to settle and adjust the debts of the company, and appellant was not allowed to interrogate Becker as to his authority in this matter.

Under our statute Becker was competent to testify, and his authority to bind the company was in issue before the jury, and therefore the evidence should have been received. If, however, Becker had no authority to pledge the company to the payment of any indebtedness, he certainly had authority to convene the board of directors and lay before them the claim of the bank, and this he agreed to do. In the usual course of business a corporation is addressed through its president, and it is an important duty of the executive officer to bring to the knowledge of the board of directors any matter affecting the interest of the corporation.

In Fulton Bank v. New York and Sharon Canal Co., 4 Paige, 137, the court said: "It is well settled that notice to an agent of a party whose duty it is, as such agent, to act upon the notice or to communicate the information to his principal in the proper discharge of his trust as such agent is legal notice to the principal; and this rule applies to the agents of corporations as well as others." So, also, in National Bank v. Norton, 1 Hill, 578, it was said that notice given to the directors of a bank, for the purpose of being communicated to the board of directors, would be sufficient to charge the corporation with knowledge of the fact stated in the notice. This is upon the rule that the principal shall be responsible for the acts and omissions of his agent within the line of the agent's duty. Upon this rule it appears to me that Becker's undertaking to bring the claim of the bank before the board of directors of his company at the February meeting, bound the company to consider the claim at that time. The undertaking was an exercise of the executive function, and we are at liberty to presume that it was performed. Upon the evidence it seems that notice of the indebtedness was given to the company December 16, 1868. Fifteen days later Becker undertook to present the claim to the board of directors at the February meeting in New York. If the matter was acted on by the company, it does not appear that any notice of the result was given to the bank. Becker states that he told appellee's attorney, in the spring of 1869, that the company refused to pay, but the exact time is not fixed. Upon these facts the jury would have been warranted in finding that the company had ratified Sabin's dealings with the bank, for, where an agency exists, and the agent exceeds his authority, the silence of the principal may give rise to a presumption of an intentional ratification of the unauthorized act. Story's Agency, 256, et seq. The circumstances must have been fully understood by the party before any inference can be drawn from his silence, and they must have been such as not only afforded an opportunity to act or speak, but such also as would properly and naturally call for some action or reply from men similarly situated. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 197.

The matter of Sabin's dealings with the bank appears to have been fully explained to Becker, and by his statement the company was equally well informed. The circumstances called for an answer from the company. Money had been obtained by its agent and upon its credit, and the bank was demanding payment. The president of the company acknowledged the justice of the demand, and if the company had any objection to it, it was reasonable to believe that such objection would be made known. Where the delay on the part of the principal to disavow the agency will result in loss, and where the transaction may turn out a profit or loss according to circumstances, the principal must disavow the act of the agent within a reasonable time after notice. Culver v. Ashley, 1 Am. L. C. 719, note; Hortons v. Townes, 6 Leigh. 47.

In Corser v. Paul, 41 N. H. 24, it is said: "There is a class of admissions which may be either express, or implied from silence or acquiescence. Such are admissions which have been acted upon, or those which have been made to influence the conduct of others or to derive some advantage to the party, and which, therefore, cannot be denied without a breach of good faith."

Upon this it would seem that if the appellant, with knowledge that Sabin was obtaining money from the bank, had stood by and allowed him to go on without objection, it would have been estopped to deny his authority. There is, however, nothing of this kind in the evidence, nor does it appear that the position of the parties would have been different if the company had promptly disavowed the acts of its agent. The question is as to the intention of the company respecting Sabin's dealings with the bank, to be determined upon evidence of its conduct and the declarations of its authorized agents, within the scope of their authority. If at any time the company assented to the acts of its agent, it is as much bound by those acts as it would have been if the agent had been clothed with authority to perform them. The negotiations with Becker, the notice to the company of the indebtedness, the agreement to consider the matter at the February meeting of the board of directors, and the delay of the company to disavow Sabin's acts are facts to be considered by the jury, whose province it is to determine the question of ratification. Hortons v. Townes, 6 Leigh. 47; Corser v. Paul, 41 N. H. 24.

Further discussion of the principal points in the case is unnecessary, and it remains to consider some questions which may arise upon another trial.

The circumstance that the company retained the ore taken from the mine is not material to the question of ratification. It is not like the purchase of a chattel by an agent without authority, which, if retained by the principal, affords evidence of his intention to ratify the purchase. In such case the principal acquires, by the act of the agent, property which he had not otherwise; and if he disaffirms the contract he ought to restore the property to its rightful owner.

But here the ore belonged to the company, both before and after it was taken from the mine, and the bank never had any right to it whatever. If any inference is to be drawn from the fact that the ore ~~was~~ retained by the company, it arises out of an obligation to deliver it to some other party, and I do not perceive that any such obligation existed. Nor is it material that the money was expended in the mine, or that the expenditure was advantageous to the company, unless it is shown that the company had knowledge of the loan and of the expenditure. Whether the money was expended in the mine, and whether it resulted in gain or loss to the company, are matters in no way connected with the authority of the agent or the ratification of his acts by the company. If Sabin had authority to obtain money from the bank on behalf of the company, the liability of the latter is not affected by the use to which he appropriated it. A ratification has a retrospective effect, and takes effect as a prior command according to the maxim omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur, et mandato priori acquiparatur. Therefore, if the act of the agent is ratified by the principal, the use of the money is equally foreign to the issue.

A witness may be interrogated as to his relations with the parties to the suit for the purpose of affecting his credibility. Obviously the testimony which it is proposed to draw out must have a tendency to prove the state and disposition of the mind of the witness toward one of the parties to the suit, and I do not see that proof of indebtedness to one of the parties has any such tendency. Upon our experience of human nature we cannot say that, as a rule, debtors are friendly or hostile to their creditors. Doubtless, in many cases, the circumstances of the debtor may lead him to seek the favor of his creditor, but it is impossible to lay down any general rule upon the subject. A matter of this kind may be safely left to the discretion of the judge sitting at the trial. Appellant also proposed to show that Sabin refused to testify until the bank had made an arrangement with him respecting his indebtedness to the latter, but we are not told what the arrangement was. If Sabin asked favorable terms of payment, or that all or a portion of the indebtedness should be remitted to him, as a condition upon which alone he would testify, evidence of the fact would go to his credibility. A witness  demands compensation other than that which is given by law, for his testimony, is certainly to be regarded with suspicion. The offer, as made, however, did not disclose a corrupt bargain, or any circumstance which could influence Sabin's testimony, and hence it was rightly rejected.

Various questions are presented in the record, which it is deemed unnecessary to discuss. The issues were not presented to the jury upon the views here expressed, and therefore the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded with a venire facias. Reversed.

AGENCY — RATIFICATION BY SILENCE. — Where an agency exists, and the agent exceeds his authority, the silence of the principal may give rise to a presumption of intentional ratification of the unauthorized act: *Higgins v. WISE et al. v. BROCKER.

WRIT OF ERROR — new suit. A proceeding by writ of error to reverse a decree of a district court is a new suit.

PRACTICE in suits against representatives of deceased party to decrees. Error may be brought against the executrix and sole devisee of a deceased party to a decree, without preliminary proof of the death of such party or of the appointment of the person sued.

ABATEMENT — what is matter for. If the person sued is not executrix and devisee, as charged, she may plead the fact in abatement.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

WILLIAM A. WISE and Anna Wise sued out a writ of error to the district court of Arapahoe county, to bring up the record of a decree in a cause wherein Franz A. Brocker was complainant, and the said William and Anna were respondents. Amelia L. Brocker was summoned as executrix of the last will and testament, and sole devisee of the estate of Franz A. Brocker.

Messrs. BROWN & PUTNAM, for the said Amelia, now moved to dismiss the writ, for the reason that it did not appear that the said Franz A. Brocker was dead, and that the said Amelia had any interest in the record aforesaid or in the property therein described.

Mr. M. BENEDIOT, contra.

Per CURIAM. Franz A. Brocker obtained a decree foreclosing a mortgage given by plaintiffs in error, and defendant in error is summoned as executrix of his will and sole devisee of his estate. As plaintiffs in error were parties to the decree, and directly affected by it, of course they may prosecute this writ; but it is said that Franz A. Brocker is dead, and we have no evidence that defendant in error is executrix as charged. If it were necessary to furnish evidence of the death of the person against whose estate relief is sought, and of the appointment of an executor or administrator of the estate, before suing the representative, there would be some force in the objection. This is a new suit and defendant in error is charged as executrix of an estate. If she is not the representative of the estate she may plead the fact in abatement, but we cannot assume the fact upon motion to dismiss. If there is no further appearance by defendant, probably we shall require evidence of the death of Franz A. Brocker, and of the appointment of defendant as executrix, in order that we may know that the proper party has been summoned, but we cannot dismiss the writ upon motion.

Motion denied.

WRIT OF ERROR IS NEW SUIT: Webster v. Gaff, 6 Colo. 478; Stout v. Gully, 13 Colo. 808.
WRIT OF ERROR LIES TO ALL DECREES in equity, both at the suit of a sole defendant and at the suit of those aggrieved, however numerous: Vance v. Rockwell, 3 Colo. 248.

YUNKER v. NICHOLS.

EASEMENT — right to convey water over land for irrigation. In this territory lands are held in subordination to the dominant right of others, who must necessarily pass over them to obtain a supply of water to irrigate their own lands.

May exist without grant or prescription. A right to convey water over the land of another for the purpose of irrigating one's land may be acquired under the statute (Rev. Stat. 363), and such right needs not a grant from the owner of the servient estate to support it.

Error to District Court, Arapahoe County.

YUNKER brought an action of trespass on the case against Nichols, for diverting water from an irrigating ditch leading from Bear Creek to the plaintiff's farm. It appeared that the ditch was constructed in the spring of the year 1871, by the plaintiff, the defendant and one John Bell, under an agreement that they would share equally in the water conveyed thereby, such water to be used in irrigating the lands of the several parties respectively. After the ditch had been constructed to and across the defendant's land, so as to communicate and supply water to plaintiff's land, the defendant diverted the water from the ditch and caused the same to flow upon his own land, so that none passed down to the plaintiff, whose lands were below those of the defendant, by means whereof the plaintiff's growing crop was greatly injured and diminished in value. It did not appear that there was any memorandum in writing of the agreement in respect to the ditch between the plaintiff, the defendant and Bell. The court instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff's right to have water flow over the lands of the defendant was conferred by verbal agreement of the plaintiff, the defendant and a third person, which agreement was never reduced to writing, that the plaintiff could not recover. The jury found for the defendant.

Mr. H. R. HUNT, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. BROWNE & PUTNAM, for defendant in error.

Separate opinions were filed by the members of the court.

HALLETT, C. J. In England, and in this country, it is considered that the right of one person to conduct water over the land of another is an interest in real estate, which must be conveyed by deed in compliance with the terms of the statute of frauds. In countries where the humidity of the climate is sufficient to supply moisture to plants, there can be no reason for distinguishing this from other casements in the soil, and therefore the law of England, and of most of our States on this point will be found in the general rules relating to real property.

The principles of the law are undoubtedly of universal application, but some latitude of construction must be allowed to meet the various conditions of life in different countries. The principles of the decalogue may be applied to the conduct of men in every country and clime, but rules respecting the tenure of property must yield to the physical laws of nature, whenever such laws exert a controlling influence.

In a dry and thirsty land it is necessary to divert the waters of streams from their natural channels, in order to obtain the fruits of the soil, and this necessity is so universal and imperious that it claims recognition of the law. The value and usefulness of agricultural lands, in this territory, depend upon the supply of water for irrigation, and this can only be obtained by constructing artificial channels through which it may flow over adjacent lands. These artificial channels are often of great length, and rarely within the lands of a single proprietor. A riparian owner must usually get his supply of water from some point on the stream above his own land, and he is compelled to enter upon the lands of others in order to obtain it. Irrigating ditches cannot be made available at or near the head or point of divergence from the stream, and, while a riparian owner may be able to construct a ditch upon his own territory which shall overflow a portion of his land, he can never make it serviceable to the entire tract. Of course, lands situated at a distance from a stream cannot be irrigated without passing over intermediate lands, and thus all tilled lands, wherever situated, are subject to the same necessity. In other lands, where the rain falls upon the just and the unjust, this necessity is unknown, and is not recognized by the law. But here the law has made provision for this necessity, by withholding from the land-owner the absolute dominion of his estate, which would enable him to deny the right of others to enter upon it for the purpose of obtaining needed supplies of water. It was enacted by the first legislative assembly, that persons owning claims on the bank, margin or neighborhood of any stream, should have the right of way over adjacent lands for purposes of irrigation (Laws 1861, p. 67), and this law is still of force. (Rev. Stat. 363.) So, also, the common law recognizes an easement in certain cases, and will imply a grant of such easement where it is especially necessary to the enjoyment of the dominant estate. Phear on Rights of Water, 71.

If one having a close, surrounded with his own land, grants the close to another in fee for life or years, the grantee shall have a way to the close over the grantor's land as incident to the grant, for, without it, he cannot derive any benefit from the grant. So it is, also, where he grants the land and reserves the close to himself. 1 Wm. Saund. 323, note 6; Pennington v. Galland, 9 Ex. 9; Snyder v. Warford, 11 Mo. 513.

And if one erect a house and build a conduit thereto in another part of his land, and convey water by pipes to the house, and, afterward, sell the house with the appurtenances, excepting the land, or sell the land to another, reserving to himself the house, the conduit and pipes pass with the house, because it is necessary and quasi appendant thereto. Phear on Rights of Water, 72; Pheysey v. Vicary, 16 M. & W. 484; Ryer v. Carter, 1 H. & N. 916. In these cases, it is true, the dominant and servient estates were derived from a common source, but in this they are analogous to the case at bar. All the lands in this territory which are now held by individuals were derived from the general government, and it is fair to presume that the government intended to convey to the citizens the necessary means to make them fruitful.

"Into all contracts, whether made between States and individuals or between individuals only, there enter conditions which arise not out of the literal terms of the contract itself. They are superinduced by the pre-existing and higher authority of the laws of nature, of nations, or of the community to which the parties belong. They are always presumed, and must be presumed, to be known and recognized by all, are binding upon all, and need never, therefore, be carried into express stipulation, for this could add nothing to their force." West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 532.

When the lands of this territory were derived from the general government, they were subject to the law of nature, which holds them barren until awakened to fertility by nourishing streams of water, and the purchasers could have no benefit from the grant without the right to irrigate them. It may be said, that all lands are held in subordination to the dominant right of others, who must necessarily pass over them to obtain a supply of water to irrigate their own lands, and this servitude arises, not by grant, but by operation of law.

In this case there was evidence tending to prove that defendant consented to the construction of the ditch, which, with the aid of the law, was sufficient to maintain the action. If defendant had refused his consent, the statute prescribed the method of proceeding to perfect plaintiff's right. But, in any event, it was not necessary that defendant should convey to plaintiff the right of way for the ditch, and therefore the charge to the jury was erroneous.

I think that the judgment should be reversed, and that a new trial should be awarded.

BELFORD, J. Yunker sued Nichols in the court below, in an action on the case to recover damages for cutting a certain ditch which had theretofore been constructed on Nichols' land, and for diverting the water therefrom. The declaration contains three counts. It is averred that Yunker, at the commencement of this action, and for a long time anterior thereto, was the owner of a certain tract of land lying from one to two miles distant from a certain stream known as Bear Creek. It is further averred that plaintiff had no facilities on said land for irrigating purposes. It is further alleged that the defendant and one John Bell, John McBroom and Peter Olsen, respectively, claimed certain tracts of land lying between the land of the plaintiff and the stream above mentioned. That, on the first day of March, 1871, the plaintiff and the said defendant and Bell, not having water facilities on their lands for the purpose of irrigation, built and constructed a dam in said stream of water, adjacent to the land of McBroom, and procured from McBroom and Olsen the right of way across their land, and dug and constructed a certain ditch, and conducted water therein from the dam to the respective lands of Bell and Nichols and the said plaintiff, for the purpose of using the same in irrigating and making said lands available for agricultural purposes. That, by mutual agreement, the water running through the ditch was to be used share and share alike by the parties, each of the parties having the right to divert from said ditch on to their respective tracts one-third of the water. It is further alleged that, notwithstanding this agreement, and after the ditch was constructed and the water let in, the defendant wrongfully and unjustly intending to injure the plaintiff and deprive him of the use of the water not only diverted a larger quantity of it than he was entitled to, but prevented any portion of it from reaching plaintiff's land and prevented the plaintiff from using the ditch, wherefore great damage had accrued, etc. The defendant filed the general denial. The cause was submitted to the jury for trial, who returned a verdict for the defendant. There was no evidence introduced on the part of the defendant, and that of the plaintiff fully sustained the allegations of the declaration. The court gave the jury the following instructions, which are assigned for error:

"If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the right to have water flow over the lands of the defendant and to the lands of the plaintiff, for the interruption of which this action is brought, was conferred by a verbal agreement of the parties or the verbal agreement of the plaintiff and defendant and a third person, which agreement was never reduced to writing, and that the plaintiff had no other right to such flow of water than such verbal agreement; then, although they should believe from the evidence that the plaintiff actually constructed said ditch, and expended labor and money on the faith of such agreement, and that the defendants actually diverted the water, as charged in the declaration, they must find defendant not guilty."

"The jury cannot find for the plaintiff unless they believe from the evidence that the right which plaintiff claims to have water flow over the land of defendant, and for the obstruction of which right this action is brought, was given by deed of the defendant to plaintiff. If plaintiff's only title to the flow and use of the water was a verbal agreement or consent of the defendant, the plaintiff has no case."

The principle involved in this case has certainly received a large degree of attention, both in this country and in England, and it is to be deeply regretted that those courts which appear to have given it the greatest consideration have failed to preserve any rule of uniformity in their decisions. A broad distinction seems to be taken between a license which is executory, and one that has been executed, and, in many instances, the principle of estoppel has been made available in avoiding the recognized force of the statute of frauds. In some of the States a license to dig a ditch and flow water therein over the land of another is held not to be such an interest in the realty as requires the right to be evidenced by deed; in others, a contrary rule is expressly announced, and licenses of this character are held to be always revocable at the will of the licensor. I apprehend that much of the confusion which obtains on this subject arises from a failure to keep steadily in view the distinction which unquestionably exists between a mere license and a grant. In speaking of this subject, VAUGHAN, C. J., says: "A dispensation or license properly passeth no interest, nor alters or transfers property in any thing, but only makes an action lawful which, without it, had been unlawful. As a license to go beyond the seas, to hunt in a man's park, to come into his house, are only actions which, without license, had been unlawful. But a license to hunt in a man's park, and carry away the deer killed to his own use ; to cut down a tree in a man's ground, and to carry it away the next day after to his own use, are licenses as to acts of hunting and cutting down the tree, but as to carrying away of the deer killed and the tree cut down, they are grants."

In courts where this distinction has been taken, it has been held that the right to overflow the land of another is an easement, an incorporeal hereditament, and it is an interest in real estate. Title to such easement must be conveyed by grant and established by proof of an actual grant, or by proof of a prescription, from which a grant will be inferred. And if the mode of proof adopted be the showing of an actual grant, the grant must, at least, under the statute of frauds, be in writing, by deed ; and the same doctrine has been specially applied to a ditch constructed through the land of another. Morse v. Copeland, 2 Gray, 305 ; Selden v. Delaware and Hudson Canal Co., 29 N. Y. 635 ; Foster v. Browning, 4 R. I. 47 ; Foster v. N. H. and N. Co., 23 Conn. 228. Our attention, however, has been particularly called to the decisions which have been made on this subject in Maine, New Hampshire, Ohio, Iowa and Indiana, and I have endeavored to give them a most careful and critical examination. Ricker v. Kelly, 1 Greenl. 117, was an action of trespass for cutting down and destroying part of a wooden bridge, the property of the plaintiffs. The defendant, in justifying, pleaded that the bridge was erected on the land of Kelly without his license and against his will, and that he removed it, as he lawfully might do.

The plaintiffs replied that, on a certain day, in consideration of their promise to perform certain work, which was accordingly performed for Kelly, he gave them a license and authority to erect a bridge on his land, and to have a right of way over the same to the bridge ; that, by virtue of said license, they erected the bridge, etc. To this replication the defendants demurred, because the plaintiffs had not set out any legal conveyance of title to them to build their bridge, nor to enter upon or pass over the land for any other purpose, and because it did not appear that said license was in writing, nor how long it was to continue in force. Held by the court, that the replication was good and the action maintainable. MELLETT, C. J., after referring to the allegation of the defendant, that the claim of the plaintiffs was an interest in the close within the meaning of the statute of frauds, and the proof of this interest not being in writing, the permission of the defendant to the plaintiffs to enter upon the close and build said bridge and enjoy a right of way over the close to the said bridge, is void and ineffectual, says: "In the present case the plaintiffs placed their own materials in the form of part of a bridge on the defendant's land, by their express consent, and if a right of way over the close to the bridge did not pass by parol, still the defendant had no right to seize and carry away the plaintiff's property and destroy its value. As well might the owner of a ship-yard permit another to build a ship in it, and when the ship was on the stocks, cut it in pieces and carry it away with impunity," and this really appears to be the controlling principle in that decision. True, the judge holds that the permission having been acted upon, the case was thereby taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds. But if we concede that this decision is made to rest on this latter ground, then the case can no longer be regarded as authority in that State, for the reason that Pittman v. Poor, 38 Me. 237, silently overrules it, and holds that no permanent interest in real estate can be acquired by a parol agreement, and that the parol license that the plaintiff or his grantor may build a dam on the land of another, to raise a reservoir of water for the use of his mill, will confer no right upon the plaintiff to maintain such dam after it is built, or control the water raised by means of it. This is the last utterance on the subject by that court, so far as I am informed, and must be taken as the established doctrine of that State.

The first case in New Hampshire is that of Woodbury v. Parshley, 7 N. H. 237. That was an action on the case

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was seized of a meadow adjoining a certain pond, and that the defendant, by means of a dam erected by him upon his own land, caused the water to overflow and injure the meadow of the plaintiff. The defendant introduced evidence showing that the dam had been erected by the mutual agreement of the parties. The plaintiff objected to the admission of parol evidence to prove such agreement, but the evidence was admitted. The court, after holding that the evidence was rightly admitted, says: "The dam was erected by the defendant at his own expense, with the assent of the plaintiff, for the benefit of both. And here the first question is, whether, under the circumstances, the license was revocable at the will of the plaintiff? The defendant had incurred expenses in erecting the dam. The license had been executed and acted upon. Certainly the plaintiff could not revoke it without tendering to the defendant the expenses that had been incurred in the project."

In Ameriscoggin Bridge v. Bragg, 11 N. H. 108, the court say: "It is contended further, that the license to erect a bridge on defendant's land cannot be shown by parol testimony, on the ground that it is a permanent easement in the land, with a right at all times to enter and enjoy it, and that such an easement is within the statute of frauds, and can be sustained only by evidence in writing. The distinction between a privilege or easement carrying an interest in land and requiring a writing within the statute of frauds to support it, and a license which may be by parol is said, by Chancellor KENT, to be quite subtle, and that it is difficult in some of the cases to discern a substantial difference between them. A license to an individual to do an act beneficial to him, but requiring an expenditure upon another's land, is held not to be revocable after it has once been acted upon. Such a license is a direct encouragement to expend money, and it would be against conscience to revoke it as soon as the expenditure begins to be beneficial." In Sampson v. Burnside, 13 N. H. 264, it is held that a parol license to enter on land and lay down aqueduct logs for the pur pose of carrying water from a spring to adjoining land, with license to enter from time to time to examine and repair the same, is not a sale of land or an interest in land within the statute of frauds. Whether the license in such a case is revocable or not, is regarded as an open question. In the case of Houston v. Laffer, 46 N. H. 507, which very strongly resembles the case at bar, the earlier decisions on this subject in that State are all noticed, and, if not directly overruled, their authority is greatly impaired. After alluding to these cases the court say: "But we think the more recent decisions, however, sustain the doctrine that the license is, in all cases, revocable, so far as it remains unexecuted, or so far as any future enjoyment of the easement is concerned. To hold otherwise would be giving to a parol license the force of a conveyance of a permanent easement in real estate; such a doctrine cannot be sustained. No such right or interest in real estate can be created by parol." It is evident, therefore, from the later cases, both in Maine and New Hampshire, that a clear departure has been taken from the doctrines announced in the earlier reports, and a tendency has set in to conform to the line of decision pursued in a majority of the States. In Ohio the court has steadily adhered to the doctrine that a parol license, when executed, is irrevocable, and that an action of trespass is maintainable against the licensor for any unjust interference with the rights of the licensee. Wilson v. Chalfant, 15 Ohio, .

In Iowa, Wickersham v. Orr, 9 Iowa, 260, the irrevocability of an executed parol license is made to rest on the ground that when money or labor has been expended on the land of another, upon the faith of a promise given by him, the owner shall not assert his legal right to the soil so as to interfere with that use or enjoyment of the thing which has resulted from such promise by the money and labor of the licensee.

In Bently v. Gregory, 17 Iowa, , it is held that a parol license which has been acted upon, and which has led to the expenditure of money and labor, cannot be revoked until compensation for such expenditure has been made. Taking this last case as modifying the principle announced in the former, we have the courts of two States, Ohio and Pennsylvania, adhering strictly to the doctrine of the irrevocability of an executed license, while in all the other States, as well as in England (Wood v. Leadbetter, 13 M. & W.), licenses of this character are held to be revocable at will, as being in contravention of the statute of frauds. Viewing the instructions given by the judge below, to the jury, as the announcement of doctrines which should govern a court of law in the administration of purely legal principles, I am not prepared to dissent from them, but, while I yield to them that measure of homage so fully accorded by others, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that it is doing violence to every principle of justice, to allow a statute designedly passed to cut off and prevent frauds, to be converted into an instrument whereby they may be practiced and fostered. That which was originally intended as a shield and defense for rights should never be permitted to become a means of assault for their overthrow. Courts of equity which constantly adapt themselves to the progress of society and civilization, and whose principles accumulate with the experience of ages, have certainly blunted the sharper edges of the statute of frauds, and evolved a doctrine in every respect more consonant with the interest of society, namely, that he who by his admissions or conduct induces another to act, cannot afterward be permitted to assert the contrary to the injury or prejudice of the party who has already acted upon the faith and in the belief created by him ; and all the courts concur in holding that an estoppel in pais exists, when a party makes a statement to another, which that other relies and acts upon, and which it would be a fraud in the party making the statement to afterward controvert, so far as the statement affects the other's pecuniary rights. It cannot be denied that the common law has, in a great measure, accommodated itself to this doctrine of estoppel, especially so far as it affects personal property, and its application in matters of that nature is constant ; nor is it wanting in examples in relation to real estate. So great a jurist as Lord MANSFIELD would not suffer a man to recover even in ejectment, when he had stood by and seen the defendant build on his land. And, in the case of Hearn v. Rogers, 9 B. & C. 577, Mr. Justice BAILEY said, that under the same circumstances he would apply the same doctrine. Mr. Justice BULLER, in the case of Farr v. Newman, 4 D. & E. 636, remarks: "That when a rule of property is settled in a court of equity, and there are no decisions against it at law, I am as ready as any man to follow the line of equity, for I think it absurd and injurious to the community, that different rules should prevail in different courts on the same subject." And to the same effect is the language of Lord ELDEN in Smith v. Doe, 7 Price, 509. In the case of Shaw v. Bebee, 35 Vt. 208, the principle of estoppel was applied. That was an action of ejectment. The court say, "We are aware that there have been decisions questioning the extension of this doctrine of estoppel in pais to affect the title to lands. But a review of the decisions shows that the great weight of authority is consonant with the views we have here expressed. All concur that such facts constitute an estoppel as to personal property, and upon reason and principle to prevent fraud and promote justice the same rule should be extended to real property." It is also true, that the common-law courts of Pennsylvania have adopted it; and they have adopted many other principles which had first received their sanction in courts of equity. Wents v. De Haven, 1 Serg. & Rawle, 312. The same principle was applied in Corbet v. Norcron, 35 N. H. 115, and in Heard v. Hall, 16 Pick. 457, and in White v. Perkins, 24 id. 324.

In the State of Nevada they have yielded to the force of the same doctrine, as will be seen from the case of Sharan v. Mennick, 6 Nev. 389; so also in California. Kelly v. Taylor, 23 Cal. 11; 5 id. 84, and 8 id. 44.

In Snowdon v. Wilds, 19 Ind. 14, the court say: "But though a parol license amounting, in terms, to an easement, is revocable as to future enjoyment at law, and is determined by a conveyance of the estate upon which it was enjoyed, this is not the rule in all cases, in courts of equity. In these courts the future enjoyment of an executed parol license, granted upon a consideration, or upon the faith of which money has been expended, will be enforced, at all events when adequate compensation in damages could not be obtained. This will be done upon the two grounds of estoppel and fraud, and the specific performance of a partly executed contract to prevent fraud. And in those States where law and equity are administered in the same court, relief is afforded in any given suit when the pleadings present the necessary averments." When courts of law so freely apply this principle, in regard to personalty, it is difficult to comprehend why any hesitation should exist in its application to real estate. What would be justice in one case would be equally so in the other; and in equity it is accordingly admitted, and why should it not be so at common law. It may be said, however, that the distinction between law and equity is maintained in this territory. That is true only in a qualified sense. The same officer administers both, and at the same term of court, and to me it seems strange and preposterous for the same judge to turn the party out of his court one day to enable him to avail himself of a well-known, well-defined and well-settled rule in jurisprudence, as applicable in a rational point of view to proceedings in one tribunal as in those of another, especially when, as in this territory, the very court which is to decide in equity is the same tribunal. It cannot be controverted that, under the facts set forth in the declaration, Yunker would be entitled, in a court of equity, to a remedy, that would secure him in the enjoyment of the ditch and the water flowing therein. Would a court of equity also compensate him for the damages which he has sustained by reason of the unjust interference of Nichols? then it would be invading the domain of the law, and setting itself up as the admeasurer of damages; a comfortable and assuring spectacle indeed, when the same judge had, the day before, declined, for reasons of grave public policy, to invade the domain of equity. If the court should, however, feel unable to award compensatory damages, Yunker would be remediless, for the affirmance of the judgment below would bar his right of action, although the deed which the court of equity would require Nichols to make might be adjudged to take effect from the date of the construction of the ditch.

In the notes to Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 2, p. 762 (6th Am. ed.), the learned annotators say: "It would, therefore, seem too late to contend that the title to real estate cannot be barred by matter in pais without disregarding the statute of frauds, and the only room for dispute is as to the forum in which relief must be sought. The remedy in such cases lay originally in chancery, and no redress could be had in the courts of common law unless under rare and exceptional cases. But the common law has been enlarged and enriched with the principles and maxims of equity, which are constantly applied at the present day in this country and in England for the relief of sureties, the protection of mortgagors and the benefit of purchasers by a wise adaption of ancient forms to the more liberal spirit of modern times. The doctrine of equitable estoppel is derived from the courts of equity, and as those courts apply to every species of property, there would seem no reason why its application should be restricted in courts of law. Protection against fraud is equally necessary, whatever be the nature of the interest at stake, and it would seem that, whether the controversy be in equity or at law, there is nothing in the nature of real estate which should deprive it of the benefit of those wise and salutary principles which are now applied without scruple, in both jurisdictions, in case of personalty. And whatever may be the wisdom of the change which has broken the barriers by which the doctrine of equitable estoppel was formerly excluded from legal tribunals, it has now gone too far to be confined within any limits less than the whole field of jurisprudence." Buckholler v. Edwards, 16 Ga. 593.

It seems to me, after the doctrine has received the sanction of such courts as those of Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Nevada and California, we can run no serious risk in applying its benefits to the property within our borders. If the foregoing views are in any measure open to objection, still another reason exists which imperatively demands the reversal of the judgment below. At an early period in our territorial history, the legislature, keenly alive to the wants and necessities of our people, enacted a law on the subject of irrigation, the provisions of which were designed to secure to all persons who claim, own or hold a possessory right or title to land within the boundary of Colorado, when those claims are on the bank, margin or neighborhood of any stream of water, the use of the water of said stream for the purposes of irrigation and making said claims available, to the full extent of the soil, for agricultural purposes. And further providing that, when the land so held or owned is removed from said stream of water, the owner or claimant shall be entitled to a right of way through the farms or tracts of land, which lie above and below him on said stream, for the purposes above stated. The constitutionality of this law is, however, assailed, and it becomes necessary to pass upon it. To avoid acknowledging the fact that constitutions sometimes surrender to the force of necessity, the general opinion obtains that courts and legislatures are justified in presuming that, within the scope and spirit of wise, august instruments, every power may be found, the exercise of which is essential to the public welfare.

If the warrant for performing an act, justly esteemed indispensable to the public prosperity, is not found in an express grant, then the authority finds lodgment in the implied powers of the constitution; for whenever the end is required the means are authorized, and whenever a general power to do a thing is given, every particular power necessary for doing it is included. It would be almost impracticable, if it were not useless, to enumerate the various instances in which congress, in the progress of the government, has made use of incidental and implied means to execute its powers. They are almost infinitely varied in their ramification and details. 2 Story on Const., § 1258. One of the most important interests of this territory is the agricultural interest. This can only be fostered and nourished by a system of irrigation, and the right to legislate on this subject seems to me clear and unquestionable. If, then, the agriculture is essential to the well-being of this territory, and can only be developed by a system of irrigation, it seems to me a matter of absolute necessity, that the legislature should have power to pass needful laws whereby the great body of land lying within our boundaries should be made available—and that necessity confers a right to pass such laws, I will endeavor to demonstrate. No such power as that of selling lands for the non-payment of taxes is to be found in the revealed, natural, civil or common law. But there are analogous powers to be found in the common-law code and in the statute law of every civilized nation; for example, the power to condemn land for public uses, and the other cases where power is exercised over the estates of citizens, such as the sale of lands for the payment of the debts of owner. The taxing power has no existence in a state of nature. It is the creature of civil society, government begets its necessity. There must be interwoven in the frame of every government a general power of taxation. Money is with propriety considered as the vital principle of the body politic, as that which sustains its life and motion and enables it to perform its most essential functions. A complete power, therefore, to procure a regular and adequate supply of revenue, as far as the resources of the community will permit, may be regarded as an indispensable ingredient in every constitution. From a deficiency in this particular, one of two evils must necessarily ensue: either the people must be subjected to continual plunder or the government must perish for want of revenue to support it. It may, therefore, be laid down as a principle of universal constitutional law, that the power to levy taxes is an incident to sovereignty, without which no government could exercise the powers expressly delegated to it. Blackwell on Tax Titles, 8-39; Pasham v. Decatur County, 9 Ga. 352.

If, therefore, the right to raise revenue and to sell land for the payment of taxes are made legal and constitutional by virtue of the necessities of society and government, what tenable objection can be made to the validity of a law, which, taking note of an imposing public necessity and the physical conditions of our territory, accords to all persons engaged in agricultural pursuits a right of way over lands lying between their possessions and a stream of water.

Is not the necessity in this particular instance quite as imperative as in the other?

Every member of society is presumed to have assented to the public law by which his right of property is subjected to the dominion of strangers. The manner in which this power is to be exercised is specified in the law. The same law which creates this power bridles its execution. You may take my property to pay my debts, but you must ascertain that debt by judgment and a sheriff must execute the power. You may take my land to build a railroad, but you must pay me the value of it. And hence, while it may justly be said that a party has an unquestionable right, owing to the necessities of the country, to construct a ditch over the land of another, independent of any special law on the subject, yet the legislature, as the representative of that society into which each citizen enters, and in the entering of which he sacrifices so much of his rights for the purchase of social protection, may prescribe the method, terms and means whereby that right to construct the ditch shall be exercised. Of course these legislative provisions may be waived by the parties, as was done in this case. The construction of a ditch for irrigating purposes seems to me to rest on principles analogous to those which sustain the right of a private way over the land of another.

In Parker v. Webster, 2 Sid. 39, decided in Cromwell's time, it appeared that A had three parcels of land and there was a private way out of the first parcel to the second and out of the two first parcels to the third, and B purchased all these parcels and sold the two first to C. There was no way to the land not sold but through the other two parcels, and the court adjudged that the way continued from neces-city, and that the party was not liable in trespass for using it. In the case of Snyder v. Warford, 11 Miss. 513, the court held that a right of way of necessity exists in all cases in which an individual owns land surrounded by other lands excluding it from any public highway, and the case is made to rest upon the good and salutary principle that the right of a man in the use of his property is restricted by a due regard to the equal rights of others. The judge says: "It would seem to be no more than a principle of natural justice that his right of way should exist, although its existence may, to some extent, interfere with the absolute dominion of the coterminous proprietors. If not a principle of natural law, it is at least one which could not long be omitted in the code of a civilized people." See 3 Kent's Com. 423, marginal; Holmes v. Seely, 19 Wend. 506; Capers v. Wilson, 3 McCord, 170; Cook v. Nearing, 27 N. Y. 306.

I am fully aware that courts should be slow to justify their decisions on the ground of necessity; but I am equally conscious of the fact that they will betray their trust if, in the administration of law or in the expounding of constitutional principles, they shut their eyes and refuse to recognize those conditions of society which call into force and operation principles whose existence and recognition cannot be disregarded without bringing ruin on all. As has been well said by another, the law is not a system marked by folly, based on bald sentences, without reason; it is a grand code, founded on the necessities of men, erected by mature judgment, gradually expanding in beneficence and wisdom as time progresses, and regulating with care the interests of society and civilization. And so believing, I think the instructions given were erroneous, and that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

WELLS, J. I concur in the conclusion that the judgment given in the court below must be reversed, but, in so far as this conclusion is based upon a supposed estoppel, I dissent from what my brother BELFORD has said; and, in so far as it is sought to rest it upon the statute concerning the irrigation of lands, I dissent from both my associates.

I conceive that, with us, the right of every proprietor to have a way over the lands intervening between his possessions and the neighboring stream for the passage of water for the irrigation of so much of his land as may be actually cultivated, is well sustained by force of the necessity arising from local peculiarities of climate; as in other countries, out of a like necessity, every proprietor has a way of right to his own close over the premises which shut it from the highway. But it appears to me that this right must rest altogether upon the necessity rather than upon the grant which the statute assumes to make. For in other countries, where the necessity does not exist, the right has not been recognized in the courts nor attempted to be confirmed by statute, and, where similar legislation has been attempted, in the instance of private ways, by statute, it has been held to be either void as an appropriation of private property to individual uses (Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140; Osborn v Hart, 24 Wis. 89), or else has been sustained as the regulation of an existing right, and not as conferring one. Snyder v. Warford, 11 Mo. 513.

It seems to me, therefore, that the right springs out of the necessity, and existed before the statute was enacted, and would still survive though the statute were repealed.

If we say that the statute confers the right, then the statute may take it away, which cannot be admitted.

Doubtless the exercise of the right may be regulated by statute, but that is not the question here; and it appears to me unnecessary to determine the validity or effect of the existing legislation.

Reversed.

WATER RIGHTS — PRIOR APPROPRIATION. — To make such appropriation valid, there must be a manifest beneficial use of the water designed or accompanied by some physical demonstration of intent to take the same for such use: Platte W. Co. v. North Colo. I. Co. 12 Colo. 551.

EASEMENT — RIGHT OF WAY TO CONVEY WATER. — In Colorado, lands were formerly held in subordination to the dominant rights of others, who must necessarily pass over them to obtain a supply of water to irrigate their own lands: Schilling v. Bomberger, 4 Colo. 104, 105; Branagan v. Dulaney, 8 Colo. 413. But since the adoption of the constitution, the taking of private property for private use (which this amounts to) is prohibited unless compensation be made, and the legislature has provided proceedings for this purpose: Stewart v. Stevens, 12 Colo. 445.
